Some unsuccessful attempts have been made to apply the doctrine in actions at law in states where the distinctions between law and equity had not at the time been abrogated.

In Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, where the purchaser brought an action of assumpsit to recover from the vendor the sums paid by him on a contract for the purchase of land upon the ground that a portion of the premises had been destroyed by fire and the consideration had thereby failed, the court held that the plaintiff could recover, and that the loss resulting from the fire must fall on the vendor. In so holding the court said that a different doctrine had been adopted in equity, founded on the fiction that whatever is agreed to be done shall be considered as actually done, but that a court of law could not recognize such doctrine.

A similar question was involved in Powell v. Dayton, S. & G. R. R. Co. 12 Or. 488, 8 Pac. 544, where, after the destruction of a portion of the premises, the purchaser refused to perform, and the vendor brought an action at law against him to recover damages for breach of contract. The court held that it could not apply the doctrine of equitable conversion, but must hold that the title was in the vendor at the time of the destruction of the premises, and hence the purchaser was excused at law from performing.

And in Tenelck v. Flagg, 29 N. J. L. 25, it was held that the rule in equity that the vendor's interest constitutes personality and passes to his personal representatives will not be applied in courts of law.

In Hall v. Bray, 1 N. J. L. 212, it was held that a contract for the sale of land on which the purchase money is not paid during the life of the vendor does not amount, at law, to a revocation of the vendor's will by which the property is devised, though the court said that in equity, perhaps, the contract might be considered as an absolute disposition of the property.

And in Wright v. Moore, 21 Wend. 230, it was held that a court of law must act on the legal title only, and consequently the purchaser's equitable title is not a defense to an action of ejectment brought against him by the vendor on his failure to pay the purchase money.

The power of the court to apply the doctrine in actions at law does not seem to have ever been questioned in the jurisdictions where the distinctions between law and equity have been abolished, though, as will appear from the following statement of the cases, the doctrine has been actually applied in such actions.

In Thompson v. Thompson, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 430, supra, where it was held that the purchaser takes an equitable title, the question arose on a petition to have dower assigned to the widow of the purchaser.

Jones v. Hollister, 51 Kan. 310, 32 Pac. 1115, supra, where it was held that the vendee took an equitable title, was an action of ejectment.

In Jewett v. Black, 60 Neb. 173, 82 N. W. 375, supra, the action was one of ejectment by the vendor against the vendee, and the defendant set up the contract and asked for a decree enforcing specific performance. The court entertained the defense, though it held against him on the ground of forfeiture.

In Woodward v. Dean, 46 Iowa, 499, supra, where it was held that a judgment against the vendor was not a lien on his interest, the question arose in garnishment proceedings.

And Snyder v. Murdock, 51 Mo. 175, supra, where it was held that the purchaser must bear the loss resulting from fire, was an action on the purchase-money notes.

Cochran v. Utter, 15 N. Y. Week. Dig. 570, supra, was an action by the vendee to recover bark which he had cut from trees on the premises and which the vendor had sold, and it was held that the title was in the vendee, and he could maintain the action.

In Catlin v. Robinson, 2 Watts, 373, supra, where it was held that a judgment against the vendee constitutes a lien on his interest, the court said: "These principles have been cast upon us by our want of a court of chancery, and consequent departure from a rule of the common law, by which a judgment and execution operate but upon legal estates."

And West Hickory Min. Asso. v. Reed, 80 Pa. 38, supra, where it was held that the vendor's interest constitutes personality and may be disposed of by his personal representatives, was an action of debt to recover purchase money.

In Siter's Appeal, 26 Pa. 180, supra, where it was held that the vendee took an equitable title and was entitled to the surplus realized on a sale under a judgment against the vendor, was a proceeding before an auditor to dispose of the surplus moneys.

Russell's Appeal, 15 Pa. 319, supra, was a similar proceeding, and there it was held that an assignment of the contract by the vendee constituted a mortgage of realty, and must be recorded as against subsequent judgment creditors of the vendee.

VII. Conclusion.

Under the familiar doctrine that equity considers as done that which was agreed to be done, a contract for the sale of land operates as an equitable conversion. The vendee takes an equitable title, and his interest under the contract becomes realty; in case of his death before the conveyance is made the title descends to his heirs; he is entitled to all benefits attaching to the property, and must bear all losses, unless the contract shows a contrary intention on the part of the parties; he may execute a valid mortgage or deed of the property; and is entitled to the usual benefits attaching to the ownership of property, subject, however, to the rights of the vendor, who holds the legal title as security for the payment of the purchase money.

Conversely, the vendor's interest constitutes personality, and on his death is distributable as such. He holds the legal title as trustee for the purchaser and as security for the payment of the purchase money. He cannot give a valid deed or mortgage of the property to one having knowledge of the vendee's equities, though he may transfer his interest under the contract. The decisions are conflicting as to whether a judgment against him constitutes a lien on the property; some hold that it does not constitute a lien, while others hold that it constitutes a lien on his interest in the property which may be sold under the judgment.

The doctrine will not be applied where it is apparent from the contract that the parties intended that it should not operate as an equitable conversion.

Neither will it be applied where the contract is one the specific performance of which cannot be enforced.

The conversion takes place at the time of the execution of the contract, even though the purchaser does not take possession or pay the purchase price; though in some cases, where the decisions were based on the language of the particular contracts, it was held that the equitable title did not pass until the performance of certain conditions.

In cases of leases containing options of purchase it has been established by the English courts that where the lessee exercises the option of purchase after the death of the lessor it relates back to the date of the execution of the lease, and the vendor's interest constitutes personality and is distributable among his next of kin. This rule has been criticised both in this country and England, and the cases in this country are divided on the question.

However, the courts of both countries are united in limiting its operation, and hold that when the lessee dies the subsequent exercise of the option by his personal representatives does not relate back, and his interest goes to his next of kin.

The rule is established by the weight of authority that the failure of performance by the vendee within the stipulated time does not work a reconversion unless time is of the essence of the contract.

In some of the decisions arising in actions at law, the distinction between law and equity has been maintained, and the court has refused to apply the doctrine of equitable conversion. In other jurisdictions, where such distinctions have been abrogated, the doctrine has been applied in proceedings at law, though without having the power of the court to do so actually questioned and passed upon. Merely exempting a witness in a criminal case from liability to have his testimony used against himself in case he is subsequently prosecuted for an offense to which it relates is not sufficient to prevent his claiming the protection of a constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in any criminal case, since the testimony so given may disclose facts upon which a successful prosecution against him may be founded.

the custody of the sheriff of Shannon County, to which he had been committed for contempt in refusing to answer questions propounded to him as a witness. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Orchard, for petitioner:

The statute is in violation of § 23, art. 2, of the Constitution of Missouri, and of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195; State v. Quarles, 13 Ark. 307; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Simmons Hardware Co. 109 Mo. 118, 15 L. R. A. 676, 18 S. W. 1125; Re Green, 86 Mo. App. 216; Ew parte Buskett, 106 Mo. 602, 14 L. R. A. 407, 17 S. W. 753.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding has been instituted to test the validity of § 2206, Rev. Stat. 1899, which reads this way: "No person shall be incapacitated or excused from testifying touching any offense committed by another, against any of the provisions relating to gaming, by reason of his having betted or played at any of the prohibited games or gaming devices, but the testimony which may be given by such person shall in no case be used against him." It seems that a prosecution was begun against W. R. Shuck et al., down in Shannon county, for playing "pitch" and "seven-up" for money and drinks. On the trial of that cause, petitioner was sworn as a witness, whereupon the following colloquy ensued between the prosecuting attorney and the witness:

Q. Are you acquainted with W. R. Shuck?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I will ask you— He stands charged here with betting on a game of pitch, also on a game of seven-up, last July some time. I will ask you to state to the jury if you saw them along about that time playing?

A. I must refuse to testify in this case. I am afraid I would incriminate myself.

Q. I will ask you to state to this jury if you did not, some time within a year prior,—some time last July,—if they were not over here at this place, and you didn't see them playing pitch for the drinks?

A. As I told you before, I refuse to testify, on the same grounds.

Your Honor, I insist that the witness answer the questions.

The Court: Answer the question.

A. I refuse to answer the question, because it would lead to evidence which would incriminate myself, or lead to witnesses by whose testimony I would be convicted, and would humiliate and degrade me, and, if I should give evidence concerning the whole case, it would criminate me.

Upon such refusal the court fined the petitioner for contempt, and ordered him into the custody of the sheriff, in whose custody he now is.

On behalf of his constitutional exemption from being required to answer such questions, petitioner contends that he did not have to answer them. The petitioner contends that his confinement is illegal, and in violation of § 23 of article 2 of the Constitution of the state of Missouri, which says "that no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal case," and that said imprisonment is in violation of that part of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which says, "nor shall any person be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself."

The rulings of various courts have not been uniform on the question here presented; one court, and perhaps more, holding to the extreme view that only in a criminal case wherein the person sought to be made a witness was also a party defendant in such case did the constitutional prohibition apply. Thus, in New York the Constitution declared that no person shall "be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself." Const. art. 1, § 6. And the act there questioned provided that every person offending against the statute should "be a competent witness against any other person so offending," and might be compelled to give evidence before any magistrate or grand jury, or in any court, in the same manner as other persons, "but the testimony so given shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against the person so testifying." Laws 1853, chap. 539, § 14. A similar provision was contained in chapter 446 of the Laws of 1857, in § 52. And upon this it was said: "The term 'criminal case,' used in the clause, must be allowed some meaning, and none can be conceived, other than a prosecution for a criminal offense. But it must be a prosecution against him, for what is forbidden is that he should be compelled to be a witness against himself. Now, if he be prosecuted criminally touching the matter about which he has testified upon the trial of another person, the statute makes it impossible that his testimony given on that occasion should be used by the prosecution on the trial. It cannot, therefore, be said that in such criminal case he has been made a witness against himself by force of any compulsion used towards him to procure in the other case testimony which cannot possibly be used in the criminal case against himself." And thereupon it was ruled that, as the witness Hackley was not a party defendant to the prosecution, he was compellable to testify before the grand jury. People ex rel. Hackley v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 74.

In Massachusetts, however, the provision of the Constitution was that no subject shall be "compelled to accuse or furnish evidence against himself." Const. pt. 1, art. 12. The statute bearing on that subject provided: "No person who is called as a witness before the joint special committee on the state police, shall be excused from answering any question or from the production of any paper relating to any corrupt practice or improper conduct of the state police, forming the subject of inquiry by such committee, on the ground that the answer to such question or the production of such paper may criminate or tend to criminate himself, or to disgrace him, or otherwise render him infamous, or on the ground of privilege; but the testimony of any witness examined before said committee upon the subject aforesaid or any statement made or paper produced by him upon such an examination, shall not be used as evidence against such witness in any civil or criminal proceeding in any court of justice." Stat. 1871, chap. 91. The witness Emery was brought before the joint special committee of the senate and house, and this interrogatory propounded to him: "Have you ever paid any money to any state constable, and do you know of any corrupt practice or improper conduct of the state police? If so, state fully what sums, and to whom you have thus paid money, and also what you know of such corrupt practice and improper conduct." To this he answered: "I decline to answer the . . . question, upon the grounds—First, that the answer thereto will accuse me of an indictable offense; second, that the answer thereto will furnish evidence against me by which I can be convicted of such an offense." For this refusal he was imprisoned. Being brought before Judge Wells on habeas corpus, the case was fully argued, and upon conference with the other judges of the supreme judicial court the opinion delivered by Judge Wells (Emery's Case, 107 Mass. 172, 9 Am. Rep. 22) met with the unanimous concurrence of all the judges. In that opinion it is said in regard to the question propounded: "It is apparent that an affirmative answer to the question put to him might tend to show that he had been guilty of an offense, either against the laws relating to the keeping and sale of intoxicating liquors, or under the statute for punishing one who shall corruptly attempt to influence an executive officer by the gift or offer of a bribe (Gen. Stat. chap. 163, § 7)." Regarding the clause quoted from the bill of rights, the opinion says: "By the narrowest construction, this prohibition extends to all investigations of an inquisitorial nature instituted for the purpose of discovering crime, or the perpetrators of crime, by putting suspected parties upon their examination in respect thereto in any manner, although not in the course of any pending prosecution. But it is not even thus limited. The principle applies equally to any compulsory disclosure of his guilt by the offender himself, whether sought directly as the object of the inquiry, or indirectly and incidentally for the purpose of establishing facts involved in an issue between other parties. If the disclosure thus made would be capable of being used against himself as a confession of crime, or an admission of facts tending to prove the commission of an offense by himself, in any prosecution then pending or that might be brought against him therefor, such disclosure would be an accusation of himself, within the meaning of the constitutional provision. In the absence of regulation by statute, the protection against such self-accusation is secured by according to the guilty person, when called upon to answer as witness or otherwise, the privilege of then avowing the liability and claiming the exemption, instead of compelling him to answer, and then excluding his admissions so obtained, when afterwards offered in evidence against him. This breach of the constitutional exemption corresponds with the common-law maxim, Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare, the interpretation and application of which has always been in accordance with what has been just stated." Referring to the expression "or furnish evidence against himself," the opinion says that this clause must be equally extensive in its application, and "in its interpretation may be presumed to be intended to add something to the significance of that which precedes. Aside from this consideration, and upon the language of the proposition standing by itself, it is a reasonable construction to hold that it protects a person from being compelled to disclose the circumstances of his offense, the sources from which or the means by which evidence of its commission, or of his connection with it, may be obtained or made effectual for his conviction without using his answers as direct admissions against him. For all practical purposes, such disclosures would have the effect to furnish evidence against the party making them. They might furnish the only means of discovering the names of those who could give evidence concerning the transaction, the instrument by which a crime was perpetrated, or even the corpus delicti itself. Both the reason upon which the rule is founded, and the terms in which it is expressed, forbid that it should be limited to confessions of guilt, or statements which may be proved in subsequent prosecutions as admissions of facts sought to be established therein." Proceeding, then, to consider the effect of the statute of Massachusetts already quoted, the opinion says: "It follows from the considerations already named that, so far as this statute requires a witness, who may be called, to answer questions and produce papers which may tend to criminate himself, and attempts to take from him the constitutional privilege in respect thereto, it must be entirely ineffectual for that purpose, unless it also relieves him from all liabilities for protection against which the privilege is secured to him by the Constitution. The statute does undertake to secure him against certain of those liabilities, to wit, the use of any disclosures he may make as admissions or direct evidence against him in any civil or criminal proceeding." Further on, the opinion, recurring to the constitutional provision then under consideration, says: "No one can be required to forego an appeal to its protection, unless first secured from future liability, and exposure to be prejudiced, in any criminal proceeding against him, as fully and extensively as he would be secured by availing himself of the privilege accorded by the Constitution. Under the interpretation already given, this cannot be accomplished so long as he remains liable to prosecution criminally for any matters or causes in respect of which he shall be examined, or to which his testimony shall relate. It is not done, in direct terms, by the statute in question. It is not contended that the statute is capable of an interpretation which will give it that effect; and it is clear that it cannot, and was not intended to, so operate. Failing, then, to furnish to the persons to be examined an exemption equivalent to that contained in the Constitution, or to remove the whole liability against which its provisions were intended to protect them, it fails to deprive them of the right to appeal to the privilege therein secured to them. The result is that, in appealing to his privilege as an exemption from the obligation to answer the inquiries put to him, the petitioner was in the exercise of his constitutional right; and his refusal to answer upon that ground was not, and could not be considered as, disorderly conduct, or a contempt of the authority of the body before which he was called to answer. There being no legal ground to authorize the commitment upon which he is held, he must be discharged therefrom." Emery's Case, 107 Mass. 172, 9 Am. Rep. 22.

In Virginia the bill of rights of the Constitution of 1870 contained a provision that had existed in that bill of rights ever since June 12, 1776,—that no man can "be compelled to give evidence against himself." Const. art. 1, § 10. And upon this the court of appeals said that it was the purpose of the framers of that clause "to declare, as part of the organic law, that no man should anywhere, before any tribunal, in any proceeding, be compelled to give evidence tending to criminate himself, either in that or any other proceeding," and that the provision could not be confined "only to cases in which a man is called on to give evidence himself in a prosecution pending against him." And thereupon it was ruled that the witness could not be compelled to answer before the grand jury what he knew of a certain duel, because, as he stated, the answer to the question would tend to criminate him. The act of the general assembly thus brought in question made provision as follows: "Every person who may have been the bearer of such challenge or acceptance, or otherwise engaged or concerned in any duel, may be required, in any prosecution against any person but himself, for having fought, or aided or abetted in such duel, to testify as a witness in such prosecution; but any statement made by such person, as such witness, shall not be used against him in any prosecution against himself." Acts 1869-70, chap. 355. The court held that the effect of the statute was to invade the constitutional right of the citizen, and to deprive the witness of his constitutional right to refuse to give evidence tending to criminate himself, without indemnity, and that the act was therefore, to that extent, unconstitutional and void. It held, further, that, before the constitutional privilege could be taken away by the legislature, there must be absolute indemnity provided; that nothing short of complete amnesty to the witness—an absolute wiping out of the offense as to him, so that he could no longer be prosecuted for it—would furnish that indemnity; that the statute in question did not furnish it, but only provided that the statement made by the witness should not be used against him in a prosecution against himself; that, without using one word of that statement, the attorney for the commonwealth might in many cases, and, in a case like that in hand, inevitably would, be led by the testimony of the witness to means and sources of information which might result in criminating the witness himself; and that this would be to deprive the witness of his privilege, without indemnity. And so the judgment of the hustings court, which ruled to the contrary, was reversed. Cullen v. Com. 24 Gratt. 624.

In New Hampshire the clause in the bill of rights is exactly like that of Massachusetts, above mentioned. And in the case of State v. Nowell, 58 N. H. 314, Nowell declined to answer about selling liquors as clerk, etc., when questioned by the grand jury, giving the usual reasons for his refusal. The statute in that case had this provision: "No clerk, servant, or agent of any person accused of a violation of this chapter, shall be excused from testifying against his principal, for the reason that he may thereby criminate himself; but no testimony so given by him shall, in any prosecution, be used as evidence, either directly or indirectly, against him, nor shall he be thereafter prosecuted for any offense so disclosed by him." Gen. Stat. chap. 99, § 20. The supreme court, having been moved for an attachment against the recalcitrant witness, said: "The common-law maxim (thus affirmed by the bill of rights) that no one shall be compelled to testify to his own criminality, has been understood to mean, not only that the subject shall not be compelled to disclose his guilt upon a trial of a criminal proceeding against himself, but also that he shall not be required to disclose, on the trial of issues between others, facts that can be used against him as admissions tending to prove his guilt of any crime or offense of which he may then or afterwards be charged, or the sources from which, or the means by which, evidence of its commission, or of his connection with it, may be obtained." But that court further held, in substance and effect, that inasmuch as the statute under review secured the witness against all liability to future prosecution as effectually as if he were wholly innocent, and relieved him from all liabilities on account of the matters which he was compelled to disclose, the witness therefore had, under the statute, all the protection that the common-law right, adopted by the bill of rights in its common-law sense, gave him, and that, if prosecuted, a plea that he had disclosed the same offense on a lawful accusation against his principal would be a perfect answer to the prosecution against himself, and that consequently he was compellable to testify, and liable to attachment should he fail to do so.

In Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 195, the court considered the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, heretofore set forth in connection with and reference to § 860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which is the following: "No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture," and, speaking through Mr. Justice Blatchford ruled: That the meaning of the constitutional provision is not merely that a person shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself, but its object is to insure that a person shall not be compelled, when acting as a witness in any investigation, to give testimony which may tend to show that he himself has committed a crime. The protection afforded by § 860 is not coextensive with the constitutional provision. As the manifest purpose of the constitutional provisions, both of the states and of the United States, is to prohibit the compelling of testimony of a self-criminating kind from a party or a witness, the liberal construction which must be placed on constitutional provisions for the protection of personal rights would seem to require that the constitutional guaranties, however differently worded, should have, as far as possible, the same interpretation. It is a reasonable construction of the constitutional provision that the witness is protected from being compelled to disclose the circumstances of his offense, or the sources from which or the means by which evidence of its commission, or of his connection with it, may be obtained or made effectual for his conviction without using his answers as direct admissions against him. No statute which leaves the party or witness subject to prosecution after he answers the criminating question put to him can have the effect of supplanting the privilege conferred by the Constitution. In view of the constitutional provision, a statutory enactment, to be valid, must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates. And so the petitioner, who had refused to answer an incriminating question in the lower court, was held entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus; § 860, aforesaid, not being regarded as broad in its power of protection as the amendment before referred to, and 57 L. R. A.

therefore constitutionally invalid. And the ruling in People ex rel. Hackley v. Kelly, 24 N. Y. 74, that the words "criminal case" mean only a criminal prosecution against the witness himself, was disproved.

Chief Justice Marshall, when engaged in the trial of Aaron Burr (1 Burr's Trial, 244), on the question whether the witness was privileged not to accuse himself, gave utterance to similar views, saying: "If the question be of such description that an answer to it may or may not criminate the witness, according to the purport of that answer, it must rest with himself, who alone can tell what it would be, to answer the question or not. If, in such a case, he say upon his oath that his answer would incriminate himself, the court can demand no other testimony of the fact. . . . According to their statement [the counsel for the United States], a witness can never refuse to answer any question unless that answer, unconnected with other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible, but a probable, case, that a witness by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom, he is safe; but draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description. What testimony may be possessed or is attainable against any individual, the court can never know. It would seem, then, that the court ought never to compel a witness to give an answer which discloses a fact that would form a necessary and essential part of a crime which is punishable by the laws." This ruling by the eminent chief justice was in 1807; the 5th Amendment, among others, having been ratified in 1791.

In the present instance § 2206 of our statutes, now under comment, must be regarded, under the authorities cited (except Kelly's Case, 24 N. Y. 74), and for the reasons therein given, as falling under the ban of § 23 of our bill of rights.

We therefore enter an order discharging the petitioner from custody.

All concur.

1. Where under the statutes a particular city is denominated "a territorial division of the state," treated as a county, and provided with a probate judge the same as other counties, he is a county officer within the meaning of constitutional provisions regulating the compensation of such officers.
2. The probate judge of one county cannot be given a salary and required to account for all fees received, while the judges of all other counties are permitted to retain the fees as their compensation, under a constitutional provision requiring the general assembly, by a law uniform in its operation, to provide for and regulate the fees of all county officers.
3. An amendment of a general law allowing fees to probate judges as compensation for their services, which declares that in all cities of a certain class such judges shall be compensated by a salary, violates a constitutional provision that the general assembly shall not indirectly enact a special or local law by the partial repeal of a general one.
4. A general law can be made applicable to the fixing of the compensation of probate judges throughout the state, so as to bring such legislation within the operation of a constitutional provision forbidding local or special legislation where a general law can be made applicable.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of defendants in an action brought to enforce plaintiff's right to the fees of his office as judge of the probate court. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of division No. 2, which was delivered by SHERWOOD, J., and was as follows:

1. This case had its origin in these circumstances: Section 34, article 6, of the Constitution of 1875, declares that "the general assembly shall establish in every county a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and consist of one judge who shall be elected," etc.; which section concludes with this proviso: "That until the general assembly shall provide by law for a uniform system of probate courts, the jurisdiction of probate courts heretofore established shall remain as now provided by law." Section 35, Id., still continues the thought of the uniformity of the organization of such courts. In 1877 the legislature (Laws of that year, p. 229), pursuant to the behests of the Constitution as contained in the above sections, established in every county in this state a probate court, and gave such courts uniformity of organization. Section 1 of the act just cited (which was approved April 9, 1877) provides that "a probate court, which shall be a court of record, and consist of one judge, is hereby established in the city of St. Louis, and in every county in this state;" thus treating the city of St. Louis as one of the counties of this state. The concluding section of the act repeals all inconsistent acts, and § 13 of the act provides that "the judge of probate shall receive such fees for his services as now are, or may hereafter be, allowed by law for probate business." The Constitution of 1875 went into effect, according to its terms, on the 30th day of November of that year. The scheme and charter affair took effect on the 22d day of October, 1876, and the legislative session of 1877 was the first held after the Constitution was adopted, and the first after the scheme and charter materialized; and consequently the act of 1877 aforesaid must be regarded as a contemporaneous construction of the meaning of § 34 for otherwise the city of St. Louis, unless treated as one of the counties of this state, would have been left without the pale and purview of § 34, and would not have been entitled to any probate court at all; but this would have balked the provisions of §§ 34 and 35, supra, by preventing the establishment of "a uniform system of probate courts." It was not known, of course, at the time the Constitution was framed, whether the scheme and charter would be adopted or not, but it would seem that a modicum of provision would have enabled the framers of the Constitution to have briefly provided for the contingency of the scheme and charter's adoption. But, as there was no provision, so there was no provision. Since the enactment referred to, and other similar ones, the city of St. Louis has been denominated "a territorial division of the state," and treated as a county. State ex rel. Monahan v. Walton, 69 Mo., loc. cit. 559, and subsequent cases. And in the rules laid down for construction of our statutes it is declared that "wherever the word 'county' is used in any law, general in its character to the whole state, the same shall include the city of St. Louis," etc. 1 Rev. Stat. 1899, §§ 41, 60. This has been the law since 1879. In the Revised Statutes of 1879, § 1186 is but a fac simile of § 13 of the law of 1877, quoted above, as to fees for the services of the probate judge. The same section continued the same when it became § 3407 in the revision of 1889. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 3407. But the legislature passed a statute approved March 20, 1897 (Laws of that year, p. 82), which is as follows:

An Act to Repeal Section 3407 of the Revised Statutes of 1889, and to Enact in Lieu Thereof a New Section, to be Known as Section 3407, Revised Statutes of 1889.
Sec. 1. That section 3407 of the Revised Statutes of 1889 be and the same is hereby repealed and the following new section enacted in lieu thereof, to read as follows:

"Sec. 3407. [The judge of probate shall receive such fees for his services as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law for probate business.] Provided, that in all cities which now have or may hereafter have a population of three hundred thousand inhabitants or more, the judge of probate shall receive such compensation as now is or may hereafter be provided by law to be paid to judges of the circuit courts in such cities out of the city treasury. Provided further, that this act shall not apply to any judge now in office."

This section is now § 1764, Rev. Stat. 1899, and the bracketed words show the section as originally enacted.

Simultaneously with the passage of section 3407, last aforesaid, a statute, approved also on March 20th (Laws 1897, pp. 82, 83), was enacted, which reads thus:

An Act Providing for the Election of an Officer to be Known as Probate Clerk in Cities Now Having or Which may Hereafter Have a Population of Three Hundred Thousand Inhabitants and Over, Defining His Qualifications and Duties, and Providing for the Collection of Probate Fees and Their Payment into the Treasury of Such Cities, and Authorizing the Municipal Assembly of Such Cities to Provide by Ordinance for the Payment of Such Clerks, and Their Deputies and Assistants, and the Orderly Transaction of Business.

Sec. 1. In all cities having or which may hereafter have a population of three hundred thousand inhabitants and over, there shall be elected at the general election in the year 1898, and every four years thereafter, an officer, to be known as the probate clerk, whose official term shall commence on the first day of January next after election. Said officer shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, make and subscribe an oath before the city register of such cities that he will support the Constitution of the United States and of the state of Missouri, and that he will faithfully discharge all the duties of the office of probate clerk; and shall also execute a bond to the city within which he shall be elected, in the penal sum of ten thousand dollars, with two or more solvent sureties, to be approved by the judge of probate of such cities, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of the probate clerk, the collection and accounting for all fees allowed the probate judge or probate court of the city within which he shall have been elected, which oath and bond shall be filed in the office of the city register of such cities. The city or any person injured may maintain suit on said bond in like manner as suit may now be maintained on other office bonds.

Sec. 2. In addition to the duty now required by law of the clerk of the probate court in such cities, it shall be the duty of such clerks to tax and collect all fees and taxable costs allowed by law to the probate judge and probate court and pay the same weekly into the treasury of such cities.

Sec. 4 (3). The municipal assembly in such cities is hereby authorized and empowered to provide by ordinance for the orderly transaction of business between such clerks and the treasurer of such cities, and for the payment of such clerks, deputies, and assistants.

Sec. 3 (4). All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The defendant C. William Koenig is the probate clerk of the city of St. Louis, elected under the act which has just been quoted. The plaintiff was elected judge of the probate court of the city of St. Louis in November, 1898, for a term of four years from the 1st day of January, 1899. He duly qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties, and since January 1, 1899, has been the incumbent of that office. This suit was instituted in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis to test the constitutionality of the act of the legislature approved March 20, 1897, taking from the judge of said court the fees allowed to probate judges under the general statutes, and requiring the same to be paid into the city treasury, and giving said judge a salary in lieu thereof.

The petition charges that defendant Koenig is collecting the fees allowed by the General Statutes to probate judges, and is about to pay the same to the treasurer of the city of St. Louis, under the acts above set out, which plaintiff alleges are unconstitutional and void. The prayer is that defendant be enjoined from paying such fees into the city treasury, and be required to account to the plaintiff for and pay the same over to him. Each of the defendants filed a separate demurrer to the petition, based on the ground that it stated no facts, etc. The trial court held that the statutes were valid, sustained the demurrers, and entered final judgment for defendants. From that judgment plaintiff has appealed.

Section 33 of article 6 of the Constitution of 1875 provides that "the judges of the supreme, appellate, and circuit courts, and of all other courts of record receiving a salary, shall, at stated times, receive such compensation for their services as is or may be prescribed by law; but it shall not be increased or diminished during the period for which they were elected." Section 12 of article 9 of that instrument commands that "the general assembly shall, by a law uniform in its operation, provide for and regulate the fees of all county officers, and for this purpose may classify the counties by population." And § 8 of article 14 of the same declares that "the compensation or fees of no state, county, or municipal officer shall be increased during his term of office." Placing these various sections of the Constitution thus in juxtaposition, we find that the salary of the judges of the supreme, appellate, and circuit courts, and of all other courts of record receiving a salary, can neither be increased nor diminished during their terms of office, and that the legislature is commanded to enact a law uniform in its operation, whereby is provided for and regulated the fees of all county officers; and to this end that body is to classify the counties by population. And, further, that neither compensation nor fees of a state, county, or municipal officer can be increased during his term of office. These sections, thus placed in contiguous contrast, draw a clear line of demarcation between those judicial officers who receive a salary for their compensation and those who, for similar services, receive fees. "Salary" is defined to be "a periodical allowance made as compensation to a person for his official or professional services or for his regular work." Stand. Dict. Salary is regarded as a per annum compensation. Bouvier, Law Dict. And to the like effect, see an exhaustive review of the subject in People ex rel. Van Valkenburg v. Myers, 25 Abb. N. C. 368, 11 N. Y. Supp. 217. The sections prohibit either increase or diminution in salary during duration of the judicial term of office; but where such office is a nonsalaried one, but compensated by fees, they only permit diminution of such fees. Upon this status of constitutional regulations arises this question: Is the judge of probate a county officer? That a sheriff is a county officer has twice been determined by this court. State ex rel. Holmes v. Dillon, 90 Mo. 229, 2 S. W. 417; State ex rel. Bender v. Spencer, 91 Mo. 206, 3 S. W. 410. In the former case it was said and ruled that the words "state officer," as used in the Constitution, were intended only to refer to such officers whose official duties and functions are coextensive with the boundaries of the state, and were never intended to include such officers as sheriffs, coroners, county justices, etc., whose functions are confined to their respective counties, and are commonly known as and called county officers; and that the Constitution recognizes a clear distinction between state, county, and township officers. And it has elsewhere been determined that the judge of a county court is a county officer. Moore v. State, 5 Sneed, 510; Saffron v. Ericson, 3 Coldw. 1. Besides, if the scheme and charter business had never been carried, the probate court would indubitably have remained a county office, and located in a county; and the mere fact that, after the Constitution was adopted, the scheme and charter was also adopted, did not in the least tend to alter the nature, vary the functions, or change the jurisdiction of the probate court then and theretofore located in the city of St. Louis. It still remained a county office, and its judge a county officer. This was evidently the contemporaneous construction placed upon the sections of the Constitution heretofore cited and quoted by the legislature which met in 1877, the first session after the Constitution and the scheme and charter had been adopted. They obeyed the Constitution by establishing a probate court in every county in the state and in the city of St. Louis, and gave that court the commanded uniformity of organization; and in the concluding section of the act they paved the way for obeying § 12 of article 9 of the Constitution by enacting that "the judge of probate shall receive such fees for his services as now are, or may hereafter be, allowed by law for probate business." At the revising session of 1879 the legislature more fully obeyed § 12 of article 9 of the Constitution by regulating the fees of probate judges, county judges, clerks of circuit courts, county clerks, common pleas courts, sheriffs, coroners, etc., and proceeded to classify by population the different counties of this state, and to regulate the amount of fees such clerks of courts of record should retain; but these were the only county officers the amounts of whose fees as allowed to be retained were thus specified and regulated according to population. Rev. Stat. 1879, §§ 5595 et seq. The law thus enacted has continued in force in substance ever since. Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 4980 et seq.; Rev. Stat. 1899, §§ 3236 et seq. As just seen, however, the various counties were not classified as to population as to the fees the various judges of probate were allowed to retain. If the judge of probate is to be regarded as a county officer,—and of this there would seem to be no room for doubt,—then the legislature's only proper course of procedure in regard to the fees of judges of probate was that marked out by § 12 of article 9 of the Constitution, by enacting "a law uniform in its operation," and thus "provide for and regulate" the fees of the judges of probate "and for this purpose classify the counties by population."

The Constitution has pointed out the precise and specific method by which county officers are to be paid, which is by fees; and if the legislature desires to classify counties by population, and thus proportion the amounts of fees the various judges of probate may retain according to such ratio, then this must be done by appropriate legislative enactment. It cannot be done by making one or more judges of probate salaried officers, and compel them to account for the fees they may receive, and leave the other judges of probate throughout the whole state unhampered by any such conditions; for this would not be "a law uniform in its operation," and therefore not a compliance with § 12 of article 9. In construing constitutions, the maxim, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, is equally as applicable as to statutory construction. Indeed, the maxim cited seems to be more rigidly applied and enforced when construing constitutions than when construing statutes, and this because the constitution framers are supposed more carefully to measure their words than ordinary legislators. Treating of this subject, Thompson, Ch. J., said: "The expression of one thing in the Constitution is necessarily the exclusion of things not expressed. This I regard as especially true of constitutional provisions declaratory in their nature. The remark of Lord Bacon, that, as exceptions strengthen the force of a general law, so enumeration weakens as to things not enumerated,' expresses a principle of common law applicable to the Constitution, which is always to be understood in its plain, untechnical sense. Com. v. Clark, 7 Watts & S. 127; Page v. Allen, 58 Pa. 338, 98 Am. Dec. 272.. On the same topic Judge Cooley observes: "If directions are given respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power shall be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only; and we impute to the people a want of due appreciation of the purpose and proper province of such an instrument when we infer that such directions are given to any other end; especially when, as has been already said, it is but fair to presume that the people in their Constitution have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, and with a view to leave as little as possible to implication." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 78, 79, 93, 94. Discussing the same subject, Denio, Ch. J., says with his accustomed force: "But the affirmative prescriptions and the general arrangements of the Constitution are far more fruitful of restraints upon the legislature. Every positive direction contains an implication against anything contrary to it, or which would frustrate or disappoint the purpose of that provision. The frame of the government, the grant of legislative power itself, the organization of the executive authority, the erection of the principal courts of justice, create implied limitations upon the lawmaking authority as strong as though a negative was expressed in each instance." People ex rel. Wood v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 544. See, to the same point, Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Graham, 147 Mo., loc. cit. 257, 48 S. W. 910; State v. Hill, 147 Mo. 63, 47 S. W. 798; Ex parte Arnold, 128 Mo. 256, 33 L. R. A. 386, 30 S. W. 768, 1036. For this reason all that portion of § 3407 aforesaid, contained in the proviso, must be held repugnant to § 12 of article 9 of the Constitution, and this ruling, of course, also brings under the ban of the Constitution the act passed on the same day providing for the election of a probate clerk in cities, etc.

2. The next question which propounds itself upon the record is whether the act of March 20, 1897, which takes from the judge of the probate court of the city of St. Louis such fees as are allowed all over the state to probate judges under the general statutes, and causes such fees to be paid into the city treasury, and provides for paying such judge out of the city treasury a salary in lieu thereof, violates that portion of § 53 of article 4 of the Constitution which declares: "Nor shall the general assembly indirectly enact such special or local law by the partial repeal of a general law." This paragraph or clause of § 53, art. 4, is the concluding one of that section, which begins by forbidding the general assembly from passing any local or special law respecting a variety of subjects, enumerating them, and finally adds to its prohibitions a clause (which immediately precedes the one under present consideration) by declaring: "In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, no local or special law shall be enacted; and whether a general law could have been made applicable in any case is hereby declared a judicial question, and as such shall be judicially determined, without regard to any legislative assertion on that subject." Under the comprehensive provisions last above quoted, no local or special law can be enacted where a general law can be made applicable; and, as if fearful of some legislative subterfuge which should evade these wholesome prohibitions, the framers of the Constitution gave additional emphasis and energy to their prohibitive idea by ordaining that paragraph which forms the basis of the present inquiry: "Nor shall the general assembly indirectly enact such special or local law by the partial repeal of a general law." Does the act in question do this? Section 3407, as it originally stood in the revision of 1889, provided that "the judge of probate shall receive such fees for his services as now are or may hereafter be allowed by law for probate business." This law, as it thus and then stood, applied to every judge of probate in the state of Missouri. And if the legislature then, without repealing in terms the statute just quoted, had enacted into a law the proviso § 1764 now contains, no one, it seems, could doubt that such additional enactment would have amounted to the partial repeal of a general law, and the consequent enactment of a special or local law; because, in such cases, the partial repugnancy would accomplish the partial repeal. Potter's Dwarrr. Stat. 113, 155, and cases cited; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 137, 138, and cases cited. But the case is in no wise altered by reason of the fact that such repeal was in reality accomplished by the pretended and formal amendment by enacting as a part and parcel of § 1764 the proviso aforesaid, which declares the old law intact save in the city of St. Louis, and save in regard to the then incumbent of the office of judge of probate in that city. If such legislation as this can be sustained, then there is neither force nor efficacy in the constitutional prohibition which forbids that the legislature "indirectly enact such special or local law by the partial repeal of a general law." The act in question is local as to the city of St. Louis, and special as to the incumbent of the office of judge of probate. An elaborate and exhaustive discussion of the subject of local or special laws is had by Corliss, Ch. J., of North Dakota, in Edmonds v. Herbrandson, reported in 2 N. D. 270, 14 L. R. A., loc. cit. 729, 730, 50 N. W. 970. After citing, quoting from, and discussing numerous authorities, the chief justice quotes from Davis v. Clark, 106 Pa. 384, where the court said: "It was not then a general act applicable to every part of the commonwealth. It did apply to a great number of counties, but there is no dividing line between a local and a general statute. It must be one or the other. If it apply to the whole state, it is general. If to a part only, it is local. As a legal principle, it is as effectually local when it applies to sixty-five counties out of the sixty-seven as if it applied to one county only. The exclusion of a single county from the operation of the act makes it local." Having made this quotation, and citing to the same effect State, Haines, Prosecutor, v. Mullica Twp. 51 N. J. L. 412, 17 Atl. 941, the learned judge proceeds: "The case of People ex rel. Clauson v. Newburg & S. Pl. Road Co. 86 N. Y. 1, is cited as holding a contrary doctrine. We do not so construe that decision. But we would have no hesitation in declaring that doctrine unsound if it adjudged an act to be not special, so far as the constitutional inhibition against special legislation is concerned, because it related to all except two counties in the state, where there was no reason for classification. If an act is not special because it relates to all except a single county in a state, without any reason for the classification, then the legislature can accomplish indirectly what is beyond their power to bring about by direct steps. Whenever it is desired to introduce a new rule as to a single county, a general law can be passed establishing that rule in all the counties, and then another law can be enacted re-establishing the old rule in all counties except the one singled out to be governed by the new rule. The first law would be clearly general, and under what it is claimed is the New York doctrine the second act could not be assailed as special legislation. This would, indeed, be an ingenious mode of neutralizing the constitutional prohibition against special legislation. We would not give it our sanction, however it might be buttressed by authority." The legislature in the case at bar would seem to have pursued substantially the same course as that just above indicated. They first pass a general law, which declares that "the judge of probate shall receive such fees for his services as now are or may hereafter be allowed by law for probate business." Then after that law had been in operation for twenty years it occurred to the legislature to repeal that section and immediately re-enact it, coupled with a proviso that makes that general law applicable to every probate court in the state, except in the city of St. Louis; the only city in the state that can, under the Constitution, have a probate court. It is true that as to mere form this act is not the partial repeal of a general law; but, in reality, that it is such partial repeal, who can doubt? In such cases courts will look at the true drift, meaning, and purpose of the litigated act, and will not permit themselves to be misled or deceived by subterfuging schemes and diaphanous disguises. Dunne v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 131 Mo. loc. cit. 5, 32 S. W. 641. The mere form an act is made to assume will not determine its constitutional character. That will be determined by its operation. State ex rel. Harris v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 340; State v.

Julow, 129 Mo. 163, 29 L. R. A. 257, 31 S. W. 781. And before concluding this paragraph it is well enough to cite some additional instances apropos previous remarks and citations. Thus, in California, it has been ruled that a statute of that state relating only to one county therein was a special law. Earle v. San Francisco Bd. of Edu. 55 Cal. 489. In People ex rel. Lee v. Chautauqua County, 43 N. Y. 10, 21, it is said: "It must be held, then, from the authorities, also, that an act is local, within the meaning of the Constitution, which in its subjects relates but to a portion of the people of the state, or to their property; and may not, either in its subject, operation, or immediate and necessary results, affect the people of the state, or their property, in general." And in Ohio it has been decided that "the amount of compensation to be attached to a local office is a question in its nature local." Cricket v. State, 18 Ohio St. 22; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. First Judicial Dist. C. P. Ct. Judges, 21 Ohio St. 11. In Illinois it has been held that "a statute which, by its terms, can have application to but one county in the state, although purporting to be a general law applicable to all counties having a certain population, is special legislation." Devine v. Cook County, 84 Ill. 590. And a ruling has been made that "a law is local when, instead of relating to and being binding upon all persons, corporations, or institutions to which it may be applicable, within the entire territorial jurisdiction of the lawmaking power, it is limited in its operation to certain districts of such territory, or to certain individual persons or corporations." Kerrigan v. Force, 68 N. Y. 381. And an act relating to the fees of a sheriff of a single county has been ruled a local act. Gaskin v. Meek, 42 N. Y. 186. And where a statute fixes the compensation of an officer in a particular locality upon a basis entirely different from that of all other persons filling like offices in the state, it is held not a general law, but comes within the constitutional prohibition against special legislation. Gibbs v. Morgan, 39 N. J. Eq. 126; Com. v. McMichael, 8 Pa. Dist. R. 157. It should, therefore, be ruled that the act in question is invalid because it is the partial repeal of a general law, and local as well as special.

3. The next proposition requiring discussion is that involved in that prohibitory provision of the Constitution heretofore quoted that "in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable no local or special law shall be enacted, and whether a general law could have been made applicable in any case is hereby declared a judicial question, and as such shall be judicially determined, without regard to any legislative assertion on that subject." Section 53, art. 4, Const. In this instance could a general law have been made applicable? The Constitution makes the determination of this question a judicial one. But counsel for defendant city admit that a general law could have been made applicable. The admission, however, is wholly superfluous, since it is very plain that such a law could have been made applicable; and the best of evidence of this fact is furnished by the general law already quoted, which stood on our statute books for twenty years, relating to every probate judge in the state. State ex rel. Keenan v. Milwaukee County, 25 Wis. 339; State ex rel. Peck v. Riordan, 24 Wis. 484; State ex rel. Walsh v. Dousman, 28 Wis. 541. This court has constantly upheld the prohibition of the Constitution now under consideration, and, obeying its behests, has condemned as local or special all legislation where a general law could have been made applicable. State v. Granneman, 132 Mo. loc. cit. 331, 33 S. W. 784; State v. Gritzner, 134 Mo. loc. cit. 529, 36 S. W. 39; State v. Walsh, 136 Mo. loc. cit. 407, 35 L. R. A. 231, 37 S. W. 1112; State v. Hill, 147 Mo. loc. cit. 67, 47 S. W. 798.

4. But the assertion is made that cases have been decided by this court where local or special legislation—that is to say, legislation applicable alone to the city of St. Louis or alone to Kansas City—has been held valid. This is true, but in the decisions in none of those cases was there any expression or ruling which impinged in the slightest degree on the constitutional prohibition against a local or special law being enacted where a general law could have been made applicable. On the contrary, either distinct, or else implied, recognition is constantly given to the idea that, owing to the circumstances and exigencies of the particular case, a general law could not have been made applicable, or else it could not have been made applicable by reason of the fact that the legislation questioned was the result of direct obedience to some specific command of the Constitution. This statement will be found to embrace all the cases decided on this subject. The various decisions on this matter have been very well collated, summarized, and analyzed in the brief of counsel, to which we refer. In this case, however, there is no command of the Constitution requiring the general assembly to regulate respecting the compensation to be awarded the judge of probate of the city of St. Louis. Nor is there any exigency requiring such legislation, and confining its operation, as does the act in question, to the city of St. Louis alone. There are cases where this court has said an act would have been valid applied to St. Louis by name, but this court has never said this of an act where a general law could have been made applicable, but only in cases where it could not. The various commands of the Constitution do not clash with each other. A local or special law can be passed by the legislature, but this cannot be done if the same object can be attained by a general law; and as to whether this can be done is always a judicial question, in investigating which legislative assertion goes for nothing. In other words, and stating the point more briefly, the power to enact a local or special law is altogether exceptional and conditional. If the condition exists, to wit, the inability to make a general law applicable, then the power exists to enact a local or special law. The condition is the basis of the power; absent the condition, absent the power.

The premisses considered, we hold the petition sufficient, and accordingly reverse the judgment, and remand the cause, with directions to the lower court to proceed in conformity with the views herein expressed. All concur.

Measre. W. M. Williams, Morton Jourdan, and Adiel Sherwood, for appellant:

The act of March 20, 1897, offends the organic law in this, that it is a "local law" "indirectly" enacted "by the partial repeal of a general law."

Mo. Const. § 53, art. 4; State v. Buchardt, 144 Mo. 84, 46 S. W. 150; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 482; State v. Hill, 147 Mo. 63, 47 S. W. 798; Holden v. James, 11 Mass. 396, 6 Am. Dec. 174; Lewis v. Webb, 3 Me. 326; Wally v. Kennedy, 2 Yerg. 554, 24 Am. Dec. 511; Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 388, 1 L. ed. 649; Piquet, Appellant, 5 Pick. 65; Durham v. Lewiston, 4 Me. 140; Budd v. State, 3 Humph. 483, 39 Am. Dec. 189; Officer v. Young, 5 Yerg. 320, 26 Am. Dec. 268; Vanzant v. Waddel, 2 Yerg. 200; Daly v. State, 13 Lea, 231; Woodard v. Brien, 14 Lea, 523; Hatcher v. State, 12 Lea, 368.

Will this court permit a plain constitutional provision to be disregarded by a mere mumble of words showing a form of repeal, and then the re-enactment of the law pretendedly repealed with an exception which shows the real purpose of the performance?

Dunne v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 131 Mo. 5, 32 S. W. 641; State ex rel. Harris v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 340; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Miller, 100 Mo. 451, 13 S. W. 677; State ex inf. Mytton v. Borden, 164 Mo. 221, 64 S. W. 172.

The act of March 20, 1897, violates § 53, art. 4, Mo. Constitution, in this, that it is a law local with respect to the city of St. Louis, and special with respect to the judge of probate in said city.

Statutes which are restricted in their application to one or more counties or cities, with no provision by which those subsequently attaining the specified number of inhabitants might enjoy the benefits or powers conferred by the act, have been held to fall under the prohibition.

A statute made applicable to the city of St. Louis by name may be valid.

There must be some reason growing out of the nature of the regulation, for putting the city of St. Louis in a class by itself. Special acts regulating the practice and proceeding in certain courts in said city and elsewhere, where the same matter could be governed by general laws, have been held invalid.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Vermont
v.

F. D. CADIGAN.

(78 Vt. 245.)

1. A statute requiring partnerships organized under the laws of other states to furnish bonds before doing business in the state will not be construed as applicable to individual nonresidents in determining its constitutionality.
2. The mere organization of a partnership under the laws of another state is not sufficient to justify the imposition of conditions upon its doing business within the state not required of local partnerships.
3. A statute imposing a penalty on agents transacting business within the state for foreign partnerships which have not complied with conditions not required of local partnerships discriminates against such agents in favor of those of local firms so as to be void under the Federal Constitution and those provisions of a state Constitution protecting equal rights and privileges.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Windsor County Court in a proceeding against him for violation of the statutes against acting as agent for an unlicensed foreign partnership which resulted in his conviction. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to infringement of the constitutional immunities and privileges of citizens, see note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 579. 57 L. R. A.

Messrs. Dillingham, Huse, & Howland, for defendant:

The law violated discriminates against nonresidents.

No law, whether accidentally or designedly phrased, can accomplish by indirection the violation of a constitutional prohibition. "The court will look at the substance of the legislation, irrespective of its form or pretense."

The law violated deprives citizens of other states of the privileges and immunities of citizens in Vermont.

The purpose of § 2, art. 4, U. S. Const., was to declare to the several states that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other states within your jurisdiction.

The extent of the discrimination is not important, and the only question is, Does it exist?

Stafford, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Cadigan is informed against for acting as agent of a partnership organized under the laws of the state of New York, in selling certain municipal bonds here, without said partnership having complied with the statute of this state requiring firms organized under the laws of other states to procure a license from the inspector of finance, to file a bond with him, and to submit to his examination, before conducting such business here. The case was heard below on demurrer to the information, which was held sufficient. The decision depends upon the constitutionality of sections of chapter 175 of the Vermont Statutes, entitled "Loan and Investment Companies," which may be summarized as follows: The 1st section declares that every corporation organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of selling its own choses in action, or of selling, guaranteeing, or negotiating those of other persons or corporations, as investments or as a business, shall be under the supervision of the inspector of finance. Vt. Stat. § 4132. Then follow sections under the division title "Foreign Corporations," but in all these, when the word "corporation" is used, it is supplemented by the words "company or firm;" the phrase, in full, being, "such corporation, company, or firm organized under the laws of another state." No person, it is declared, shall act in this state as agent or representative of such corporation, company, or firm, or sell, offer for sale, or negotiate choses in action owned, issued, negotiated, or guaranteed by it, unless such corporation, company, or firm has filed with the inspector of finance a bond to the state for such an amount as he requires, not more than $10,000 and not less than $500, with such sureties or security as he may approve, conditioned for the making of such returns as may be required, and the payment of all taxes that may be assessed against it, and in all things to comply with the laws of this state, and has submitted itself and its financial condition to an examination by the inspector in such manner as to enable him to make a report thereof, as specified in this chapter, "in case of like corporations in this state." Vt. Stat. § 4133. The inspector is required to notify the state's attorney of violations of this chapter, and such are made punishable by a fine of not less than $50, nor more than $1,000. Vt. Stat. § 4134. When it appears to the inspector that such corporation, company, or firm is conducting its affairs in a safe and authorized manner, and has filed the required bond, he shall issue to it a license good until the 1st day of the next January; and, within thirty days of the date of its license, it shall file in his office its certificate stating the names and addresses of all who are to act as its agents in this state, which certificate shall be amended by it in case of any change. Vt. Stat. § 4135. Before it can do business here, it must make the inspector its attorney, upon whom process may be served. Vt. Stat. § 4136. It shall file semiannual reports, under penalty of having its license revoked. Vt. Stat. § 4138. If it conducts its business in an unsafe or unauthorized manner, the inspector shall direct it to desist, and to at once provide for the safety and security of all such business transactions. Vt. Stat. § 4139. If it fails to comply with such order, or to report when requested, or if it appears to the inspector that it is unsafe or inexpedient for it to continue business, he shall revoke its license. Vt. Stat. § 4140. All services and expenses under this chapter shall be approved by the state auditor, and paid by the licensees upon an equitable apportionment to be made by the inspector. Vt. Stat. § 4142.

The respondent, by demurring, admits that he did the thing prohibited by the statute, for no question is raised as to the form or sufficiency of the information, except as hereinafter stated; but he says it was no offense, because he was acting as agent for citizens of New York, who, as such, were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of Vermont; that citizens of Vermont might lawfully do, by themselves or agent, all that he did in behalf of his principals; consequently it was lawful for him to do the same. The statute is thus challenged as in contravention of U. S. Const. art. 4, § 2: "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." It is not claimed that the citizenship of the respondent is of any materiality, under the statute, but that the citizenship of his principals is material; that the statute is aimed at firms whose members are residents of other states; and that it requires of such firms what it does not require of resident firms. It will be observed that the statute itself says nothing about citizenship or residence. The test is whether the firm was "organized under the laws of another state." It is alleged that the respondent's firm was organized under the laws of New York, but its members may all be citizens of Vermont. On the other hand, if a firm is organized under the laws of Vermont, it is exempt from these requirements, even though all of its members resided in New York. So, looking at the letter only, there is no distinction between citizens of Vermont and citizens of other states. But the respondent, while taking note of this literal reading, says that the law should be tested by its intent and effect, both of which, he thinks, show clearly that it does discriminate against nonresidents. In the first place, he says, the mere fact that a common-law partnership,—and the respondent's firm is not alleged to be anything more,—was organized in some other state, instead of in Vermont, could afford no rational basis for a distinction. It would be no protection for citizens of this state that citizens of other states came here, upon our soil, merely to make their contract of partnership, and then returned to their own states. Nor would the people of Vermont be deprived of any protection by the fact that residents of this state, doing business here, had entered into their partnership under the laws of New York. So, he says, we must look deeper to find the real intent, and that it is made plain by three special provisions of the chapter itself: (1) The requirement that a bond shall be given to secure the payment of taxes, indicating that the members are not within reach, like residents; (2) the requirement that such firms make report as required of "like corporations in this state;" and (3) the condition that they appoint the inspector of finance their attorney, upon whom process may be served,—a thing unnecessary in the case of residents. Moreover, it is said, while there might be such cases as those just now supposed,—citizens of Vermont organizing firms in some other state, and vice versa,—they would be very exceptional, and, in the great majority of instances, firms organized under the laws of Vermont would be composed of residents of Vermont, while firms organized under the laws of other states would be composed of residents of such other states. There is some force in these contentions, and, indeed, it is freely conceded by the state's attorney that the act was intended to, and does, operate against nonresidents, really discriminating against firms whose members are not residents of Vermont; and such discrimination is defended as a fair exercise of the police power. Thus, we see, the respondent treats the statute as discriminating against nonresidents, in order to find a basis for his contention that it contravenes the Federal Constitution in the respect referred to; and the state treats it as discriminating against nonresidents, in order to find a basis for its contention that it is a police regulation for the protection of the people of Vermont against strangers. But we are unable to adopt this construction. The statute itself takes no account of residence. In the very case before us the respondent's principals may be residents of Vermont. The respondent's neighbor, engaged in the same business, may be acting for a firm organized under the laws of this state, every one of whose members may be a resident and citizen of some other state. The test of the respondent's action is whether his principals formed their partnership under the laws of Vermont. If they did, his act was lawful. If they did not, it was unlawful. To the argument that the legislature intended to exclude firms whose members were nonresidents, it is a sufficient answer that, if that is what the legislature meant, that is what the legislature should have said.

The question then arises whether the test laid down is a valid one. Does the bare fact that the partnership was formed under the laws of this state, rather than of some other, afford a rational basis for distinction in determining the lawfulness of its agent's act in doing business for it here? Is the fact that it is organized here any protection to the people of this state? Does the fact that it was organized elsewhere lessen their protection? It is difficult to see how. The laws of Vermont make no requirement of firms organized here to transact this kind of business. The provisions upon that subject relate only to corporations. The agent of a firm organized under the laws of Vermont might lawfully do all that the respondent did. The agent of individuals residing in Vermont, or anywhere else, might lawfully do all that he did. But if such individuals had agreed to act as partners, instead of separately, and made that contract in some other jurisdiction, their agent could not act for them here without committing a crime. The formation of the partnership would not relieve them from individual liability to creditors, nor make the firm a distinct legal entity, like a corporation; yet it would make it a crime for the agent to do for them jointly what he might lawfully have done for them severally. How can it be held either that the statute is invalid as denying to nonresidents the privilege accorded to residents, as the respondent claims, or that it is valid as a police regulation against nonresidents for the protection of the people of Vermont, as the state claims, when, for anything that is alleged in this information, or anything that need be alleged or proved under the statute, all the parties concerned may be residents of Vermont? But suppose them to be resident here; can Vermont thus discriminate between her own people, denying to a class the privilege of transacting business upon such a ground as this? Not if the ground of classification is purely arbitrary and irrational. No state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U. S. Const.

Amendment 14, § 1. To deprive one of the right to labor and transact business is to deprive him of his liberty, and also of his property. To hedge the privilege about with conditions and exactions for one class which do not exist for others is to deny to the former the equal protection of the laws; and when the classification is based upon a distinction wholly fanciful or arbitrary, having no possible reasonable connection with any proper purpose to be served by the enactment, it is unconstitutional and void. The equal protection of the laws means "the protection of equal laws." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 369, 30 L. ed. 220, 226, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064. Our own bill of rights, in its 1st article, declares "that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent and unalienable rights, amongst which are, enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety;" and in its 4th article, that "every person within this state ought to find a certain remedy, by having recourse to the laws, for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property, or character . . . conformably to the laws;" and in its 7th article, that the "government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, . . . and not for the particular emolument or advantage of any single man, family, or set of men, who are a part only of that community." These are the fundamental principles, not of our state, only, but of Anglo-Saxon government itself, enlarging upon the axiom that when the facts are the same the law is the same, and inspired by the ideal of justice, that the law is no respecter of persons. The law touching classification for purposes of taxation, and what may furnish a reasonable basis therefor, was carefully examined by this court in State v. Hoyt, 71 Vt. 59, 42 Atl. 973; and the rule there recognized, which is none the less applicable here, will be found to determine the question before us.

The result is that chapter 175 of the Vermont Statutes discriminates between agents of firms organized under the laws of this state and agents of firms organized under the laws of other states, making the act of the latter unlawful, while the act of the former in the same circumstances would be lawful, and therein contravenes the 1st clause of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, as well as various provisions of our own bill of rights, securing to all the equal protection of the laws, and must therefore be held, to that extent, unconstitutional and void.

Judgment reversed; demurrer sustained; information adjudged insufficient and quashed; the respondent discharged and let go without day.

- *1. It is a general rule of law in force in this state that, in the absence of a contract giving him the right so to do, the tenant cannot lawfully remove fixtures annexed to the freehold, which he has placed on leased land. The exception to this rule exists only in the case of trade fixtures. (a) Section 3120 of the Civil Code is construed to refer to trade fixtures. (b) The fixtures sought to be removed in the present case were not trade fixtures.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Glynn County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to restrain the removal of certain fixtures. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Owens Johnson and D. W. Krauss, for plaintiff in error:

The servant's house, the rainwater gutters, and the water piping were permanent fixtures and immovable.

Tyler, Fixtures, p. 455; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 655.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James B. Wright filed an equitable proceeding in the superior court of Glynn county against John E. Du Bignon, in which he sought to restrain the defendant from removing certain fixtures placed by him on a lot of land which was owned by the plaintiff. It was alleged that the fixtures which the defendant sought to remove were permanent, and such as were attached to the freehold. The defendant, in his answer, admitted that it was his purpose to remove the fixtures, and insisted that he had a right to do so, because he had rented the lot from the plaintiff for a term of years, and the fixtures were in the nature of conveniences to the house which he proposed to occupy as a dwelling for himself and family, and they had been erected by him with the intention of removing them at the expiration of his term, and plaintiff had consented that he should remove them at that time. The case was submitted to a jury, and, while the evidence was in some respects directly conflicting, that of the plaintiff tended to show that he was the owner of the land, and rented it to the defendant for a term of three years; that the defendant desired to have certain improvements done on the house, to which the plaintiff agreed, and gave him a check for $100; that, in addition to certain repairs placed on the interior of the house, the defendant erected a servant's room, attached to the main body of the dwelling, attached to the roof certain galvanized iron gutters as receptacles for rain water, laid under the ground iron pipes for the purpose of conducting water and maintaining a fountain, made a cement walk, and other improvements; that there was no agreement, expressed or implied, between the defendant and himself, that these fixtures should be removed by defendant at the expiration of his term of lease, and that their removal would be an injury to the freehold. On the contrary, the evidence for the defendant tended to show, in relation to the improvements and fixtures which were constructed, that the plaintiff sent defendant a check for $100 to have certain repairs made and work done in the interior of the house, but declined, on defendant's application, to put up a servant's room in the yard, and defendant then told the plaintiff that, if he would not build the servant's house, as he (defendant) was compelled to have one, he would do so himself, which he did; that the repairs on the inside of the house cost very much more than the $100 furnished by plaintiff; that he paid on the erection and furnishing of this servant's room more than $100; that he paid $18 to have gutters put to the house, and something like $75 for putting in a fountain and cement walk, and for plumbing, water spigots, etc. These payments were met from defendant's funds, and the work was necessary for his comfort and convenience in occupying the house. He caused these improvements to be made with the intention of removing them at the expiration of his lease, and in having the work done he had directed it to be constructed with this end in view. Defendant also admitted that, in addition to the removal of the servant's house, etc., which he alleged could be done without injury to the property, it was his purpose to remove the flowers which the lady members of his family had planted and cared for. There was much evidence introduced by the respective parties, but the above brief outline is, in view of the application of the legal principle which we think controls the case, sufficient for the purposes of this decision. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, giving him the privilege of removing from the premises the servant's house, the gutters, and the water pipes, and requiring him to deposit the sum of $50 with the court to cover the expense of repairs necessary to put the house in as good condition as it was before; and a decree was entered accordingly.

The plaintiff submitted a motion for a new trial on a number of grounds. Inasmuch, however, as the sole question involved in the case relates to the right of a tenant to remove from a dwelling house fixtures of the character indicated which he had placed thereon, and for which he had paid with the intention of removing them, it is unnecessary to consider and pass upon the grounds of the motion seriatim, but we will address ourselves to a consideration of the question of the right of the tenant so to remove. It will be noted, from the statement of the case made above, that the answer of the defendant sets up, among other alleged facts, that the plaintiff had agreed with him that he should have the right to remove the improvements or fixtures at the termination of his lease. We have diligently searched the brief of evidence to ascertain whether this averment in the petition was supported by the evidence of any witness who testified in the case; for, if that fact had been established, it would have materially altered the disposition of the case under well-defined rules of law. Our examination, however, fails to disclose the existence of any such evidence in the record, and the only question which we have to consider is the legal right of a tenant to remove fixtures of the character indicated in this case from the rented premises, in the absence of a contract allowing him so to do. No point is made that the removal contemplated by the defendant was out of time, as the existing status in that respect was preserved between the parties by a written agreement.

1. By Civil Code, § 3049, it is declared that "anything intended to remain permanently in its place, though not actually attached to the land, such as a rail fence, is a part of the realty and passes with it." Section 3119 of the same Code declares that the tenant "cannot cut or destroy growing trees, remove permanent fixtures, or otherwise injure the property." In defining "realty" the Civil Code (§ 3045) declares that real estate includes all lands and the buildings thereon, and all things permanently attached to either. So it is unnecessary to go beyond the terms of our statute law to ascertain what are fixtures, or to find an authority declaring that they are a part of the land, and may not be removed by a tenant. Our Code is in entire harmony with the common law on this subject, one of the rules of which is, "Fixtures annexed to the freehold are prima facie the property of the owner of the soil." It is, however, insisted on the part of the defendant in error that the ancient rule, which restricted the right of a tenant as to the removal of improvements in the nature of fixtures made on the leased premises, has been mitigated, and its harshness practically destroyed; that the law is now being more liberally interpreted in favor of the rights of the tenant to remove improvements and fixtures made by him for his own convenience than it formerly was. To support these propositions, and as authority for his contention that the defendant had the right to remove the fixtures which are the subject-matter of the case in hand, counsel cites Civil Code, § 3120, which declares: "A tenant during the term or a continuance thereof, or while he is in possession under the landlord, may remove fixtures erected by him. After the term and possession are ended, they are regarded as abandoned to the use of the landlord, and become the latter's property." Apparently there is a conflict between the rule of law laid down in this section and that which is found in § 3119, above quoted. If we take the words of § 3120 literally, they seem to support the contention made by the defendant. However, the conflict is more apparent than real. The section last cited is not an enactment of our legislature, nor is it the rule of the common law as it stands stated, but it was codified from a decision of this court in the case of Youngblood v. Eubank, 68 Ga. 630. This does not make it any the less the law. But under the rule of construction, which is not only fair and reasonable, but which has been uniformly followed by this court, we are at liberty, in order to ascertain the meaning of the section, to refer to the case from which it was codified, and interpret it in the light of the decision there rendered. Calhoun v. Little, 106 Ga. 336, 43 L. R. A. 630, 32 S. E. 86. It may be remarked, however, that, while the words contained in this section were taken from the first headnote in Youngblood v. Eubank, 68 Ga. 630, it will be found on examination that the headnote was prepared by the reporter, and not by the court, and that the principle announced in the headnote is not supported by the decision which was rendered. The facts upon which that decision was predicated show that the fixtures which were sought to be removed were temporary shanties, shelters, pens, stock lots, etc., which had been placed on the leased premises by a tenant who was engaged in the sawmill business, and the structures had been erected for his use and convenience in such business; and the entire decision deals with a class of fixtures known as "trade fixtures," and does not undertake to explain the law relating to any other kind of fixtures. Mr. Justice Speer, in the course of the opinion there rendered by him, uses this language: "The custom set up by the evidence is in accord with the common-law rule as to the rights of tenants to remove fixtures made or erected by them." He then quotes the rule of the common law, above set out, that "fixtures annexed to the freehold are prima facie the property of the owner of the soil." After stating this proposition, he further says: "In aid of the tenant, however, and in favor of trade, an exception is ingrafted upon that rule, enabling him to sever the fixtures made by him, and so regain his property in them." The point in the case just cited was really not the right of the tenant to remove fixtures, but the time in which he might remove trade fixtures, and the opinion as a whole was directed to this point, and the extracts quoted above are the only authority for the statement contained in the headnote, which is embodied in Civil Code, § 3120. Being so, it is clear, beyond question, that the fixtures which it was ruled might be removed by a tenant were only those which come under the definition of trade fixtures. So that, in interpreting this section of the Code, we have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the section must be construed to refer only to trade fixtures. So interpreting it, it is in entire harmony with other sections of the Code first above quoted. Not only so, but we are also in entire harmony with the great current of adjudicated cases, as well as the conclusions of all modern text writers on this subject. Chief Justice Holt once ruled that trade fixtures might be removed by the tenant during his term, not by virtue of any special custom, but by the common law in favor of trade and to encourage industry. Mr. Taylor, in his treatise on Landlord and Tenant (vol. 2, § 545), says: "As regards trade fixtures, it may be stated, in general terms, that a tenant may take away whatever he erects for the purpose of carrying on trade, whether it be machinery or buildings, even though affixed to the soil or freehold." To the same effect, see Ewell, Fixtures, 84, 89, 91. Under the principle above stated it has been ruled that a tenant who was a soap-boiler, and who, for the convenience of his trade, put up vats and copper tables upon the demised premises, might remove them during his term. Similar adjudications have been made as to a baker's oven; salt pans; carding machines; steam engines and boilers; cider mills; furnaces; ice houses; platform scales; copper stills; counters or counting rooms nailed to the floor; heavy machinery, such as a trip hammer, forge blower, or the like. And there can now be no doubt that the ancient rule in relation to fixtures has been so modified as to trade fixtures that a tenant may remove such from the leased premises during his term. For a very full discussion of the doctrine of trade fixtures, see the opinion of Mr. Justice Cobb in the case of Charleston & W. O. R. Co. v. Hughes, 105 Ga. 23, 24, 30 S. E. 972. The defendant, however, can gain nothing under this view of the law, because the fixtures which he sought to remove were permanent in character, and it was not claimed that they came under the definition of trade fixtures.

2. Nor do we think that the fixtures which the defendant claimed the right to remove come in that class known as "domestic or ornamental fixtures," and which, under certain circumstances, a tenant has the right to remove during his term. Mr. Taylor, in his work above cited (§ 547), says: "Domestic fixtures are all such articles as a tenant attaches to a dwelling house in order to render his occupation more comfortable or convenient, and may be separated from it without doing substantial injury,—such as furnaces, stoves, cupboards, and shelves, bells, bell pulls, gas fixtures, etc.; or things merely ornamental,—as painted wainscots, pier and chimney glasses, although attached to the walls with screws, marble chimney pieces, grates, beds nailed to the walls, window blinds, and curtains. All these articles, whether useful or ornamental, are, in a manner, necessary to the tenant's domestic comfort; and, being easily severed from the house, are capable of being equally useful to him in any other house he may occupy, and therefore he may remove them. But things which he attaches to the house in a more permanent manner, in order to complete it, such as hearthstones, doors and windows, closets, presses, locks and keys, he cannot take away, because such things are peculiarly adapted to the house in which they are fixed, and, if taken away, are injurious to the freehold. All substantial additions made to the house also become a part of the freehold, and are immovable, such as conservatories, green-houses, hothouses, pig sties, stables, wash houses, and other outhouses. Neither can the tenant remove shrubbery,—flowers planted by him in the garden." The propositions thus enunciated are well supported by adjudicated cases from courts of high repute, and are in line with text writers upon this subject. Thus we see that such fixtures as are attached to the realty in a permanent manner so as to become substantial additions, although erected by the tenant, and for his convenience, attach to and become a part of the realty, and cannot be removed by him as domestic fixtures. It is, however, claimed that at the time of the erection of the fixtures which the defendant in error asserted a right to remove he intended to remove them at the expiration of his term, and that, having been erected with such intention, his right to remove them is preserved. This proposition is not a sound one. The right to remove such fixtures is denied him by the law; and, no matter what his intention might have been at the time he erected them, such intention, in the absence of a contract with the owner of the land, would not avail to give him the right of removal. Mr. Ewell, in his work above cited, on page 41, says: "In order to give effect to the intention of a party not to make an erection a permanent accession to the realty, the person making the improvement must have the right to determine whether or not the erection shall become a part of the realty; and if, as between himself and the owner of the soil, he has no right to erect the same as property separate and distinct from the freehold, an intention to do so, no matter how clearly manifested, is of no avail." It would therefore seem that the intention which the law considers is not the secret intention of the party who erects the fixture, but, except in the case of trade fixtures, the intention is indicated by the nature of the fixtures erected. Therefore, while we find abundant evidence that the defendant intended to remove these fixtures at the expiration of his lease, we do not find that this intention was communicated and assented to by the owner of the land; and because the fixtures erected became a part of the realty, and are not embraced in the class known as trade fixtures, the uncommunicated intention to remove them would not give him a right to do so without the authority of the owner.

For the reasons above stated, the trial judge erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

Henry CATE et al.

(.....Tenn.....)

Negligence of an infant in performance of his contract to thresh grain, which results in the destruction of the grain and the shed covering it by fire set by sparks from the engine, will not render him liable for the loss, since the gravamen of the action is not a tort independent of the contract, but is an injury which can be made out only by proving the contract, and showing negligence in its performance.

NOTE.—*Liability of an infant for torts.*I. General liability of an infant for torts, 673.II. Tort in inducing a contract, 675.a. By fraudulent representations, 675.b. By false warranty, 680.III. Tort in the performance of a contract.a. Contract of bailment.1. Damage to property by negligence, 680.2. Damage to property by wilful act, 681.3. Refusal to deliver property, 683.b. Contracts other than bailment.1. By negligence, 683.2. By other acts, 683.IV. Other torts arising from contracts, 683.V. Estoppel of an infant, by his fraud, 684.a. When estopped to plead infancy in an action on contract, 684.b. When estopped to reassert title, or to demand a second payment, 685.c. When compelled in equity to make satisfaction for his fraud, 687.VI. Liability of an infant as trustee or officer, 688.VII. Summary, 688.I. General liability of an infant for torts.

The unquestioned general rule is that an infant is liable, in the same manner as an adult, for a tort not connected with or arising out of a contract. Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. § 123; Tyler, Infancy & Coverture, 2d ed. § 123; Vasne v. Smith, 6 Cranch, 226, 3 L. ed. 207; Stearns v. Wallace, 59 N. H. 595; Bullock v. Babcock, 3 Wend. 391; Wiley v. Heard, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) § 1202, p. 686; Re Wolf, 9 Kulp, 523; Dial v. Wood, 9 Baxt. 297; Hanks v. Deal, 3 McCord, L. 257; O'Leary v. Brooks Elevator Co. 7 N. D. 554, 41 L. R. A. 677, 75 N. W. 919; Wilbur v. Jones, 21 N. B. 4.

This general liability is without regard to the age of the infant, according to many cases. In a case in the Year Books (1456) 35 Hen. VI., 11 b. it was held that an infant of four years was liable in trespass for the putting out of an eye; and the age of the child is important simply as bearing upon the question of the unavoidability of the accident. "Where infants are the actors, that might probably be considered an unavoidable accident which would not be so considered where the actors are adults; but such a distinction, if it exists, does not apply to this case." Bullock v. Babcock, 3 Wend. 391, where a boy of twelve shot his schoolmate in the eye with an arrow.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Polk County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the value of certain grain and buildings destroyed through defendant's alleged negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. G. Allen, Traynor & Smith, B. B. C. Witt, John C. Ramsey, and John S. Shamblin for appellant.

Messrs. Mayfield, Son, & Aiken, R. M. Copeland, and J. L. Smith for appellees.

McAlister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs below recovered a verdict

And in Neal v. Gillett, 23 Conn. 437, where the injury was caused by the throwing of a ball near the head of plaintiff's horse, by the defendants, boys of thirteen and sixteen, the court said: "Persons of the . . . [age of thirteen or more] must be considered, in the absence of proof to the contrary, as emancipated from childish instincts, and bound to exercise their rights with ordinary care."

So, in O'Brien v. Loomis, 43 Mo. App. 29, it was assumed that a boy of ten years was liable for negligent shooting; and in Huchting v. Engel, 17 Wis. 230, 84 Am. Dec. 741, a boy under seven; and in McGee v. Willing, 31 Phila. Leg. Int. 37, a boy of less than six years,—were held liable, the former in trespass, and the latter for assault with a hammer, blinding his nurse.

The express command of the parent of an infant is no defense in an action of tort. So, in School Dist. No. 1 v. Bragdon, 23 N. H. 507, in form a curiously artificial case, one of trespass qu. cl. fr., where the defendants, small boys, were sued for "breaking into" a school in the wrong district, the gravamen of the action being, of course, fraud, it was held that the command of their father was no defense. The court added: "Infants are liable in cases arising ex delicto, whether founded on positive wrongs, as trespass or assault, or constructive tort, or frauds." To the same effect are Humphrey v. Douglass, 10 Vt. 71, 33 Am. Dec. 177, where a boy turned the plaintiff's horses into the highway by his father's directions; Scott v. Watson, 46 Me. 362, 74 Am. Dec. 457, a case of a boy carrying off plaintiff's hay; and Kilpatrick v. Hall, 67 Me. 543, also a case of trespass.

In Drane v. Pawley (1886) 8 Ky. L. Rep. 530, it was held that in the case of a girl of thirteen, sued for slander, the influence or duress of parents was not a defense, as to words not spoken in their presence.

Exemplary damages are not ordinarily recoverable against an infant,—at any rate in the case of infants who are not of sufficient age and discretion to be criminally responsible.

So, it is said in Huchting v. Engel, 17 Wis. 231, 84 Am. Dec. 741: "If damages by way of punishment were demanded, undoubtedly his extreme youth [six years], and consequent want of discretion, would be a good answer."

And in O'Brien v. Loomis, 43 Mo. App. 29, it was said: "We know of no case where such damages have been allowed in the case of an injury by a child only ten years of age."

The cases in assault and battery are: Year Book, 35 Hen. VI. 11b, supra; Bullock v. Bab- and judgment for the sum of $310 against the defendant, Lowery, for the value of wheat and other property alleged to have been destroyed through his negligence. It appears from the proof that the defendant, Lowery, was the owner of an engine and thresher, and entered into a contract with plaintiffs to thresh their wheat for every twentieth bushel. The contract was made by J. G. Cate for himself and other parties in interest, with the defendant, Lowery. The wheat was stored in a large shed on Cate's farm, the portion of each of the parties being packed in separate tiers. The defendant, Lowery, with his employees, arrived with the thresher early in the morning, and began threshing the wheat. They continued threshing until about 1 o'clock in the afternoon, when the wheat caught fire from the sparks emitted from the engine, and both the wheat and oats stored in the shed, together with the shed, were totally destroyed. There is proof tending to show the value of the wheat was $730; the oats, $75; and the shed, $125. Separate suits were brought by the parties in interest against the defendant before a justice of the peace of Polk county. In the circuit court, by consent of parties, these causes were heard together, and verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for sums aggregating $310. There is proof tending to show that the defendant proceeded to thresh the wheat without any spark arrester on his engine, and that, on the day preceding, defendant had set fire to the wheat of one Howard while threshing it. There is also proof tending to show that the engine and thresher were set in such position and at such an angle that the wind blew cock, 3 Wend. 391, where a boy put out his schoolmate's eye with an arrow; Peterson v. Haftner, 59 Ind. 130, 26 Am. Rep. 81, where a boy injured another's eye with lime; Vincent v. Warner, 12 Kulp, 46; Watson v. Wrightsman, 26 Ind. App. 437, 59 N. E. 1064; McGee v. Willing, 31 Phila. Leg. Int. 37; Sikes v. Johnson, 16 Mass. 389. In the last case the assault was not committed by the infant defendant himself, and the fact that he procured another (not his agent) to do the act was no defense.

As to tort by an agent, vide Smith v. Kron, 96 N. C. 392, 2 S. E. 533, and Burns v. Smith (1902; Ind. App.) 64 N. E. 94, infra, IV.

And ejectment may be maintained against an infant. McCoon v. Smith, 3 Hill, 147.

In Marshall v. Wing, 50 Me. 62, it was held that the action was maintainable against an infant for disselsin, that being a tort.

So, in Veigand v. Malatesta, 6 Coldw. 362, and in McClure v. McClure, 74 Ind. 108, infancy was no defense to an action for damages from forcible detainer.

The rule is the same in the concurrent remedy by writ of entry, although that is a real action, and not one in tort. Beckley v. Newcomb, 24 N. H. 359.

There are three cases holding infancy to be no defense in libel or slander: in libel: Fears v. Riley, 148 Mo. 49, 49 S. W. 836 (semble); in slander: Defries v. Davis, 1 Bing. N. C. 692; Drane v. Pawley, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 530.

In the case of an action for malicious prosecution there would seem from the two cases of this kind to be some doubt (resulting merely from the legal disability of an infant to prosecute an action), as to his liability.

In Burnham v. Seaverns, 101 Mass. 360, 100 Am. Dec. 123, it was held that an infant was not liable for a malicious prosecution brought without his knowledge by his prochein ami, although he had assented to it when he heard of it. But in Sterling v. Adams, 3 Day, 411, which was brought, on a statute, for damages from a vexatious (civil) suit, the court did not find it necessary to decide whether an infant was liable for bringing a vexatious suit, since the infant in question became of age before the return day of the writ, and afterwards knowingly prosecuted the suit; and judgment for the defendant was reversed.

The cases holding an infant liable for his negligence are: Conklin v. Thompson, 29 Barb. 218, in which a boy exploded a firecracker under the plaintiff's horse, causing it to die of fright; Baker v. Morris, 33 Kan. 580, 7 Pac. 267, against a boy for killing the plaintiff's mare; Edwards v. Crume, 13 Kan. 348, an action against the father of a boy who set fire to the prairie, and so destroyed the plaintiff's property, the court saying that the son alone was liable; Smith v. Davenport, 45 Kan. 423, 11 L. R. A. 429, 25 Pac. 851, where a father was sued, with the same result, for the negligence of his son in riding down the plaintiff on the highway; Stringer v. Frost, 116 Ind. 477, 2 L. R. A. 614, 19 N. E. 831, where an infant was held liable for the same thing; Morgan v. Cox, 22 Mo. 373, 66 Am. Dec. 623, where a boy negligently shot the plaintiff's cow; Conway v. Reed, 66 Mo. 346, 27 Am. Rep. 354, against a boy for carelessly shooting a playmate; O'Brien v. Loomis, 43 Mo. App. 29, in which a boy was held liable for shooting a servant with a toy rifle.

But in Robbins v. Mount (1867) 33 How. Pr. 24, it was held that infants, owners of a building, were not liable for damages caused by the overflow of a sink in it, since no personal negligence of their own was shown, and they were incapable in law, from their inability to make a valid contract, of appointing servants or agents for whose negligence they could be held responsible, and therefore the doctrine of respondet superior did not apply.

In 1900, however, it was held, in the same state, that the infant owners of land, a wall on which was negligently allowed to fall, were liable for the damages thereby done to a neighbor's property, without regard to any question of negligence in themselves; and the fact that their guardians managed the property was no defense. McCabe v. O'Connor, 4 App. Div. 354, 38 N. Y. Supp. 572, Affirmed in 162 N. Y. 600, 57 N. E. 1116.

The cases holding an infant liable for seduction are: Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 12 S. E. 671; Straughan v. Smith, 19 Ont. Rep. 558; Becker v. Mason, 93 Mich. 336, 53 N. W. 361; Lee v. Hefley, 21 Ind. 99.

The cases in trespass are: Wilson v. Gerard, 59 Ill. 51, where a father was held not liable for the trespass of his children; and in Tift v. Tift, 4 Denio, 175, and Chandler v. Deaton, 37 Tex. 406, where fathers were sued for the trespasses of their children (in the former case setting a dog on a neighbor's swine, and in the latter, shooting another's mules), although it was held that the father was not liable, it was said that the son would be; School Dist. No. 1 v. Bragdon, 23 N. H. 509; Huchting v. Engel, 17 Wis. 231, 84 Am. Dec. 741; Scott v. Watson, 46 Me. 362, 74 Am. Dec. 457; Kilpatrick v. Hall, 67 Me. 543; Humphrey v. Douglass, 10 Vt. 71, 33 Am. Dec.

the sparks directly towards the shed. It is also shown that the wind was not blowing very hard in the morning, but during the day its velocity greatly increased, and plaintiff, seeing there was danger of the wheat catching fire, warned defendant's engineer, but the engineer said there was no danger; that he would turn on an exhaust valve and stop the sparks. Plaintiff admits he saw there was no spark arrester on the engine, but says he thought that was all right. Plaintiff states that when the work was commenced he called his men to set the engine square, but defendant said the angle set was all right. It was 74 feet from the point the fire caught to the engine. It would have been 20 feet further if a square set had been made. Plaintiff states on cross-examination that he did not stop them from making the angle set, nor did he stop them from running when he saw the danger, for the reason that the engineer told him there was no danger, and that he could stop the sparks by turning on the exhaust valve. There is no proof indicating any wilfulness on the part of defendant or his employees in setting fire to the shed, but the case presented by plaintiff is one of negligence in the operation of the engine and thresher. At the time the contract was made and the wheat destroyed the defendant, Lowery, was a minor, eighteen years of age. Plaintiff Cate testified that he said to defendant when he commenced the work that he seemed rather young to be running a thresher. Defendant replied that he did not know much about it, but had men with him as employees who did understand it. On the trial below the defendant pleaded his infancy in bar of the action. Plaintiff's 177; Eady v. Elsdon, 70 L. J. K. B. 701, [1901] 2 K. B. 480, 84 L. T. 615, 49 Week. Rep. 595, where a boy set fire to the plaintiff's house.

A case in trover is Green v. Sperry, 16 Vt. 390, 42 Am. Dec. 519, where a boy was sued for a watch converted by him.

And where money was tortiously taken, it was held, in Elwell v. Martin, 32 Vt. 217, that it could be recovered from an infant in addition to, as for money had and received, on the ground that a wrongdoer who acknowledges his liability in tort cannot be heard to object that the plaintiff has brought against him a milder remedy than an action ex contractu. (Compare Bristow v. Eastman [1794] 1 Esp. 172, Peake N. P. Cas. pt. 1, p. 223, infra § 11 b, 2.)

The same principle was held in Shaw v. Cook, 58 Me. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 290; and Wireman v. Mueller, 20 W. N. C. 10, is a similar case upon the same facts.

And in proceedings quasi criminal, but not taking more of the nature of a tort, infancy is no defense.

So, it was held in Winslow v. Anderson, 94 Mass. 376, that an infant might be sued ex delicto for a penalty for neglect of militia duty.

And in Chandler v. Com. 4 Met. (Ky.) 66, it was held that in bastardy proceedings, which, under the statute, were not criminal but civil, infancy was no defense.

And a Massachusetts case—McCall v. Parker, 13 Met. 372, 46 Am. Dec. 735—is to the same effect.

The rule that infancy is no defense in actions of this sort is now so well settled that no attempt is usually made to defend on that ground. As instances of this kind, where infants failed to set up the defense of infancy, see Vosburg v. Putney, 80 Wis. 523, 14 L. R. A. 226, 50 N. W. 403; Markley v. Whitman, 95 Mich. 238, 20 L. R. A. 55, 54 N. W. 763.

II. Tort in inducing a contract.

Between cases of pure tort (for which an infant is always liable), and cases of ordinary contract (for which, as a general rule, an infant is not liable except in the case of purchase of necessities), there are very many cases which have characteristics of both classes, and apparently involve both conflicting rules, resulting in uncertainty and confusion. This class is treated in the remainder of the note.

a. By fraudulent representations.

liable in tort for deceit in representing himself to be of age, or making other false statements, with the intention thereby to induce, and actually inducing, another person to contract with him. This was on the ground, originally, that an infant was liable only for torts which are ex delicto, and that misrepresentations made with the intent to induce a contract are a part of the contract, for which an infant cannot be made liable. The earliest case was Grove v. Nevill, decided in 1604, and reported in 1 Keble, 778. The whole report is as follows: "In an action upon the case in nature of deceit on sale by the defendant of goods as his own, whereas in truth they were another's, the defendant pleads nonage at the time of the sale; to which the plaintiff demurred. . . . Sed curia contra, this being no actual tort, or anything ex delicto, but only ex contractu, which is voidable by plea; but it's a tort by construction of law. Windham doubted."

This was followed the next year by the famous and leading case of Johnson v. Pye, reported in three places: Sid. pt. 1, p. 258, 1 Keble 913, 1 Lev. 169. Siderfin says: The defendant affirms to the plaintiff that he was of full age, on which the plaintiff lends him the money. And he takes his security (a mortgage), when in truth he was only twenty and a half. Then he avoids his security. And a difference was taken between torts and contracts of infants, for though infants will not be bound for contracts, yet they will be bound for torts. But though infants will be bound for actual torts, as trespass, etc., which are vi et contra pacem yet they will not be bound by those which sound in deceit, for if they should be, all the infants in England would be ruined. And according to Keble, Keeling, J., said: "Such torts that must punish an infant must be vi et armis, or notoriously against the public; but here the plaintiff's own credulity hath betrayed him." And Windham, J., said: "The commands of an infant are void; and for such he shall never be attainted a dis-sessor; much less shall he be punished for a bare affirmation. . . . Also by this means all the pleas of infancy would be taken away, for such affirmations are in every contract." In Levinz it is said that the court cited Grove v. Nevill, "where, in a case against an infant for selling a false jewel, affirming it to be a true one, 'twas adjudged the action did not lie; to which 'twas answered, that this is a trespass on the case, and an infant is chargeable for trespasses, though not for contracts." The whole case is dubious, because in Levinz it is said that the case was "adjourned," in Keble, counsel demurred to the plea on the ground that the action was founded upon tort, and not upon contract, and an infant is liable in law for his torts. The court sustained the demurrer, and the plea was stricken from the file. Counsel for defendant also submitted a supplemental request asking the court to charge that if the loss resulted from a negligent performance of the contract, and there was no wilful or intentional wrong, defendant would not be liable. This request was refused. The action of the court on the plea and refusal to charge as requested is made the basis of the third assignment of error, and raises the determinative question in the case.

We are of opinion the court was in error in sustaining the demurrer. The principle is well settled that an infant is liable in an action ex delicto for all injuries to persons or property committed by him. Dial v. Wood, 9 Baxt. 296; Beasley v. State, 2 Yerg. 481; Weigand v. Malatesta, 6 Coldw. 367. But, while an infant is liable for his torts, he is not liable for the tortious consequences of his breaches of contract; and, though the action may be in form as for a tort, yet, if the subject of it be based on contract, the suit will be attended with all the incidents of an action ex contractu. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 309. Again, the mere fact that the cause of action grows out of or is connected with contract will not in every case shield the infant from liability. If the tort is subsequent to or independent of the contract, and not a mere breach of it, but is a distinct, wilful, and positive wrong in itself, then, notwithstanding the contract, the infant is liable. This principle is illustrated in the nil capiat per villam, and in Siderfin the final disposition is not stated; and Chief Baron Comyns ignores the case altogether in his Digest (Action on the case for a deceit, A [10]), where he declares: "If a man affirm himself of full age, when he is an infant, and thereby procure money to be lent to him upon mortgage," he is liable for deceit; and he cites a case, undecided as to this question,—Chetwin v. Venner, in Sid. pt. 1, p. 183,—a few pages before the report of Johnson v. Pye. But in spite of this, and of the fact that for almost two hundred years there was no reported case decided in consonance with it, Johnson v. Pye has been stolidly followed again and again in England as the highest authority, and it is now firmly established in that country as law, that an infant is not liable at law for his deceit in inducing a contract.

In Price v. Hewett (1852) 8 Exch. 146, 17 Jur. 4, Johnson v. Pye was cited and approved by the court, although not upon the main point of the case. Two years later, in a case of fraud in a feme covert in representing herself as unmarried, and so inducing the plaintiff to lend money on her note (Liverpool Adelphi Loan Assn. v. Fairhurst (1854) 9 Exch. 422, 2 C. L. Rep. 512, 23 L. J. Exch. N. S. 163, 18 Jur. 191), Johnson v. Pye was expressly held to be an authority by analogy, for "when the fraud is directly connected with the contract, . . . and is the means of effecting it, and parcel of the same transaction, the wife cannot be responsible." Wright v. Leonard, 11 C. B. N. S. 258, 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 365, 8 Jur. N. S. 415, 4 L. T. N. S. 110, 9 Week. Rep. 944, was on the same point, and Erie, Ch. J., made the plausible suggestion that the representation as to age or coverture "is in substance a warranty of a debt, and so a contract."

As a result of these decisions denying the liability of an infant in tort for fraud connected with his contract, there were two distinct and unsuccessful attempts to evade the doctrine of Johnson v. Pye.

Bartlett v. Wells (1862) 1 Best & S. 836, 31 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 57, 8 Jur. N. S. 762, 5 L. T. N. S. 607, 10 Week. Rep. 229, was an action brought on a contract for goods sold and delivered; the plea was infancy; and, under the common law procedure act of 1854, allowing an "equitable replication," the plaintiff replied that the defendant, with knowledge of his true age, falsely and fraudulently represented that he was of full age, whereby the plaintiff was induced to supply the goods. This was demurred to, and the replication was held bad, as a departure from the declaration. And this case 57 L. R. A.

was followed by DeRoo v. Foster, 12 C. B. N. S. 272, in the same year, and Bateman v. Kingston, Ir. L. R. 6 C. L. 328, on exactly the same point.

But in Miller v. Blankley (1878) 38 L. T. N. S. 527, the plaintiff relied on the judicature act of 1873, providing that, in case of conflict between the rules of equity and common law in reference to the same matter, the former should prevail. This action was also in contract, for the price of materials, and although it was acknowledged, as Beasley, J., said in the argument in Bartlett v. Wells, p. 838, that the rule in equity was that "an infant who obtains a loan on a representation which he knows to be false, that he was of age, is estopped from pleading his infancy," yet the court held infancy to be a good plea, simply following Bartlett v. Wells.

In the meantime, in this country there was a successful attempt to break away from a doctrine which, as suggested in 8 Yale L. J. p. 237, by making an infant, on the ground that he is not liable for his contracts, irresponsible for a fraud by which he has induced another to contract with him, violates that fundamental principle of contracts which renders void any agreement procured by fraud. The earliest American case is Badger v. Phinney (1819) 15 Mass. 359, 8 Am. Dec. 105. In this case, where the plaintiff had sold goods to the defendant on credit, upon his falsely representing himself as of age, the court held, the infant having rescinded the sale on the ground of his infancy, that the seller might replevy the goods; and Putnam, J., said: "The basis of this contract has failed, from the fault, if not the fraud, of the infant; and on that ground the property may be considered as never having passed from, or as having reverted in, the plaintiff."

And in Fitts v. Hall (1838) 9 N. H. 441, the superior court of New Hampshire expressly repudiated the doctrine of Johnson v. Pye. Here the plaintiff sold hats to the defendant, who represented himself of age, and the plaintiff took his note, and this not being paid at maturity, the seller sued upon it, and was nonsuited on a plea of infancy. He then brought his action for deceit. The court held the infant liable, in a decision which has been much attacked and defended in this country. Parker, Ch. J., said: "The representation in Johnson v. Pye, and in the present case, that the defendant was of full age, was not part of the contract, nor did it grow out of the contract, or in any way result from it. It is not any part of its terms, nor was it the considera-use of hired horses. If an infant hires a horse to be moderately driven or ridden, and the infant, from lack of experience, rides or drives the horse immoderately, or injures him by unskilful management, it is a mere breach of contract, and the plea of infancy is a complete defense to an action therefor. But if the infant wilfully and intentionally injures the animal, or uses him for a different purpose from that for which he was hired, or drives him elsewhere or beyond the place contemplated in the contract, it is a conversion of the animal, which terminates the contract, and renders the infant liable in trover for its value. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 309. "The defense of infancy cannot be pleaded in actions for wrongs independent of contract, but it may be pleaded in all cases where the cause of action is substantially founded on a contract, though the declaration might be framed in form of tort instead of a contract. So that the plaintiff cannot indirectly make the defendant liable on a contract made during infancy by merely changing the form of the declaration." 1 Keener, Contr. p. 513. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Torts (p. 106), says: However, there is an exception to the rule. The distinction is this: If the wrong grows out of contract relations, and the real injury consists in the nonperformance of a contract into which the party wronged has entered with an infant, the law will not permit the adult to enforce the contract indirectly, by counting on the infant's neglect to perform it, or omission of duty under it as a tort. The reason is obvious. To permit this to be done would deprive the infant of that shield of protection which in tion upon which the contract was founded. No contract was made about defendant's age. The sale of the goods was not a consideration for this affirmation or representation. The representation was not a foundation for an action of assumpsit. The matter arises purely ex delicto. The fraud was intended to induce, and did induce, the plaintiff to make a contract for the sale of the hats, but that by no means makes it part and parcel of the contract. It was antecedent to the contract; and if an infant is liable for a positive wrong connected with a contract, but arising after the contract has been made, he may well be answerable for one committed before the contract was entered into, although it may have led to the contract. It has been said that all the infants in England might be ruined, if infants were bound by acts that sound in deceit. But this cannot be a reason why the action should not be maintained for fraudulent wrongs done, for the same reason would seem to apply equally well in cases of slander, trover, and trespass."

Burley v. Russell, 10 N. H. 184, 34 Am. Dec. 146, decided by the same court in the following year, although apparently inconsistent with Fitts v. Hall, is based on an entirely different ground. This was a case of assumpsit on notes given by an infant, who represented himself to be of age. The plaintiff maintained that the defendant, by his false representations, was estopped to set up infancy; but the court said that Fitts v. Hall did not lead to such a result, and that this action could not be maintained because the measure of damages, in case of recovery on the notes, would not be proper, since the amount promised might be greater than the actual damages sustained. This decision, of course, left the plaintiff to sue over again for his damages, in an action sounding in tort.

The rule in New York was first stated in 1843, in the case of Wallace v. Morse, 5 Hill, 391. The defendant, fraudulently representing himself to be of age, and with the intention not to pay, colluded with others to induce the plaintiff to sell him goods on credit. The court said (Cowen, J.): "The only question of moment is, whether an infant be chargeable by an action for tort in obtaining goods fraudulently, with an intention not to pay for them. We think he is, both on principle and authority."

Yet in 1851, Sandford, J., in Brown v. McCune, 5 Sandf. 224, a case in a lower court, although Wallace v. Morse was cited for the plaintiff, said: "We believe the law remains 57 L. R. A.

as it was laid down in Johnson v. Pye." Brown v. McCune was an action for the price of goods sold and delivered, where the plaintiff unsuccessfully maintained that the defendant, by his falsely affirming himself of age, should be estopped to set up his fraud as a defense (see infra, V. a), so that the remark was wholly obiter.

This doubt was removed, however, and the true rule was definitely laid down, in 1863, in Eckstein v. Frank, 1 Daly, 335, an action in the nature of trover, for the value of goods obtained by an infant through his fraudulent representation that he was of age. The opinion says: "The doctrine of Johnson v. Pie, 1 Lev. 169, 1 Keble, 905, 913, 8id. pt. 1, p. 258, though recognized in a comparatively recent English case (Price v. Hewett, 8 Exch. 146, 17 Jur. 4), and though believed to be the law by Justice Sandford, in Brown v. McCune, 5 Sandf. 224, had been eight years before distinctly repudiated by the supreme court of this state upon full consideration, in Wallace v. Morse, 5 Hill, 392, and it has also been considered and repudiated in a great number of cases in other states [citing New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, United States Supreme Court, Texas, South Carolina, and Maine cases]. It is therefore to be regarded as overruled in this country by an overwhelming weight of authority. . . . When an infant obtains property by falsely representing himself to be of full age, an action of tort may be maintained against him, either to recover it back or to recover damages, upon the ground that he obtained possession of it wrongfully." And in Schunemann v. Paradise, 46 How. Pr. 426, where an infant was arrested, on civil process, for his fraud in inducing a contract, this last decision was expressly followed.

Yet, when, in New York, a seller of goods on credit sues an infant in contract for the price of goods, although alleging fraud in the infant which induced the plaintiff to give credit, he cannot recover. So the court says, in Studwell v. Shapter (1873) 54 N. Y. 249: "They do not seek in this action to recover damages resulting from such representations [as to the infant's responsibility and business], on the ground of their falsity, but to enforce the agreements or contracts of purchase made by the defendant. . . . Viewing this action as one founded on contract, and not based on fraud in disaffirmance of it, I am of opinion that the judgment appealed from should be reversed."

matters of contracts the law has wisely placed before him. If suit should be brought against an infant for the immoderate use of, and want of care of, a horse which has been bailed to him, infancy is a good defense; the gravamen being a breach of contract of bailment. So, infancy is a defense to an action by a shipowner against his supercargo for a breach of his instructions regarding the sale of the cargo, whereby the same was lost or destroyed. Parsons, Contr. p. 316, says: "An infant is protected against his contracts, but not against his frauds or other torts. . . . If such tort or fraud consists in the breach of his contract, then he is not liable therefor in an action sounding in tort, because this would make him liable for his contract merely by a change in the form of action, which the law does not permit." In the case of Fitts v. Hall, 9 N. H. 441, the court says that no liability growing out of a contract can be asserted against an infant. The test of an action against an infant is whether a liability can be made out without taking notice of the contract. Now, applying the test laid down in the cases cited, it will be observed that the tort which is the foundation of the present action was committed in the performance of a contations made by an infant to induce another to enter into a contract with him would not give validity to the contract itself." This last case was on a note.

Heath v. Mahoney (1876) 7 Hun, 100, was a case where an infant deposited with the plaintiffs, brokers, $500 cash upon a margin, and two bonds belonging to his mother, which he asserted were his. The stock bought fell, wiping out the margin, and was sold by the brokers in accordance with the contract; and the bonds were recovered from them in an action by the mother. In an action for the amount of the loss, the defendant pleading infancy, and, a recovery being had for the amount of the difference between the buying and selling prices of the stock, it was held upon appeal: "The recovery is much beyond any proper measure of damages in the case, and cannot be upheld, for two reasons: First, that no recovery can be worked out through an enforcement of the contract made by the defendant, or any part of it, because it is invalid for any and every purpose, and, second, that the recovery exceeds any damage which can be said to be the direct legal consequences of the alleged fraud." On the last point the decision is in accord with Burley v. Russell, 10 N. H. 184, 34 Am. Dec. 146.

In Radley v. Kenedy (1891) 37 N. Y. S. R. 612, 14 N. Y. Supp. 268, an infant who had contracted to buy real estate of the defendant sued to rescind the agreement and recover $500 paid on account, and it was held that there could be no recovery on the defendant's counterclaim of damages, from debts incurred by the defendant to his broker and lawyer, and resulting from the infant's fraudulent concealment of his minority. The court said it was "an effort to recover indirectly for a breach of a contract which is not obligatory on the plaintiff. . . . It seems that 'if the substantive ground of the claim rest in contract, an infant cannot be rendered liable by changing the form of the action to one in tort, when he would not be liable on the contract itself.' 2 Kent, Com. 241."

Gaunt v. Taylor (1891) 39 N. Y. S. R. 757, 15 N. Y. Supp. 589, is a clear case. The defendant bought goods of the plaintiff, paying part cash, and falsely representing that he kept a store and was doing a good business, but signed the name of his sister, for whom he was acting as agent, to the contract of sale, the plaintiff thinking the name was his. On a plea of infancy, it was held that the defendant was liable in damages for the fraud, even without the plaintiff rescinding the contract by offering to return the money paid. The agreement was plainly void; the defendant intended to blind his sister, and the plaintiff intended that the defendant should be bound.

Somewhat similar is the case of Ashlock v. Vivell (1888) 29 Ill. App. 888. A horse was sold to an infant, who concealed his minority and gave a note, but intended never to pay; and in trover for the horse it was held that an infant who obtains goods by pretending to purchase, but intending never to pay, is not a purchaser, and is liable in tort. The court said: "If an infant vendee obtains possession of goods through the pretense of a purchase, but intending at the time not to pay for them, there is, in fact, no contract executed between himself and his vendor. Their minds never meet. The transfer of possession as made by the vendor is based upon a supposed contract of sale, while such possession is received by the vendee fraudulently and tortiously."

In Rice v. Boyer, 108 Ind. 472, 58 Am. Rep. 53, 9 N. E. 420, an infant, by fraudulently representing himself to be of age, induced the plaintiff to deliver to him a buggy and harness on a year's credit, and to take his note. The infant repudiated his contract, and in an action for the value of the property, the court held that "Where the infant does fraudulently and falsely represent he is of full age, he is liable in an action ex delicto for the injury resulting from his tort. . . . The test, and the only satisfactory test, is supplied by the answer to the question: Can the infant be held liable without directly or indirectly enforcing his promise? There is no enforcement of a promise where an infant who has been guilty of a positive fraud is made to answer for the actual loss his wrong has caused to one who has dealt with him in good faith and has exercised due diligence." And in this case it was held that the action could be brought where the contract was repudiated, although the time to perform it had not yet expired.

In Massachusetts, Badger v. Phinney (1819) 15 Mass. 359, 8 Am. Dec. 105, was followed in 1854, by Walker v. Davis, 1 Gray, 506. Here, a young man got the plaintiff drunk, and by representing to him that he was able to contract for himself, prevailed upon the plaintiff, who knew that he was under age, to give his cow for the infant's note. It was decided that, although the infant had prevailed in an action on the note, he was still liable in an action of trover, and, although he had sold the cow before the demand, the original act was a conversion.

But Slayton v. Barry (1900) 175 Mass. 513, 49 L. R. A. 560, 56 N. E. 574, seems to be an unfortunate reversion to the old rule, and against the weight of authority in this country, as well as inconsistent with the spirit of the earlier Massachusetts cases which the opinion attempts to distinguish. The defendant obtained goods by falsely representing himself to be of age, and the plaintiff declared in deceit and trover; but the court held that neither was maintainable. The opinion of Morton, J., says: "The rule is stated in 2 Kent, Com. 241, as follows: 'The fraudulent act, to tract, and not a wilful or intentional wrong done independent of and outside of the contract. The claim of plaintiffs is that defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to have reasonably safe and suitable machinery, in that it had no spark arrester, and that defendant and his employees were negligent in the locating of the engine and thresher at an angle and in such proximity to the wheat shed. The gravamen of the action is that this negligence constituted a breach of the contract, and furnished ground of liability. Plaintiffs are bound, in making out this case, to show the contract; and the ground of liability is the negligent performance of that contract, whereby injury has resulted. There is no claim of wilful injury. Plaintiff must have known at the time this contract was made that defendant was an infant under twenty-one years, since he admits he told defendant that he (defendant) seemed to be rather young to run a thresher. He cannot now complain that his contract was in law a voidable one, and that it imposed no liability upon the defendant for its negligent performance.

charge him . . . must be wholly tortious; and a matter arising ex contractu, though infected with fraud, cannot be changed into a tort in order to charge the infant in trover, or case, by a change in the form of action.' In the present case it seems to us that the fraud on which the plaintiff relies was part and parcel of the contract, and directly connected with it. The plaintiff cannot maintain his action without showing that there was a contract which he was induced to enter into by the defendant's fraudulent representations in regard to his capacity to contract, and that, pursuant to that contract, there was a sale and delivery of the goods in question. . . . In Walker v. Davis there was no completed contract, and title did not pass. . . . Badger v. Phinney was an action of replevin, and it was held that the property had not passed, or, if it had, that it had reverted in the plaintiff in consequence of the defendant's fraud. The plaintiff maintained his action independently of the contract."

Gilson v. Spear (1865) 38 Vt. 311, 88 Am. Dec. 659, cited and approved as an authority for the decision in Slayton v. Barry, does not support it. That case was an action for deceit in the sale of a horse; the infant defendant, though refusing to warrant, falsely affirmed the horse to be sound. In such a case it is undisputed that the representation is a part of the contract, so that infancy is a good defense. (See, however, Word v. Vance, 1 Nott & M'C. 197, 9 Am. Dec. 683, infra, II. b.) But the decision that an infant is not liable for a false statement as to the subject-matter of the contract does not support the contention of Slayton v. Barry.

Doran v. Smith (1877) 49 Vt. 353, simply follows the principle laid down in Gilson v. Spear, 38 Vt. 311, 88 Am. Dec. 659. In this case the infant defendant had sold a pin to the plaintiff as his own. It was reclaimed by the real owner from the plaintiff, who brought his action for the deceit, and the court held the plea of infancy good.

But Nash v. Jewett (1889) 61 Vt. 501, 4 L. R. A. 561, 18 Atl. 47, also cited as an authority in Slayton v. Barry, is no authority for that decision. The plaintiff sold the defendant goods, and took his note, relying upon his statement that he was of age. The declaration stated these facts, but omitted to allege the damage in that the defendant had refused to keep his contract. The court reviews the Vermont authorities, none of which is exactly in point, and after distinguishing Fitts v. Hall (1838) 9 N. H. 441, the facts of which were the same as in Slayton v. Barry, on the ground that in that case the infant had avoided the contract before suit, decided that infancy was a defense.

38 Ill. 145, it was held (obiter): "If he [an infant] were to falsely allege himself to be of age, for the purpose of inducing another person to purchase and take a deed of his lands, he would be liable to respond in damages for any injury which might result to the purchaser in consequence of the deceit."

And Mathews v. Cowan, 59 Ill. 341, decided that an infant who, pretending to make immediate payment for goods, gives a bad check, is liable ex delicto for fraud, since the contract was void, and title never passed. "The transaction, as here complained of, was not really a contract, but we must regard it as a mere tort." This was followed by Ashlock v. Vivell (1888) 29 Ill. App. 388.

So, in Nolan v. Jones (1880) 53 Iowa, 387, 5 N. W. 572, where an infant in an exchange of horses with the plaintiff represented that his horse was sound, knowing that it had glanders, the plaintiff brought replevin for his own horse, alleging simply that the defendant had obtained his horse by fraud, and that he himself still owned it, and ignoring the contract of exchange; and the court held that evidence of the fraud of the infant defendant was competent to show that the pretended contract, set up in the answer, was void for fraud. The court, however, added, entirely obiter, that, "as a minor cannot make himself liable upon his contracts of sale, no action for damages for deceit or fraud in a sale can be maintained against him."

In Pennsylvania it seems to be the law that an infant, although not liable for his contract, is yet liable in an action on the case for damages, if guilty of fraud. Hughes v. Gallans (1874) 10 Phila. 618.

And one who sells goods on credit to an infant who pretends to be of age may disaffirm the sale on learning of the fraud, and replevy the goods, even from a third person. Neff v. Landis, 110 Pa. 204, 1 Atl. 177.

And in Mississippi it has been said, obiter, that if one was induced by the affirmation of an infant to believe that he was of age, and so to enter into a contract with him, and the infant sought to entrap him into a contract which the infant intended to repudiate to the other's loss, the infant would be liable for his fraud. Yeager v. Knight (1883) 60 Miss. 730.

But in Maryland the opposite rule seems to obtain,—at least, unless the infant, when he made his contract, intended to repudiate it. In Monumental Bldg. Assn. No. 2 v. Herman (1870) 33 Md. 128, it is said: "Where he affirms himself to be of age, and borrows money, and gives his obligation for it, and avoids it by reason of his nonage, no action lies against him for the deceit, because, though liable for actual torts or trespass, etc., which are ex delicto, yet he is not bound for the action sounding in deceit."

In Louisiana, under the rule of the Spanish law, an infant seems to be treated like an adult, in regard to fraudulent torts. Compare Slidell, J., in Christian v. Welch (1852) 7 La. Ann. 533: "Where there is fraud, the minor stands on no better footing than one of full age."

And in Victoria (Campbell v. Ridgely, 18 Vict. L. Rep. 701), where an infant by fraudulently representing himself to be of age, has induced another person to enter into a contract with him, under which materials are supplied and work done, the infant is liable in an action, not only for the return of the materials in his possession, but also for an account, and to recover the value of the materials which are no longer in his possession.

In four of the states of the Union statutes have been passed (of which that of Iowa is the original) providing, in identical language, that an infant cannot disaffirm his contract "in cases where, on account of the minor's own misrepresentations as to his majority, or from his having engaged in business as an adult, the other party had good reason to believe him [the minor] capable of contracting." Iowa Code, § 3190; Kan. Gen. Stat. § 4184; Utah, Rev. Stat. § 1543; Wash. Gen. Stat. § 4582.

Cases under these statutes are: Oswald v. Broderick (1855) 1 Iowa, 382; Prouty v. Edgar (1858) 6 Iowa, 353; Beller v. Marchant (1870) 30 Iowa, 350 (holding that an infant who would otherwise be liable on his contract, under the statute, is not bound if his infancy was known to the other party); Jaques v. Sax (1874) 39 Iowa, 367; Dillon v. Burnham (1890) 43 Kan. 77, 22 Pac. 1016.

And under the civil law (1 Domat, pt. 1, bk. 4, title 6, Sec. 2, § 2378), "If a minor has given out that he is of age, and by producing a false certificate of the registry of his christening, or by some other way, has made people believe that he is a major, he cannot be relieved against those acts into which he shall have engaged anyone by this surprise. Thus, a minor having borrowed money by such means, although he has made no good use of it, yet his obligation will nevertheless have the same effect as that of a major," if the creditor has just reason to believe that the minor was of age.

And by the Spanish law (law 6, title 19, Partidas 6th), if an infant represents himself to be of age, and from his appearance seems to be so, any contract entered into with him will be valid, "for the law protects those who are defrauded, and not those who commit fraud."

(For cases in which it was sought to hold an infant in an action in contract, on the ground that he was estopped by his fraudulent representations from setting up his infancy, see infra, V. a.)

b. By false warranty.

The general rule is that an infant is not liable in either tort or contract for a false warranty in the sale of goods. The only case to the contrary is Word v. Vance (1818) 1 Nott & M'C. 197, 9 Am. Dec. 683, where, in case for deceit in falsely warranting a horse, the court said: "This is an action, as well in form as substance, ex delicto, and when such is the cause of action, even where the form is ex contractu, the defense of infancy will not avail."

Elsewhere the cases are uniform on this point. In Howlett v. Haswell (1814) 4 Campb. 118, and Green v. Greenbank (1816) 2 Marsh. 485,—the former in assumpsit and the latter in case,—infancy was a defense, both being cases of warranty of a horse. In Green v. Greenbank, Glibbs, Lord Ch. J., held: "Where the substantial ground of action rests on promises, the plaintiff cannot, by changing the form of action, render a person liable who would not have been liable on his promise. This is a case in which the assumpsit is clearly the foundation of the action; for it is, in fact, an undertaking that the horse was sound."

So, Brown v. Dunham (1791) 1 Root, 272, shows the Connecticut rule to be the same, the court holding, in an action on the case for fraud in the sale of a horse, that the infant, being incapable of making a contract, could not be guilty of fraud in contracting. Compare Geer v. Hovy, 1 Root, 179, in chancery, the petitioner alleging, in vain, that he was "without remedy at law" (infra, V. c.).

And Prescott v. Norris, 32 N. H. 101, and West v. Moore, 14 Vt. 449, 39 Am. Dec. 235, upon the same facts, are to the same effect; but in Morrill v. Aden, 19 Vt. 505, where an infant had falsely warranted his horse, and after reaching his majority sued on the notes given for it, it was held that infancy was no defense to the defendant's set-off for the breach of warranty, for, although infancy would be a good defense to an action on a false warranty, here the infant, by suing on the notes, had affirmed his contract, and his infancy would not avail him.

In New York, however, in Hewitt v. Warren, 10 Hun, 560, which was for breach of warranty in the sale of a horse, the court, instead of holding squarely that infancy was a good defense, since the warranty, although fraudulent, was a part of the contract, decided that the action was not maintainable, since the plaintiff upon discovering the fraud had not disaffirmed the contract, by returning or offering to return the horse, "and thus put the infant in the position of a mere wrongdoer, unjustly keeping what he had fraudulently obtained." And the court adds: "It would seem that the infant would then be liable in damages for tort."

For cases of fraud of an infant, not amounting to warranty, as to the subject-matter of a contract, see Grove v. Nevill, 1 Keble, 773; Gilson v. Spear, 38 Vt. 811, 88 Am. Dec. 659; Doran v. Smith, 49 Vt. 353; and Nolan v. Jones, 53 Iowa, 387, 5 N. W. 572,—supra, II. a.

III. Tort in the performance of a contract.

a. Contract of bailment.

1. Damage to property by negligence.

It may be stated as the law that an infant is not liable for injury to property bailed to him, occasioned simply by his ignorance or negligence. The difficulty is to determine whether injury in any case is of this kind, or is caused by the wilful or deliberate act of the infant (such as to put the case in the class treated in III. a, 2, infra), in which case the authorities are conflicting as to his liability.

The earliest case is Crosse v. Andros (1598) Rolle, Abr. 2. The goods in question were constructively in the possession of the innkeeper as bailee, and he would therefore be liable for them by the customs of inns. The report is: If an inn comes to an infant, and he keeps it, and his guests are robbed, yet no action lies against the infant. Agreed.

And the leading case (always contrasted with Burnard v. Haggis, 14 C. B. N. S. 45, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 189, 9 Jur. N. S. 1825, 8 L. T. N. S. 820, 11 Week. Rep. 644, infra, III. a, 2), is Jennings v. Rundall (1799) 8 T. R. 335. The declaration, in form trespass, stated the delivery of a mare by the plaintiff to the defendant, an infant, and that the defendant "wrongfully, injuriously, and maliciously" used the mare so immoderately and excessively that she was greatly injured. The court held that "the words 'wrongfully, injuriously, and maliciously' . . . cannot vary the case. . . . The plea of infancy is a good bar to this action on the ground that the act done in this case is the foundation of an action of assumpsit. And the reason of the distinction taken in the case in Siderfin [Johnson v. Pye] is, that the plaintiff shall not, by changing the form of the action, vary the liability of the infant."

In America the cases are in accord where the act of the infant is merely negligent or injudicious. It was held in South Carolina, in 1820 (Hard v. Templeton, MSS., Dec. 1820), "that an infant is not liable for the value of a horse let to him, although the horse may have been killed by injudicious driving." See also Young v. Muhling (1900) 48 App. Div. 617, 63 N. Y. Supp. 181, infra, III. a, 2.

In Philleo v. Sanford (1856) 17 Tex. 281, 67 Am. Dec. 654, where the defendants were sued on a contract as common carriers, for damage to goods by wetting, the defense of infancy of Sanford was sustained without discussion.

Eaton v. Hill (1870) 50 N. H. 235, 9 Am. Rep. 189, was an action on the case for carelessly and immoderately driving the plaintiff's horse so that it died. The plea of infancy was sustained on the ground that the defendant had not been guilty of "a positive, wilful, and tortious act," which, the court said, would make him responsible for the damage, even although it was part of the contract, express or implied, that the property should be safely returned. Bellows, Ch. J., said: "When . . . the infant wholly departs from his character as bailee, and by some positive act wilfully destroys or injures the thing bailed, the act is in its nature essentially a tort, the same as if there had been no bailment."

2. Damage to property by wilful act.

Furnes v. Smith (1835) Rolle, Abr. 530, is the earliest case on this head. This was a case in admiralty, but the opinion says that the rule at the common law applies. The report says: If an infant, being master of a ship at St. Christopher's over the sea, by contract with another take upon him to carry certain goods from St. Christopher's to England, and there deliver them, but after does not deliver them according to the agreement, but wastes and consumes them,—he can be sued for the goods in the admiralty court, although he be an infant, for this suit is but in the nature of a detinue, or trover and conversion at the common law.

Vasse v. Smith (1810) 6 Cranch, 226, 3 L. ed. 207, upon much the same facts, is the leading American case. The plaintiff employed the defendant, an infant, as supercargo, to take 70 barrels of flour from Alexandria and sell them in Norfolk. The declaration was in two counts: First, for breach of instructions, in that the defendant, by his negligence, had suffered the property to be embezzled, lost, or destroyed; the second count was in trover. The court held that infancy was a good defense to the first count, but not to the second. Chief Justice Marshall said as to the first count, that it stated a case of contract, and exhibited no feature of such a tort as will charge an infant. But as to the count in trover he said: "This court is of opinion that infancy is no complete bar to an action of trover, although the goods converted be in his possession in virtue of a previous contract. The conversion is still in its nature a tort; it is not an act of omission, but of commission, and it is within that class of offenses for which infancy cannot afford protection."

387, 17 Am. Dec. 756, an action on the case on similar facts, where the defendant engaged to carry goods to Africa, sold them, and converted the proceeds, was based expressly on Vasse v. Smith, and the "St. Christopher Case" (Furnes v. Smith), and held the defendant liable.

There is an Ohio case,—Denning v. Nelson, 1 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 503,—also holding that an infant who sells property bailed to him is liable for the tort.

All the other decided cases of wilful, positive tort of an infant in connection with property bailed to him are cases of hiring horses or vehicles.

Schenk v. Strong (1818) 4 N. J. L. 87, is the first American case, and is typical in facts, although contrary to the weight of authority. The plaintiff "lent" his "riding chair" to the defendants, infants, to go a certain journey and use it with moderation and care; and in his declaration, in case, he alleged that the defendants went a different journey, and wilfully and carelessly broke the chair. The decision, holding the plea of infancy a good defense, makes the bald distinction between contracts and torts of et armis, always accompanied by a breach of the peace, saying, "they violated the promise in every particular; that is the substance of the thing."

Campbell v. Stakes (1828) 2 Wend. 137, 19 Am. Dec. 561, the leading American case to the opposite effect, is based upon the ground of a constructive disaffirmance, by the infant, of the contract of bailment, by his wilful act in violation of it. This action was in trespass for the death of a mare by the defendant's hard and cruel usage. The court says expressly that case would not lie, since in that form of action the plaintiff would have to affirm the contract, for which infancy is a defense. "But if the infant does any wilful and positive act, which amounts to an election on his part to disaffirm the contract, the owner is entitled to the immediate possession. If he wilfully and intentionally injures the animal, an action of trespass lies against him for the tort."

And Fish v. Ferris (1855) 5 Duer, 49, 8 E. D. Smith, 567, follows this doctrine of constructive disaffirmance. The defendant drove a horse, hired to go to Flushing, to Jamaica, and it died. "The contract of hiring," the court says, "was voidable at his [the infant's] election, and a wilful departure from it was an election to avoid it. From the moment an infant becomes a trespasser, his plea of infancy falls him."

So, in Moore v. Eastman (1874) 1 Hun, 578, the jury found, in accordance with the charge, "a positive and wilful act, amounting to a disaffirmance of the contract of bailment," producing a proper result although there was little evidence to that effect.

In Young v. Muhling (1900) 48 App. Div. 617, 63 N. Y. Supp. 181, a horse was let to the infant defendant to go "direct to Haverstraw." He did not go by the shortest route, but it was a very hot day and the horse died as a result of the driving. On the defendant's appeal from a verdict, the court held that there was not enough evidence to find intentional injury on the defendant's part, in accordance with the principle of Campbell v. Stakes.

The rule in Massachusetts was settled in 1826 in Homer v. Thwing, 3 Pick. 492. This was in trover for a horse hired by an infant to go to Brookline, and driven to Cambridge and injured. The court said that "the driving of the horse beyond the place to which the defendant had permission to go was a conversion, and trover is the proper remedy."

In Green v. Sperry, 16 Vt. 390, 42 Am. Dec.

519, it was said: "Where property is bailed to a minor, and he uses the property for a different purpose from that for which it is bailed, the bailment is thereby determined, and the minor is liable in trover."

But in Towne v. Wiley (1851) 23 Vt. 355, 56 Am. Dec. 85, Homer v. Thwing was expressly followed. There a horse was hired by an infant for a specific trip; the infant came back by a circuitous way, doubling the distance, and left the horse out all night, so that it died; and the owner brought trover. The court (Redfield, J.) said: "So long as the defendant kept within the terms of the bailment, his infancy was a protection to him, whether he neglected to take proper care of the horse, or to drive him moderately. But when he departs from the object of the bailment, it amounts to a conversion of the property, and he is liable as much as if he had taken the horse in the first instance without permission."

And Ray v. Tubbs (1878), 50 Vt. 688, 28 Am. Rep. 519, reasserts the same rule. In this case an infant gave a note in satisfaction of his tort in overdriving a horse, but when sued on his note he pleaded infancy. It was held, however, that infancy was no defense, on the ground that the note was given for a necessary (Bradley v. Pratt, 23 Vt. 378); and the court saw no reason why he should not be held liable in an action upon the note, as he would be if the action were brought upon the cause of action which formed the consideration for the note.

Hanks v. Deal, 8 McCord, L. 257, was also a case on a note given in settlement of an award for a tort committed by an infant, but the court decided that the note was voidable; at all events, in the absence of proof that it was for a necessary, or beneficial to the infant.

In Whelden v. Chappel, 8 R. I. 230, trover was brought for a horse and buggy, hired to go to a certain place, and driven to a more distant place. On a plea of infancy it was held that without proof of conversion the plaintiff must fail. There was no denial of title to, or exclusion of dominion of, the plaintiff, and no misuse. It was necessary to show that the bailment had been determined.

But in a later Rhode Island case (Freemen v. Boland [1882] 14 R. I. 39, 51 Am. Rep. 840), on the same facts, the plaintiff was successful. The court said: "The question here is whether an infant, or minor, who hires a horse and buggy to drive to a particular place, and who, having got them under the hiring, drives beyond the place or in another direction, is liable in trover for the conversion. We think he is. There are cases in which infancy has been held to be a good defense to an action ex delicto for tort committed under contract or in making it. But that is not this case. The act here complained of was committed, not under the contract, but by abandoning it; the bailment being thus determined."

And in Nebraska the same rule obtains. An infant hired a horse and buggy to go to one place, and drove to entirely different places many times further, with five passengers. The buggy was upset and broken, and the horse injured and overdriven. Infancy was no defense. Churchill v. White (1899) 58 Neb. 22, 78 N. W. 369.

There are two Pennsylvania cases, however, which, with Schenk v. Strong (1818) 4 N. J. L. 87, are against the weight of authority. The first is Penrose v. Curren, 3 Rawle, 351, 24 Am. Dec. 356. The declaration was in case, and alleged a bailment to drive the plaintiff's horse to German town; that the defendant went to Chester and other places unknown, and by hard and cruel treatment killed the horse. The 57 L. R. A.

plea of infancy was held good. Homer v. Thwing, 3 Pick. 492, was expressly disapproved, and the court said: "The foundation of the action is contract, and, disguise it as you may, it is an attempt to convert a suit, originally in contract, into a constructive tort so as to charge the infant."

On almost the same facts, in Wilt v. Welsh (1837) 6 Watts, 9, the same result was reached, and Campbell v. Stakes (1828) 2 Wend. 137, 19 Am. Dec. 561, was disapproved. The opinion says: "The ground of the New York case (Campbell v. Stakes) is that a positive breach of the contract is a disaffirmance which works a dissolution of it, and reduces the infant to a level with an adult who is chargeable with a conversion for any act which subverts the nature of the bailment. . . . Why should we employ any juggle to tear from an infant the defenses with which the law has covered his weakness?"

The English rule is in accordance with the weight of authority in this country. Burnard v. Haggis (1863) 14 C. B. N. S. 45, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 189, 9 Jur. N. S. 1825, 8 L. T. N. S. 320, 11 Week. Rep. 644. An infant hired a mare for a ride on the road, and was expressly told that she was not fit for jumping. The mare was put at a fence, fell on a stake, and was killed. Judgment was for the plaintiff. Byles, J., said that this was an act of tort, just as distinct from the contract as if the defendant had run a knife into the mare.

And in Walley v. Holt (1876) 35 L. T. N. S. 631, a case of an agreement to go to a certain place and back with one other person, carrying three other persons a greater distance, driving furiously, and ill treatment of the horse, the whole subject was carefully treated, and Jenings v. Rundall (supra, III. a. 1) was contrasted with Burnard v. Haggis. Chief Baron Kelly said: "The question in this case is not whether . . . the contract . . . has been broken, . . . but whether or not it appears that something in the nature of a wrong has been done by the defendant, independently of and beyond the contract, for which an action on the case will lie. . . . Where . . . something has been done beyond the contract, which amounts to a tort, then infancy is no defense. The question has recently been very well treated by Mr. Pollock in his excellent work 'Principles of Contract,' where, at pages 52, 53, . . . he says that 'the rule that an infant cannot be sued for a wrong when the cause of action is in substance ex contractu, or is so directly connected with the contract that the action would be an indirect way of enforcing the contract, is decidedly laid down in Jennings v. Rundall, where it was sought to recover damages from an infant for overdriving a hired mare. But if an infant's wrongful act, though concerned with the subject-matter of the contract, and such that but for the contract there would have been no opportunity of committing it, is, nevertheless, independent of the contract in the sense of not being an act of the kind contemplated by it, or being an act expressly forbidden by it, then the infant is liable . . . and the learned author then refers to . . . Burnard v. Haggis, as establishing the distinction. In that case the horse was used in a manner positively forbidden by the contract, and it was held to be a trespass and an independent tort, for which the infant defendant was liable; and so, in the present case, the overdriving and flogging, and all that was done by the defendant, by which the plaintiff's mare was injured, was ultra the contract altogether, and constituted a separate and independent tort on his part, to which . . . the plea of infancy is no defense."

3. Refusal to deliver property.

On this point the cases are uniform that the infant is liable in trover, replevin, or detinue for the return of the goods.

In Manby v. Scott (1663) Sid. pt. 1, p. 129, a case of trover, it was said, however: If one deliver goods to an infant on a contract, knowing him to be an infant, the infant will not be charged in trover and conversion for them, for by this way all the infants in England would be ruined. But if delivery of the goods be to the infant, not knowing him to be an infant, it will be otherwise.

But in Mills v. Graham (1804) 1 Bos. & P. N. R. 140, in detinue for skins delivered to an infant to be worked upon and finished, the plaintiff was successful, and Mansfield, Ch. J., added that "trover might have been brought for the conversion."

In Green v. Sperry (1844) 16 Vt. 390, 42 Am. Dec. 519, trover was maintained against a boy for a watch lent to him by the plaintiff's wife.

In Bennett v. McLaughlin, 18 Ill. App. 349, replevin was brought for a sewing machine delivered to the defendant on a conditional sale. The defendant undertook, on reaching her majority, to rescind the contract and keep the machine, and refused to pay the instalments. But the court said: "Her right to avoid the contract cannot be questioned, but it is a privilege secured to her by the law for her own protection, and she is not permitted to use it as a sword to injure others; she cannot retain the property purchased, after arriving at her majority, and at the same time repudiate the contract under which she received it; and if she does repudiate the contract under such circumstances, the title remains in the vendor, and he is entitled to the immediate possession of the property."

Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Jacobs, 2 Misc. 236, 21 N. Y. Supp. 1006, was on the same facts, and infancy was no defense; the court holding that where an infant pleads his minority in order to escape payment of the purchase price, the seller may rescind the sale and replevy the goods.

And Robinson v. Berry (1899) 93 Me. 320, 45 Atl. 84, reaches the same result.

b. Contracts other than bailment.

1. By negligence.

There seems to be no case exactly in point with the principal case, LOWERY v. CATE, where an infant, who contracted to do work on another person's property, was sued in tort for the damages resulting from his negligence in performing the contract. On full consideration of the cases, however, it will be seen that there can be no question as to the correctness of the decision in LOWERY v. CATE.

2. By other acts.

Bristow v. Eastman (1794) 1 Esp. 172, Peake N. P. Cas. pt. 1, p. 223, was a case of embezzlement by an infant servant of funds in his hands. The employer brought assumpsit for money had and received. Lord Kenyon said that infancy was no defense to the action. Infants were liable to acts ex delicto, though not ex contractu; and, though the present action was in its form an action of the latter description, yet it was of the former in point of substance. If the plaintiff had brought an action of trover, or an action grounded on the fraud, unquestionably infancy would have been no defense; and, as the object of the present action was precisely the same, that his opinion was, that the same rule of law should apply, and that infancy was no bar.

Re Seager, 60 L. T. N. S. 665, a recent case (1889), follows this case; here, however, the action was brought ex delicto.

These cases were of conversion of money in the hands of an infant by virtue of a contract, and such are to be carefully distinguished from the breach of a contract to sell and account for the proceeds.

Of the latter class is Munger v. Hess (1858) 28 Barb. 75. The complaint stated a contract, by which the defendant was to vend for the plaintiff certain goods, account for those sold, and return those unsold. The plaintiff demanded the return of the goods, and the defendant refused. But there was no allegation of a conversion, and the court held that the plea of infancy was a good defense, although the plaintiff maintained, on the authority of Bristow v. Eastman, that infancy was no defense if the substance of the action were ex delicto, though the form were ex contractu. But there was no conversion here.

Of the same class is a recent Maine case, Caswell v. Parker (1901) 96 Me. 89, 51 Atl. 238, where an infant was intrusted with a quantity of shoes to be sold upon commission, and those unsold were to be returned to the plaintiff with the proceeds of those sold. The plaintiff complained in trover that the infant defendant, contrary to instructions, sold upon credit, and failed to account for the proceeds. But it was held that the substance of the complaint was a breach of contract, and the plaintiff could not deprive the infant of his defense of infancy by suing in tort.

Somewhat similar is Root v. Stevenson, 24 Ind. 115. This was trover for $1,300, in the hands of an infant as firm profits, which he had agreed to turn over. The decision was that infancy is a good defense, because it was not a bailment (as in Towne v. Wiley, 23 Vt. 355, 56 Am. Dec. 85) to deliver over specific things, as coins and bills, and the action of the infant was merely a nonfeasance, for which infancy is a protection.

But where an infant takes money as a stakeholder, and refuses to pay it over to one of the betters on demand, he is liable, in trover, for the specific bills. Lewis v. Littlefield, 15 Me. 238.

Catts v. Phalen (1844) 2 How. 376, 11 L. ed. 306, was an action brought on the analogy of Bristow v. Eastman, in assumpsit, for $12,500, money had and received. The defendant was employed by the plaintiffs to manage a lottery wheel, and colluded with another to defraud them by a spurious drawing. The defendant's infancy was no defense.

In Baxter v. Bush, 29 Vt. 465, 70 Am. Dec. 420, the plaintiff in leasing a farm to the defendant, an infant, expressly reserved a full lien on all the crops of that year as security for the payment of the rent, and upon the defendant's disposing of the crops brought trover for them. Infancy was held to be no defense, the court saying: "His conversion of this property was a tortious act. His liability . . . does not arise from any breach of contract, but for an unlawful appropriation to his own use of the plaintiff's property."

IV. Other torts arising from contracts.

Ejectment may be maintained for disseisin, that being a tort, against an infant, although he claims under a mortgage. Marshall v. Wing, 50 Me. 62; McCoon v. Smith, 3 Hill, 147.

So, an action is maintainable against an infant for damages for the wrongful withholding of land. McClure v. McClure, 74 Ind. 108.

Infancy is no defense to an action for seduction (Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 269, 12 S. E. 671; Straughan v. Smith, 19 Ont. Rep. 558), even though induced by a promise of marriage. Becker v. Mason, 93 Mich. 336, 53 N. W. 361; Lee v. Hefley, 21 Ind. 99.

This rule, it will be seen, is the exact converse of, and consistent with, the rule that infancy is a good defense to an action for breach of promise of marriage, which, in treatment, is rather a tort than a breach of contract (Holt v. Ward, Clarencieux, 2 Strange, 987; Hunt v. Peake, 5 Cow. 475, 15 Am. Dec. 475; Willard v. Stone, 7 Cow. 22, 17 Am. Dec. 496; Morris v. Graves, 2 Ind. 354; Hamilton v. Lomax, 28 Barb. 615; Warwick v. Cooper, 5 Sneed, 659; Cannon v. Alsbury, 1 A. K. Marsh. 76, 10 Am. Dec. 709; McConkey v. Barnes, 42 Ill. App. 511; Evans v. Terry, 1 Brev. 80; Pool v. Pratt, 1 D. Chp. [Vt.] 252; Smith v. Jamieson, 17 Ont. Rep. 626; Rush v. Wick, 31 Ohio St. 521, 27 Am. Rep. 523; Felbel v. Oberaky, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 402, note; Frost v. Vought, 87 Mich. 65); although the promise was the means of effecting seduction. Cohen v. Weinberg, N. Y. Daily Reg. April 11, 1884; Leichtweis v. Treakow, 21 Hun, 487.

But in Evans v. Terry (1802) 1 Brev. 80, the action being in assumpsit, the court added that "they were of opinion that the plaintiff might maintain an action in another form, founded on the deceit practised on her by the defendant."

Stromberg v. Rubenstein (1897) 19 Misc. 647, 44 N. Y. Supp. 405, decides that infancy is a good defense to an action of replevin for an engagement ring, after the engagement to marry had been broken by the defendant.

In Oliver v. McClellan, 21 Ala. 675, McClellan had lent his horse to Hall, who exchanged it for another with Oliver, an infant, saying that the exchange was subject to the ratification of McClellan. Upon Oliver refusing to deliver the horse, McClellan brought detinue, and infancy was held to be no defense; the court saying that "an infant may be sued for his torts, and this, irrespective of the form of action which the law prescribes for the redress of the wrong done."

Where an infant married woman was sued for personal injuries to the plaintiff resulting from the negligence of her husband, who was acting as her agent in cutting timber on her land, it was held that she was not liable, since she was legally incompetent to enter into a binding contract of agency with another so as to make her liable for his torts. Burns v. Smith (1902; Ind. App.) 64 N. E. 94.

But it seems that in North Carolina an infant is liable for the torts committed by his agent in the necessary business of his agency, under the maxim, Qui facit per alium facit per se. Smith v. Kron (1887) 96 N. C. 392, 2 S. E. 533. (Compare Sikes v. Johnson, 16 Mass. 359; Robbins v. Mount, 38 How. Pr. 34; and McCabe v. O'Connor, 4 App. Div. 364, 38 N. Y. Supp. 572,—supra, l.)

An infant who rescinds, before his majority, the sale of his goods, and regains possession of them, is not liable in trespass therefor. Shipman v. Horton, 17 Conn. 484.

V. Estoppel of an infant by his fraud.

Under the head of estoppel this note covers only cases where it was sought to be maintained that an infant was estopped by his tortious acts, amounting to deceit, at the time of the execution of a contract; and it does not cover cases of mere acquiescence in the contract.

tract, nor admissions, nor cases of fraud or admissions by others than the infant (as by guardians) for his benefit.

a. When estoppel to plead infancy in an action on contract.

The authorities are divided, and no general American rule can be stated. But while there are some cases in which it is said that an infant cannot be bound by anything that he may do before his majority, either by way of contract or estoppel (Silms v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 300, 26 L. ed. 87; Wieland v. Koblick, 110 Ill. 16, 51 Am. Rep. 678; Corey v. Burton, 32 Mich. 32; Lackman v. Wood, 25 Cal. 147; Alvey v. Reed, 115 Ind. 149, 17 N. E. 265; Carpenter v. Carpenter, 45 Ind. 142 [although, as the last case says, the infant's false representation may furnish ground of an action against him for the tort]); and while the weight of authority in this country seems to be to the effect that an infant is not estopped by his false representations from using his infancy as a shield against the contracts induced by his fraud,—yet the authorities to the contrary are respectable in number.

The decisions in the older states are generally of the first kind.

So, in New York, Conroe v. Birdsall (1799) 1 Johns. Cas. 127, 1 Am. Dec. 105, is the earliest authority. The defendant, upon being asked by the plaintiff's agent, at the time of the execution of the bond on which the action was brought, whether he was of age, replied that he was. The plaintiff contended that the infant ought not to be allowed to set up his own fraud, but it was held that infancy was a defense. The court said: "No decision can be found which carries the doctrine of fraud, or its effects in relation to infants at common law, to this extent. . . . The cases cited were in equity."

And Brown v. McCune (1851) 5 Sandf. 224 (supra, II. a), also an action on contract, went upon the ground that estoppel would simply have the effect of rendering the infant's contracts valid. The court said: "We are not aware that any case has gone the length of holding a party estopped by anything he has said or done while he was under age. . . . If he were thereby estopped from denying his majority, the contract would, of course, be adjudged valid and obligatory upon him. A contrary doctrine would overturn the whole law relative to the contracts of infants." Ackley v. Dygert, 33 Barb. 176, 193, semble, is in accord.

And it was reasserted in Studwell v. Shapter, 54 N. Y. 249 (supra, II. a), that fraudulent representation would not give validity to a contract otherwise invalid.

But in New York Building Loan Bkg. Co. v. Fisher (1897) 23 App. Div. 363, 48 N. Y. Supp. 152, a case in equity (mortgage foreclosure), the usual equitable rule in such cases was disregarded, and again infancy was held to be a good defense.

Carolina Interstate Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Black, 119 N. C. 323, 25 S. E. 975, a case of an infant married woman, is exactly in accord. (Compare Pemberton Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Adams, 53 N. J. Eq. 258, 81 Atl. 280, and the English cases, infra, V. b.)

In New Hampshire (Burley v. Russell, 10 N. H. 184, 34 Am. Dec. 146) it is the law that an infant is not estopped, by his fraud as to his age, from setting up his infancy, in assumpsit, to avoid his contract.

And in Vermont the rule is the same. In Whitcomb v. Joslyn, 51 Vt. 79, 31 Am. Rep. 678, where an infant, by means of representing himself of age, bought a wagon, paying part, the seller retaining a lien for the rest, and on default the wagon was sold by the vendor, it was held that the infant was not estopped to avoid his contract and sue for the money paid. The court said: "The false representations . . . do not make the contract any more binding than it otherwise would be." Carpenter v. Carpenter, 45 Ind. 142, is an almost identical case.

And in an action to establish a lien on a building for materials it was held that an infant cannot make himself liable on his contracts by simply holding himself out as an adult. Price v. Jennings, 62 Ind. 111.

The Pennsylvania rule seems to be the same. Keen v. Coleman, 89 Pa. 299, 80 Am. Dec. 524, was an action on a bond executed by a married woman representing herself as a widow. The court said: "As in the case of infancy, it is not a case of privilege, but of legal incapacity to contract, that stands in the way of the plaintiff's recovery on this bond. The wrong done cannot make the contract good by way of estoppel. . . . If a legal incapacity can be removed by a fraudulent representation of capacity, then the legal capacity would have only a moral bond or force, which is absurd."

This was followed by Ledger Loan & Bldg. Assn. v. Cook, 6 W. N. C. 428, an action on a mortgage. It appeared that one of the mortgagors was a married infant, although she had made affidavit at the time of the execution of the mortgage that she was of full age, and the court held that judgment must be in her favor. And Neff v. Landis (1885) 110 Pa. 204, 1 Atl. 177, supra, II. a, is by implication to the same effect.

And in Massachusetts, in Merriam v. Cunningham, 11 Cnsh. 40, an action on contract for the keep of horses of the infant defendant, who represented himself to be of full age, Bigelow, J., said: "The fraud of the defendant, if ever so clearly shown, does not restore validity to his promise, or, in any way, enhance its obligation."

But in Baker v. Stone (1884) 186 Mass. 405, where an infant borrowed money on a mortgage without disclosing her minority, from one who, she knew, believed her to be of age, the court, while holding that she was not estopped from avoiding the mortgage, expressly said that the facts did not present the question as to estoppel of an infant who has induced one to accept a deed by fraudulent misrepresentations that he was of age.

Burdett v. Williams, 30 Fed. 697, decides that an infant's fraud as to his age, on signing shipping articles, does not estop him from rescinding his contract and suing on quantum meruit.

In Minnesota the rule is the same. Conrad v. Lane, 26 Minn. 389, 37 Am. Rep. 412, 4 N. W. 693, was an action for goods sold to an infant on credit. He was not estopped from pleading his infancy by his fraud as to his age.

In accord are Folds v. Allardt, 35 Minn. 488, 29 N. W. 201, and Alt v. Graff, 65 Minn. 191, 68 N. W. 9, mortgage foreclosure cases.

But the rule seems to be contra in New Jersey (as to mortgage foreclosure), Texas, and Victoria, Australia.

In Pemberton Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Adams, 58 N. J. Eq. 258, 31 Atl. 280, an action on a mortgage, the defendant having secured the loan by fraud as to his age, the court said: "The law will not, under such circumstances, allow a fraud-doer to protect himself under the plea of infancy." This was on the authority of Hayes v. Parker, 41 N. J. Eq. 630, 7 Atl. 511, infra, V. b.

W. 977, the father of an infant carried on a business of his own under the name of his daughter, the defendant, who was aware of the fraud. The daughter, sued on an account, pleaded infancy, and it was held that it was the law in Texas that a minor could be held to contracts secured by his fraudulent representations; and an earlier case, apparently supporting this decision, is Carpenter v. Pridgen, 40 Tex. 32. Of the same general class is Campbell v. Ridgely, 13 Vict. L. Rep. 701, supra, II. a, with regard to the question of estoppel.

In Cobbey v. Buchanan, 48 Neb. 391, 67 N. W. 176, it is held that, in order that an infant may be estopped from setting up infancy to an action on a contract (for legal services in this case), by his representing that he was of age, the representation must have been fraudulently made, and believed, relied upon, and acted upon by the other party.

In England an attempt to apply the doctrine of estoppel to evade the rule that an infant is not responsible for his fraud in inducing a contract was unsuccessfully made in Miller v. Blankley (1878) 38 L. T. N. S. 527, supra, II. a.

But in an earlier case, in bankruptcy,—Es parte Unity Joint Stock Mut. Bkg. Assn. (1858) 3 DeG. & J. 63, 27 L. J. Bankr. N. S. 83, 4 Jur. N. S. 1257,—it was decided that an infant who had obtained a loan by fraudulently representing himself to be of age made himself liable in equity for the amount; the equitable rule applying in bankruptcy proceedings.

Where, however, an infant represented that he was of age, to the agent of the other party to a marriage settlement who was herself present and knew his real age, the contract was not binding upon him in equity when he became of age. Nelson v. Stocker (1859) 4 DeG. & J. 458, 28 L. J. Ch. N. S. 760, 5 Jur. N. S. 751.

b. When estopped to reassert title, or to demand a second payment.

In England, owing partly, no doubt, to the effects of the hard rule of Johnson v. Pye, Sid. pt. 1, p. 258, 1 Lev. 169, 1 Keble, 905 (supra, II. a), courts of equity have gone much further than in this country to prevent an infant of years of discretion from taking advantage of his own fraud to the damage of innocent persons, although in courts of law he is always protected from estoppel by his fraudulent representations, contrary to the rule in many American jurisdictions.

This tendency is first shown in Clare v. Bedford, 13 Vin. Abr. 536. An infant clerk of an attorney, on whose land he held a mortgage, engrossed a mortgage deed of the same land to a third person, and the claim of the second mortgagee was preferred to that of the infant.

And Hanning v. Ferrers (1712) 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 356, is a stronger case. An infant remainderman, although not privy to the making by the life tenant of a long lease to one who believed the lessor to have the fee, where he allowed the lessee to spend much money on the land, was not allowed to profit by his fraud.

But Savage v. Foster (1723) 9 Mod. 35, a similar case on the facts, except that the fraud was committed by a married woman, settled the equitable rule, the court saying that it was an apparent fraud not to give notice of title to the intended purchaser, and in such case infancy or coverture would be no excuse.

Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1794, 1 W. Bl. 575, deciding that an infant mortgagee cannot avoid his reconveyance made upon payment because he is compellable by law to make it, is an important case on account of Lord Mansfield's much-quoted maxim: "The privilege of infants is a shield, and not a sword. It shall protect them from fraud and oppression, but shall not be turned into an offensive weapon to assist fraud and oppression."

So, in Beckett v. Cordley, 1 Bro. Ch. 352, 358, where an infant executed a discharge of her interest, and later reclaimed it, but no fraud on her part was made out, it was said: "If there was a fraud of which the infant was consant, she would be bound as much as an adult."

And in Cory v. Gertcken, 2 Madd. 40, where an infant persuaded his trustee to make a payment to him, the concealment of his infancy was held to be a fraud, and precluded him from calling for a repayment.

Overton v. Banister, 3 Hare, 503, 9 Jur. 906, was on similar facts, and it was held that payment by the trustee operated as a discharge for the amount, although the general release by the infant was no bar.

And in Wright v. Snowe (1848) 2 DeG. & S. 321, it was even held that an infant representing that he is of age, who executes a release, on which the other party acts, cannot impeach its validity, whether the other knows his real age or not.

And in Inman v. Inman (1873) L. R. 15 Eq. 260, 21 Week. Rep. 433, where an infant, with the sworn statement that he was of age, executed a charge on a fund, and upon reaching his majority executed a mortgage upon the same fund to one without notice of the former charge, it was held, upon an application by the later encumbrancer for funds of the infant in the hands of the court, that the second charge was a valid disaffirmance of the first, and, the infant not himself seeking to take advantage of his fraud, it would not avail the first lender against the second.

The American cases are conflicting, but the great weight of authority is in accord with the English cases.

The opinion in Hayes v. Parker (1886) 41 N. J. Eq. 630, 7 Atl. 511, states the general rule very clearly. Here an infant, by representing himself of age, secured a settlement with his guardian, and executed a discharge, but was not permitted to compel his guardian to account. The court says: "At law, . . . he [an infant] is incapable of fraudulent acts which will estop him from interposing the shield of infancy. . . . In equity, however, this rigid rule has its exceptions. Equity will regard the circumstances surrounding the transaction,—the appearance of the minor, his intelligence, the character of his representations, the advantage he has gained by the fraudulent representations, and the disadvantage to which the person deceived has been put by him,—in determining whether he should be permitted to invoke successfully the plea of infancy."

New York is in accord with this rule. Spencer v. Carr (1871) 45 N. Y. 406, 6 Am. Rep. 112, while not actually an authority to this effect, was expressly followed, as to the implication contained in it, in Blakeslee v. Sincepaugh (1893) 71 Hun, 412, 24 N. Y. Supp. 947. The former held that an infant who signed her mother's name, at her request, to a deed of the daughter's land, was not estopped, in the absence of proof of intentional fraud on the infant's part, from asserting her title. In Blakeslee v. Sincepaugh the infant stated to the purchaser of land of which he was actually the owner that he had no title, and it was held that he was estopped to sue in ejectment, 57 L. R. A.

ing "an infant of sufficient age to appreciate his rights and duties."

Johnson v. Clark, 23 Misc. 346, 51 N. Y. Supp. 238, where an infant, representing himself of age, gave jewelry for poker chips, and was held not estopped to reclaim it, went on the ground of the special rule as to gambling contracts.

An infant who conveys land, falsely representing himself of age, cannot have his deed set aside on the ground of infancy (Schmitheimer v. Eiseman [1870] 7 Bush, 298 [see however, Wilson v. Wilson, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1971, 50 S. W. 260, infra]; Ryan v. Growney [1894] 125 Mo. 474, 28 S. W. 189, 755; Williamson v. Jones [1897] 48 W. Va. 562, 38 L. R. A. 694, 27 S. E. 410; and Kilgore v. Jordan [1856] 17 Tex. 341, semble); but in Vogelsang v. Null, 67 Tex. 463, 8 S. W. 451, an infant who was asked, under the same facts as in the last case, as to her age, and did not answer, another answering for her, was not estopped.

A case similar to the last in facts, but with a contrary result, is Adams v. Fite, 3 Bart. 70. An infant sold his land, concealing his minority, but without active misrepresentation, and the grantee had good reason to believe that he was of age. The court held the infant estopped on these facts, combined with the acquiescence of the grantor for twenty years after attaining his majority.

In Ferguson v. Bobo, 54 Miss. 121, an infant, with knowledge of her rights, conveyed land to her father to enable him to borrow, and the father later conveyed to the mortgagee. She was estopped to set up her legal title. But in Brantley v. Wolf (1882) 60 Miss. 420, an infant who had sold land without mentioning his age was not estopped.

And mere receipt of the consideration, and apparent acquiescence by the infant in the unauthorized sale of land by a trustee, will not estop him. Wille v. Brooks, 45 Miss. 542.

In Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 437, 38 Am. Rep. 18, where an infant remainderman was held estopped from repudiation of a sale of land by the life tenant, the infant having received his share of the consideration, it is said that no infant, lunatic, or married woman can be permitted to receive, hold, and enjoy the proceeds of a sale of property, whether the sale is by an order of a court irregular and void, or by the wrongful act of an individual, without being estopped from a repudiation of the sale.

In Montgomery v. Gordon, 51 Ala. 377, 380, a case not involving fraud by an infant, it is said that an infant is incapable of being affected by an estoppel in pais, of which fraud is not an element; and the infant was not precluded from recovery.

And in Gillespie v. Nabors, 59 Ala. 441, 31 Am. Rep. 20, a case holding that an infant cannot be estopped by his guardian's unauthorized act in selling his land, it was said that infants, as a rule, can do no act which will amount to an estoppel in pais.

In Ontario it has been held (Bennetto v. Holden, 21 Grant, Ch. [U. C.] 222) that where an infant conveying land represented herself as of age, and after majority conveyed to others who had knowledge of the earlier grant, she was bound by her misrepresentations.

In South Carolina there are four cases under this head, in each of which an infant's slaves had been sold by his father.

Hall v. Timmons, 2 Rich. Eq. 120, was a bill in equity for the specific delivery of a slave. The infant was fifteen years old at the time of the sale, and did not object to it. The case went off on another point, but the court said that if the infant knew his rights he would be estopped.

In Norris v. Walt, 2 Rich. L. 148, 44 Am. Dec. 283, which was trover for a slave, the infant had not stated his title at the time of the sale. He was not estopped to reclaim his property.

And in Norris v. Vance, 3 Rich. L. 164, the infant, with his father, signed the bill of sale, saying he was of age. In trover for the slave, it was held that he was not precluded by his fraud.

But in Barham v. Turbeville, 1 Swan, 437, 57 Am. Dec. 782, where the infants said that the father's title was good, and denied their own, the court held them estopped, and said: "In cases of actual fraud the principle of estoppel should apply at law as well as in equity, to protect the title of an innocent purchaser."

... This rule ... applies to infants as well as to adults."

Irwin v. Morell, Dudley (Ga.) 72, is a similar case, where the infant allowed her father to mortgage her slave without objection. In trover brought by the infant upon reaching her majority, the court said that infancy was no protection, provided the minor had arrived at those years of discretion when a fraudulent intent could be reasonably imputed to him. Strain v. Wright, 7 Ga. 568, is to the same effect.

But in Dillard v. Dillard, 8 Humph. 41, where a girl merely did not object to the sale of her slave, she was allowed to recover him, the court holding that her rights were not affected unless she did some act by which bidders were induced to purchase.

In Louisiana, it seems, an infant is precluded as much as an adult. "It is an error to suppose that the law can sanction the perpetration of frauds by minors; the truth and reality of bona fide transactions are as binding upon them as upon majors." Guidry v. Davis, 6 La. Ann. 90.

But in several states it is held that in such circumstances an infant cannot be estopped to assert title.

In Ohio an infant who fraudulently represents himself to be of age is not estopped to disaffirm the sale of his land, after majority. Mills v. Rodgers, 3 West. Law Month. 262.

In Illinois three cases (Davidson v. Young, 38 Ill. 145; Kane County v. Herrington, 50 Ill. 232; and Dorlague v. Cress, 71 Ill. 380) decided that simple silence or consent of an infant would not estop him to set up his title; and in Wieland v. Koblick (1884) 110 Ill. 16, 51 Am. Rep. 676, it was decided that an infant was not estopped by a false statement in her deed that she was of age, the court holding that the doctrine of estoppel was inapplicable to infants. And with this, Sims v. Everhardt, 102 U. S. 800, 28 L. ed. 87, and Lackman v. Wood, 25 Cal. 147, are in accord.

In Watson v. Billings, 38 Ark. 278, 281, 42 Am. Rep. 1, where an infant married woman executed a release of dower, making a representation to the officer taking the acknowledgment that she was of age, but it was not proved that the statement was known to the releasee, upon her bringing her bill in equity to establish her dower, the court said, in upholding the bill, that infants cannot by fraud denude themselves of the protection thrown around them by the policy of the law.

A Pennsylvania case, Stoolfoos v. Jenkins, 12 Serg. & R. 403, decided that an infant who executed a release of her land (without representing herself of age) is not estopped to disaffirm on attaining her majority. But the court says that the case does not present the question "whether there may not be cases of 57 L. R. A.

such gross and palpable fraud, committed by an infant arrived at an age of discretion, as would render it proper to punish him by the loss of his land."

And in Williams v. Baker, 71 Pa. 476, an infant was held not estopped to reassert in ejectment title to land sold by her, by the fact that the certificate of acknowledgment contained the words "the said [plaintiff] being of full age, and by me duly examined, etc."

So where a girl of seventeen years executed a deed containing a recital to the effect that the grantor was of full age, but intended no fraud, she was not estopped to disaffirm the conveyance, even against creditors of her grantee, who had acquired liens. Wilson v. Wilson, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1971, 50 S. W. 260.

Where an infant married woman conveyed land to one who believed her to be of full age, and who later improved the land with the grantor's knowledge, she was held not to be guilty of such fraud as to estop her from setting up title to the land, although she had enjoyed the consideration received, and although the grantee had conveyed to an innocent purchaser in the meantime. Buchanan v. Hubbard, 96 Ind. 1.

Rundle v. Spencer, 67 Mich. 189, 34 N. W. 548, was a bill to stay proceedings in ejectment brought by one who had sold the land in question when under age. The court expressly avoided putting the decision on the ground of estoppel, and decreed a stay, on the equities of the case, saying that, as a general rule, the doctrine of estoppel should not be predicated upon the acts and conduct of an infant. This was plainly to evade overruling the general rule laid down by Cooley, J., in Corey v. Burton, 32 Mich. 32 (supra, V. a.), to the effect that estoppel does not apply to infants.

And it is said in Harmon v. Smith, 38 Fed. 482, that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply to minors, "unless their conduct is intentional and fraudulent."

c. When compelled in equity to make satisfaction for his fraud.

In England, courts of equity have exercised their powers with greater freedom than in this country in compelling fraudulent minors to make restitution.

In Watts v. Creswell, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 515, Lord Cowper said: "If an infant is old and cunning enough to contrive and carry on a fraud, . . . he ought to make satisfaction for it." Here an infant remainderman, who conducted negotiations to mortgage the land for the benefit of his father, the life tenant, the latter making an affidavit of title in fee in himself, was compelled to account.

And in Evroy v. Nicholas (1733) 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 488, an infant, who approved of a long lease by his guardian and witnessed the lease, was compelled, upon avoiding it on reaching his majority, to make a new lease, or refund the consideration, at his election.

So, in Clarke v. Cobby (1789) 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 173, a woman made notes, and later married an infant, who gave a bond and received the notes in exchange. In an action on the bond the defendant pleaded his infancy, and upon the plaintiff filing a bill in equity for relief the court compelled the defendant to give up the notes in exchange for his bond, on the principle that "an infant shall not take advantage of his own fraud."

But where an infant, without representation as to his age, contracted with one who supposed him to be of age, he was not charged, in equity, on his contract. Stikeman v. Dawson, 1 DeG. & S. 90, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 295, 11 Jur. 214, 4 Railway Cas. 585.

And in a recent case where an infant induced the plaintiff to lease him a house, by representations that he was of age, he was ordered to give up possession, and the lease was declared void; but the infant was not charged for use and occupation. Lempriere v. Lange, L. R. 12 Ch. 675, 41 L. T. N. S. 378, 27 Week. Rep. 879.

There are two American cases of this class. In Geer v. Hovy (1790) 1 Root, 179, the petition alleged that the defendant pretended that he was of full age, and the plaintiff exchanged horses with him, and the defendant "cheated him, and he is without remedy at law." But the court held: "A minor is no more liable in equity, than law, for fraud in a contract, for, if he is incapable of making, he is incapable of committing a fraud in, a contract; besides, this would defeat the law made for the protection of minors, if, although they would not be liable upon their contracts, yet, by using deceit in them, they should be made liable."

In Georgia, however, where an infant bought a negro, paying part and for the balance giving a note which he later disaffirmed, the seller brought a bill in equity, and the court decreed the sale of the negro, to reimburse the infant and to pay the balance to the vendor; on the ground that the remedy of the vendor at law was inadequate and difficult. Strain v. Wright (1849) 7 Ga. 508.

VI. Liability of an infant as trustee or officer.

In Smally v. Smally (1700) 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 6, it is said (obiter): "An infant may be executor, and shall be charged because the law enables him. So, he may be charged in trover, because a tort, but not on contract."

So, in Loop v. Loop, 1 Vt. 177, it is said: "A breach of this trust [of executor] can never be covered by infancy;" and the court decided that the infant executor was properly held to an account as if he had been an adult.

But in England the rule seems now to be different: and an infant executor who never proved the will, but received assets of the estate and paid them over to his mother, who was entitled to the use of the property for life, was, on account of his infancy, held not to be under any liability to account for them. Stott v. Meanock, 31 L. J. Ch. N. S. 746, 10 Week. Rep. 605.

This decision was based expressly upon Hindmarsh v. Southgate, 3 Russ. Ch. 324. This was a case of an administrator, but the principle was said, in Stott v. Meanock, to be the same.

And Russell's Case (1478) 5 Coke, 27a, is (obiter) to the same effect, the court saying that a release by an infant executor would not bar him, because if it should be a bar it would be a devastavit.

And an infant administrator was said, in Whitmore v. Weld, 1 Vern. 326, 2 Ch. Rep. 383, 8 Ch. Cas. 167, to be unable to commit a devastavit.

In Carow v. Mowatt, 2 Edw. Ch. 57, it was held that where an infant was, by inadvertence, appointed administrator, he could not be made to account for his receipts during infancy.

Saum v. Coffelt, 79 Va. 510, is in accord on this point; and so is Young v. Purvis, 11 Ont. Rep. 597.

But, it seems, an infant constable levying on property is liable in trespass. Green v. Burke, 23 Wend. 490, at p. 504.

McConnell v. Kennedy, 29 S. C. 180, 7 S. E. 76, however, holds that an infant specially deputized to execute a warrant can make a lawful arrest, although ineligible to the office of constable. 57 L. R. A.

VII. Summary.

An infant is liable for his torts which are not connected with, and do not arise out of, his contracts. This liability is the rule without regard to the age of the infant, and without regard to whether he acted at the command of another, except in case of actual duress; but an infant who has not reached years of discretion is not liable to exemplary or punitive damages. (Supra, I.)

As to torts committed by an infant for the purpose of inducing another person to contract with him, there is conflict. In England he is not responsible for his misrepresentations as to things (his age, for instance), other than the subject-matter of the contract itself, by which misrepresentations he induced a contract, because it is said that (a) to make him liable for his deceit would be to enforce the contract, for which he is not liable by the policy of the law; and that (b) the deception practised is part of the contract itself.

But in this country the overwhelming weight of authority is contrary to the English rule, cases in only two states (Massachusetts and Maryland) having held that an infant is not liable in deceit for such misrepresentations. And it is apparently always possible to replevy goods delivered on credit to an infant and still in his possession, when he has obtained the possession by deceit. And in four states all uncertainty as to liability, where the infant falsely represents himself to be of age, has been removed by statute. (Supra, II. a.)

But where the infant's representations are in regard to the subject-matter of the contract, as, for instance, warranty of goods sold by him, they constitute part of the contract, for which he cannot be made liable. (Supra, II. b.)

In regard to injuries done by an infant to property bailed to him, if the damages are occasioned simply through his ignorance or negligence, he is not responsible. (Supra, III. a. 1.) But where the wrong is deliberate or intentional, he is responsible in trover or trespass, even if the wrongful act were expressly provided against in the contract of bailment. But in two states (Pennsylvania and New Jersey) he is held not responsible, on the ground that to make him liable would indirectly enforce the contract. (Supra, III. a. 2.)

And he is always liable for refusal to deliver goods in his possession as bailee. (Supra, III. a. 3.)

In the case of contracts other than bailments, the rule is the same, in regard to negligent, as distinguished from wilful, acts. (Supra, III. b. 1, 2.)

And in cases of torts more remotely connected with contracts an infant is generally liable. (Supra, IV.)

As to estoppel of an infant, there are two classes of cases: First, where, in an action upon a contract induced by his fraudulent misrepresentations that he was of age, he sets up his infancy as a defense; and, second, where he has given a deed of property, or executed a release for money due him, and later seeks to recover the property, or compel a second payment, upon the pretense that he has elected to avoid his deed or contract of sale, or release, upon reaching his majority. As to the first class he is not estopped, except in a few jurisdictions, and never in an action strictly at law, upon the contract. This is upon the ground that estoppel would have the effect simply of validating the contract, against the policy of the law. (Supra, V. a.)

But as to the second class, he is generally estopped in this country (although some few cases hold that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply at all to infants), and always in England. (Supra, V. b.)

In England, also, such a fraudulent infant can be compelled in equity to account, or to make specific restitution, where he has obtained property or a loan by fraud; but in this country the powers of courts of equity have not been exercised so widely in this direction. (Supra, V. c.)

An infant trustee cannot be made to account for assets received by him when under age; but an infant who occupies an office for which he is legally ineligible may be liable in tort for his official acts. (Supra, VI.)

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT.

GUARANTY TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Frederick GROTRIAN, Jr., et al.

(114 Fed. 433.)

Money paid by the drawee upon a draft drawn against "indorsed bills of lading" which are in fact fictitious, and accepted "against" such bills in ignorance of the fraud, may be recovered back from the payee.

(February 4, 1902.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover back money alleged to have been paid by mistake upon an acceptance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Wallace and Lacombe, Circuit Judges, and Townsend, District Judge.

Mr. Edward Percy Hamlin, with Messrs. Davies, Stone, & Auerbach, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff in error did not warrant the bill of lading to be genuine, and in the absence of any knowledge of a forgery, or of any representation which it knew to be false, cannot be held liable for the damage resulting therefrom to the defendants in error.

In cases of ambiguity the language of the acceptance must be construed most strongly against the acceptors.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 225; Meyer v. Decroix, 65 L. T. N. S. 653; Cowan v. Hallack, 9 Colo. 572, 13 Pac. 700.

The practical construction of the contract by the parties themselves may be resorted to for the purpose of aiding in its interpretation.

New York v. New York Refrigerating Constr. Co. 8 Misc. 61, 28 N. Y. Supp. 614; Easton v. Pickersgill, 55 N. Y. 310; Parks v. Jacob Dold Packing Co. 6 Misc. 570, 27 N. Y. Supp. 289.

The condition of the acceptance having been discharged by the delivery of the bills of lading, there is no mistake and no ground of recovery.

It is the duty of the drawee, and not of the indorsee, to pass upon the genuineness of the bills of lading.

Robinson v. Reynolds, 2 Q. B. 196; Thiedemann v. Goldschmidt, 1 De G. F. & J. 4; Woods v. Thiedemann, 1 Hurlst. & C. 478; Leather v. Simpson, L. R. 11 Eq. 398; Ulster Bank v. Synnott, Ir. Rep. 5 Eq. 595; Goetz v. Bank of Kansas City, 119 U. S. 551, 30 L. ed. 515, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 318; Hoffman v. National City Bank, 12 Wall. 181, 20 L. ed. 366; Craig v. Sibbett, 15 Pa. 238; Young v. Lehman, 63 Ala. 519.

The defendants in error are not entitled to recover as for money paid under a mistake.

Hoffman v. National City Bank, 12 Wall. 181, 20 L. ed. 366.

By payment before maturity and before the arrival of the Buffalo, the defendants in error waived any possible recourse they might have had against the plaintiff in error on the theory of an acceptance conditional upon the existence and arrival of the flaxseed in port.

Beinhauer v. Gleason, 15 N. Y. S. R. 227; Mansfield v. Cheslyn, 2 L. J. K. B. 85; Rorabacher v. Lee, 16 Mich. 189; Holbrook v. Wilson, 4 Bosw. 64; Swanek v. Nichols, 20 Ind. 198; Evansville, I. & C. S. L. R. Co. v. Dunn, 17 Ind. 603.

Messrs. Dill, Bomeisler, & Baldwin, for defendants in error:

Money paid under a mistake of fact can be recovered.

United States v. Barlow, 132 U. S. 271, 33 L. ed. 346, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77; Kelly v. Solari, 9 Mees. & W. 54; White v. Continental Nat. Bank, 64 N. Y. 319, 21 Am. Rep. 612.

Grotrian & Co., upon presentation of the bill of exchange, did not give an absolute acceptance, but they did give a conditional acceptance, which resulted in a new contract between the holder and the acceptor.

It is the right of the holder of a bill of exchange to insist upon an absolute, unconditional acceptance, and he may decline a conditional one, and protest.

Shackelford v. Hooker, 54 Miss. 716; Dan. Neg. Inst. ¶ 508; Green v. Raymond Bros. 9 Neb. 298, 2 N. W. 881; Lamon v. French, 25 Wis. 37; Crowell v. Plant, 53 Mo. 145.

This was a conditional acceptance.

Smith v. Vertue, 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 59.

The delivery of what purported to be a bill of lading did not satisfy a condition which demanded the delivery of a bill of lading. A forged bill of lading is not a bill of lading, any more than counterfeit money is real money, or a forged check a good check.

NOTE.—The effect of the acceptance of a draft accompanied by bill of lading as creating an obligation for the performance of the contract for the sale of the goods included in the bill of lading is considered in a note to Finch v. Gregg (N. C.) 49 L. R. A. 679.

Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co. 1 Pet. 445, 7 L. ed. 214.

After the acceptance by Grottrian & Co. the Guaranty Trust Company could only have recovered upon the draft by proving the performance of the condition.

Townsend, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

John Glen, of New York city, drew a draft upon Grottrian & Co., plaintiffs, in these words:

Frederick B. Grottrian & Company, New York. 1911
Exchange for £1,518. 8. 7 stg.

11 Nov., 1898.

Sixty days after sight of this first (second unpaid) pay to my order in London fifteen hundred and eighteen pounds 8. 7 sterling, value received, and charge the same to account of 8,417.50 bush. flax seed.

John Glen.

To F. B. Grottrian & Co., Hull.

To this draft he attached forged duplicate bills of lading for the flaxseed mentioned in the draft, and on the same day he cashed the draft with defendant. The defendant, ten days later, presented to the plaintiffs for acceptance the draft accompanied by the forged bills of lading and an insurance policy. The plaintiffs accepted the draft in these words:

Hull, 21st Nov., 1898.

Accepted, payable at Lloyd's Bank, Ltd., London, against indorsed bills of lading for 8,417 bushels of flaxseed per Buffalo S. S. at New York & Certificate of Insurance $8,500.

Fred. B. Grottrian & Co.

Due 22d Jan., 1899.

There was no representation as to the genuineness of the bill of lading. At the time of the presentation of the draft for acceptance the steamship Buffalo had not arrived at Hull, England, but was in transit. A few days before her arrival the plaintiffs, in order to procure possession of the goods immediately upon arrival, took up the draft, and paid to the defendant, Glen's assignee, $7,319.29. Plaintiffs, at the time of said acceptance and payment, believed the bills of lading to be genuine, and that the flaxseed was on the steamship. There was no such flaxseed on the steamship, and immediately upon discovering the fraud, plaintiffs notified the defendant, and have since duly tendered to defendant the draft, bills of lading, and insurance policy, and have demanded repayment of the $7,319.29. Defendant insists that the acceptance of the draft bound the plaintiffs absolutely without regard to the genuineness of the bills of lading, and that, whether or not defendant could have recovered judgment against plaintiffs if payment of the draft had been refused, the money paid by them cannot be recovered back. It is not disputed that the unconditional acceptance of a draft accompanied by a paper purporting to be a bill of lading, but fictitious, binds the acceptor in ordinary cases, as between him and the payee, where both parties are ignorant of the fraud, even though the payee has cashed the draft for the drawer before presenting it for acceptance to the drawee. In the case at bar, however, plaintiffs rely on the direction in the draft to charge the amount to account of the flaxseed, and the acceptance "against indorsed bills of lading." The defendant insists that by "bills of lading" in the acceptance is to be understood the papers in the form of a bill of lading accompanying the draft, and that, even if the plaintiffs had delayed payment of the draft until its maturity, whereby the fraud would have been discovered before payment, defendant could nevertheless have sued and recovered judgment; and this preliminary question is of vital importance. No case precisely in point has been cited. In Smith v. Vertue, 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 59, it was said that an acceptance substantially like that of the plaintiffs was conditional, and that the bill of lading must be delivered to enable payee to recover; but no question of genuineness was involved, and the statement is obiter. The principal cases on this subject in the United States courts are Hoffman v. National City Bank, 12 Wall. 181, 20 L. ed. 366; Goetz v. Bank of Kansas City, 119 U. S. 551, 30 L. ed. 515, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 318. In Hoffman v. National City Bank, bills of exchange accompanied by forged bills of lading were discounted by a bank, and subsequently accepted by the drawees. The drawers of the bills had been accustomed to ship flour to the plaintiffs, who, at the request of the drawers, and on their representations that the flour mentioned in the bills of lading had been shipped to their firm for sale, promised to accept them, and did accept them on presentation. The acceptors paid the bills, and, on learning of the forgery of the bills of lading, tendered the same, with the bills of exchange, to the bank, and, repayment being refused, brought suit. The court refers to the argument that the plaintiffs accepted the bills of exchange upon the faith and security of the bills of lading attached to the same, and says: "It is not perceived that the concession, if made, would benefit the plaintiffs, as the bill of exchange are in the usual form, and contain no reference whatever to the bills of lading; and it is not pretended that the defendants had any knowledge or intimation that the bills of lading were not genuine." And again: "Beyond doubt the bills of lading gave some credit to the bills of exchange beyond what was credited by the pecuniary standing of the parties to the same; but it is clear that they are not a part of those instruments, nor are they referred to, either in the body of the bills or in the acceptance, and they cannot be regarded in any more favorable light for the plaintiffs than as collateral security accompanying the bills of exchange."

In Goetz v. Bank of Kansas City—a similar case—the court cites with approval the doctrine in Hoffman v. National City Bank that, supposing the plaintiffs accepted the bills of exchange upon the faith and security of the bills of lading attached, that fact would not benefit them, as the bills of exchange were in the usual form, and contained no reference whatever to the bills of lading. In most of the cases of acceptance of drafts accompanied by forged bills of lading, cited by defendant, there were special circumstances influencing the equities between the parties, as that the acceptor was the regular correspondent of the drawer, and had been accustomed to accept such drafts from him, or had authorized the making or discounting of the drafts, and in all of said cases the acceptance was unconditional. In the present case, no facts are alleged which establish an equity in favor of the payee against the acceptor. Defendant might have refused to receive any acceptance other than an absolute one. In fact, Glen had given it a written assignment of the draft, in which it was particularly stated that it might exercise this option. The request to pay was conditioned upon the delivery of the flaxseed, and plaintiff's acceptance of the draft was conditioned upon the delivery of the indorsed bills of lading for it. The payment of the draft before the arrival of the steamer does not justify a construction of the entirely intelligible words "indorsed bills of lading," as importing "documents purporting to be indorsed bills of lading," or as importing documents in the form of bills of lading attached to this draft.

It is contended that the equities are equal, and therefore that the party having the money should retain it. This would have been the case if the acceptance had been unconditional. Defendant first paid the money and received the forged documents. But, under their conditional acceptance, plaintiff had a right to genuine documents and to rely on the genuineness of those delivered upon the discharge of their obligation. The precedents cited by defendant of waiver of condition by payment without performance of the condition are cases where the party paying knew at the time of payment that the condition had not been performed. Here both parties supposed that it was performed, and no such waiver can be inferred. There was no relinquishment of any right, for the parties were ignorant of the facts. A waiver is an intentional relinquishment of a known right. Transfer of valid bills of lading would have been equivalent to delivery of the flaxseed.

Finally, defendant contends that this is a case where a pledgee had given an order to a third party to receive the security upon payment of the debt, and that the party paying cannot recover back the money from the pledgee on the ground that the security was found to be valueless; and cites Ketchum v. Stevens, 19 N. Y. 499; Baker v. Arnot, 67 N. Y. 448; and Aiken v. Short, 37 Eng. L. & Eq. 592. In each of these cases the court held that under the particular circumstances the plaintiff paid the debt as the agent of the original debtor, and that the transaction was, in effect, a redelivery of the security to the original pledgee, and a subsequent transfer by him to the plaintiff. But in the present case the plaintiffs qualified their acceptance so as to make it dependent upon the shipment of the flaxseed and the genuineness of the bill therefor. They paid the money, not on the original contract of the drawer, but upon the new contract created by their conditional acceptance, and the assent thereto of defendant. In Aiken v. Short, cited at length in Ketchum v. Stevens, which is relied on in Baker v. Arnot, Baron Bramwell said: "It seems to me that the right to recover money paid under a mistake of fact must have reference to a belief of the existence of a fact which, if true, would have given the person receiving a right against the person paying the money."

The case at bar falls within this rule. The acceptance herein was conditioned upon receipt of bills of lading, which, however, were forged, and therefore nullities, unless some intervening right should arise,—as by estoppel, agency, or otherwise. It is true, the payment was prematurely made, but no intervening rights or liabilities were acquired or imposed. Defendant had no rights under the forged papers, and, if he had any, they would not have been prejudiced. Munger v. Shannon, 61 N. Y. 251; Brill v. Tuttle, 81 N. Y. 454, 37 Am. Rep. The judgment is affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY of Manchester et al., Appts.,
v.

NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE COM-

(50 C. C. A. 188, 112 Fed. 199.)

1. An insurer which receives an assignment of the mortgagee's claims against the mortgagor upon paying him the amount due by it under its policy on the mortgaged property cannot, in an accounting of all sums received from the various policies on the property by the mortgagee, who is seeking to enforce his mortgage for an unpaid balance, insist that he should be charged with the portion of the sum received under another policy which he is charged to have wrongfully permitted to go to the mortgagor, where the amount kept by him out of such payment was more than the share of the mortgage indebtedness chargeable to that policy.
2. A provision in one of several insurance policies on mortgaged property, that, in case the insurer is compelled to make payment to the mortgagee when it is under no liability to the mortgagor, it shall be subrogated to the mortgagee's security, does not make the insurer a surety for the mortgage debt, so as to entitle it to challenge settlements made, while it was contesting its liability on its own policy, by the mortgagee with other insurers, or charge him with sums which he might have received, but failed to receive, from such policies.
3. One of several insurers of mortgaged property, who pays the amount due on its policy to the mortgagee, and becomes subrogated to his security, cannot charge, in satisfaction of the mortgagee's demands against the security, a sum allowed by a court of competent jurisdiction to the mortgagor's attorney out of recovery on other policies, either on the ground that the mortgagor had parted with his interest so as not to be entitled to an allowance for attorneys' fees, since that question was settled by the order, or on the ground that the mortgagee was at fault in not appealing from the order, where the insurer's interest had attached before the order was passed, and it failed to object to the allowance, or to indemnify the mortgagee against the expense of appealing.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska in favor of complainant in a proceeding to establish a mortgage lien. Affirmed.

Statement by Thayer, Circuit Judge:

The appeal in this case arises out of the following facts: Conrad Bohn and William G. Bohn, in September, 1888, executed a mortgage in favor of the National Life Insurance Company, the appellee, whereby they conveyed certain property, with improvements thereon, which were situated in Douglas county, Nebraska, to secure the payment of their notes to the amount of $25,000. The Bohns agreed to keep the improvements on the mortgaged property insured to the amount of $25,000 for the security of the mortgagee, and in pursuance of that agreement took out policies for the following amounts in the following companies: In the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company, $1,500; in the Norwich Union Fire Insurance Company, $3,500; in the Syndicate Insurance Company of Minneapolis, Minnesota, one of the appellants, $5,000; in the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company of Manchester, New Hampshire, one of the appellants, $2,500; in the Glens Falls Insurance Company of New York, $7,500; and in the Hanover Fire Insurance Company and in the Citizens' Fire Insurance Company, $5,000. On March 12, 1891, the improvements on the mortgaged property were destroyed by fire, the mortgagee having up to that time made payments on the mortgage indebtedness to the amount of $4,657. On November 17, 1892, the Glens Falls Insurance Company settled its policy by paying the sum of $7,700, of which amount $7,035 was paid to the National Life Insurance Company, and credited on the mortgage debt, while the residue, amounting to about $666, was paid to the Bohns; they claiming to have an insurable interest in the property which was covered by that policy. On July 14, 1891, the Bohns instituted suits against all of the aforesaid companies to recover the amount alleged to be due on their respective policies in the district court of Douglas county, Nebraska; and on December 21, 1891, the National Life Insurance Company, as mortgagee, also brought suits against said companies on the same policies, claiming the sums due thereon in its own right as mortgagee. The actions against the Syndicate Insurance Company and against the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company were subsequently removed to the Federal court for the district of Nebraska and were there tried, resulting in judgments against the last-named companies. The other actions remained in the state court, and were there tried, resulting eventually in judgments against the several insurance companies. All of the judgments so recovered against the several insurance companies have heretofore been paid. On April 20, 1895, when the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company and the Syndicate Insurance Company paid the judgments that had been recovered against them, respectively, the National Life Insurance Company, to whom the payments were made, assigned to the New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company one tenth, and to the Syndicate Insurance Company two tenths, of its interest in the Bohn mortgage as that interest existed at the date of the fire. Omitting the recitals, the material part of these assignments—both of them being alike, except as to names, the amount of money received, and the interest assigned—was as follows:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of twenty-seven hundred seventy-one and 51-100 dollars, this day paid to the National Life Insurance Company of Montpelier, Vermont, mortgagee under said mortgage clause, by the said New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, said sum being in full settlement of said company's liability to said mortgagee by reason of said loss and damage under the said policy, said National Life Insurance Company, mortgagee, does hereby assign, set over, transfer, and subrogate to the said New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company one tenth of all the right, title, claim, and interest which said National Life Insurance Company had in said mortgage or trust deed above described at the time of said fire, and in and to the note or notes therein described; and it is agreed that all interest which hereafter accrues upon said mortgage to the extent of the proportion aforesaid shall inure and be paid to said insurance company, and that no release of any kind for any amount of said notes or mortgage, or any part thereof, shall be made by said trustee or mortgagee until said company shall have received therefrom the sum paid said mortgagee as aforesaid, with the interest thereon at the same rate as provided in and by said notes from the date thereof until paid, subject only to the rights of the said mortgagee to the balance of its claim to be first paid from such security."

In July, 1891, the National Life Insurance Company brought an action to foreclose the aforesaid mortgage, but the proceedings in that case, after the filing of the bill, were stayed until the termination of the litigation in the various suits which were brought as aforesaid to collect the insurance. After the latter litigation was ended, and the judgments against the various insurers had been collected, the National Life Insurance Company on May 2, 1898, filed an amended and supplemental bill in the foreclosure case, wherein it prayed that an account might be taken of the moneys which it had collected from the various insurance companies which had risks on the mortgaged property, that the sum still due to it on the mortgage debt might be ascertained, and that the mortgaged premises be sold to satisfy the balance of the debt which was ascertained to be due. The New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company and the Syndicate Insurance Company, which had at that time changed its name and become the Minnesota Fire Insurance Company, each filed an answer to the supplemental bill and also a cross bill. By these pleadings they alleged, in substance, that nothing was due to the National Life Insurance Company on account of the mortgage indebtedness; that out of the moneys realized from the insurance policies it had either made or suffered improper payments to be made to the Bohns and to certain attorneys who had prosecuted the insurance suits; that, if the National Life Insurance Company was denied credit for these improper outlays, it would be found that it had received payment in full of the mortgage debt; and that by virtue of the assignments aforesaid a considerable sum of money would be found to be due to them, for which they, rather than the National Life Insurance Company, were entitled to a lien on the mortgaged property and to have the same sold for their benefit. A trial was had upon these issues, which resulted in a finding by the trial court that the sum of $2,721.28 was still due on the mortgage to the National Life Insurance Company, and that it was entitled to the greater part of the credits which it claimed. The New Hampshire Fire Insurance Company and the Minnesota Fire Insurance Company have appealed from this decree.

Argued before Sanborn and Thayer, Circuit Judges, and Adams, District Judge.

Mr. A. S. Churchill for appellants.
Messrs. Frank H. Gaines, James E. Kelby, and John A. Storey for appellee.

Thayer, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The first claim made by the appellants is that, out of the sum of $7,700 which was paid by the Glens Falls Insurance Company to settle its share of the loss that was occasioned by the destruction of the improvements on the mortgaged property, $666.55 was improperly paid to the Bohns, the mortgagors, which should have been retained by the National Life Insurance Company, the appellee, and that, because it suffered this sum to be paid to the Bohns, it should be treated as money received by itself and credited as a payment on the mortgage indebtedness in the accounting between it and the appellants. The circumstances attending the settlement with the Glens Falls Insurance Company were as follows: That company was sued upon its policy by the National Life Insurance Company, along with the other fire companies, on July 14, 1891; but in November, 1892, it professed a willingness to settle its policy for the sum of $7,400, provided the mortgagors, as well as the mortgagee, released their claim under the policy. The mortgagors, as it seems, claimed the sum of $666.55 as due to them under the policy in addition to what was due to the mortgagee, and would not execute a release unless that amount was paid to them, whereupon it was arranged that they should receive the sum demanded, and it was accordingly paid. At this time the appellants were defending the actions which had been brought against them by the National Life Insurance Company, and were denying any liability on their respective policies, and they did not pay the sums due thereon until April 20, 1895, after judgments had been recovered. Besides, it appears that the Glens Falls Insurance Company carried only three tenths of the total insurance on the mortgaged property, and all of the policies, as we understand the record, contained the usual provision that the several insurers should respectively contribute to the payment of any loss which might be sustained in the proportion that their several policies bore to the total amount of the insurance. By virtue of this provision the Glens Falls Company was liable to the mortgagee for only three tenths of the sum due on the mortgage at the time of the fire, and, as the sum so due was about $21,201.36, it would seem that the sum which was actually paid to the National Life Insurance Company on November 17, 1892, by the Glens Falls Company, to wit, the sum of $7,035, was a little more than the mortgagee was equitably entitled to demand of the Glens Falls Company at that time on account of its interest as mortgagee. This fact, that the mortgagee received as large a sum from the Glens Falls Company as it was equitably bound to pay on account of the mortgagee's interest in the insured property, is sufficient in itself to show that there is no substantial foundation for the claim now made by the appellants that the sum of money which was paid to the Bohns should be charged to the National Life Insurance Company, and treated as a payment made to it on the mortgage indebtedness in an accounting between the mortgagee and the appellants.

But that contention cannot be sustained for another reason. The theory of the appellants is that, because their respective policies contained in the mortgage clause a provision to the effect that, whenever either company paid to the mortgagee any sum for a loss under its policy and claimed that it was under no liability to the mortgagors, it should at once be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee under any securities held by it "on the property in question" for the payment of the mortgage debt, this provision in effect made them sureties for the payment of the mortgage debt, and armed them with all the rights of sureties. They further claim that, if the mortgagee held policies issued by other companies covering the mortgaged property, it could not make a settlement with the other insurers without obtaining the consent of the appellants, or, at least, that if it did make such a settlement, and accepted less than it was legally entitled to recover, it did so at its peril, 57 L. R. A.

and that the appellants, as sureties, are privileged to challenge the settlement, and insist that the mortgagee be charged with the sum it ought to have received, and to do so at any remote period, when they found it convenient or necessary to settle their own policies. We are of opinion that this is an erroneous view. The provision found in the mortgage clause did not make the appellants sureties for the payment of the mortgage indebtedness, and did not purport to place them in that relation. As above stated, it provided, in substance, that when they paid the mortgagee any sum for a loss under the policy, and claimed that they were not liable to the mortgagors, then, and not before, they should be subrogated to the rights of the party to whom payment was made as respects all securities held by such party on the "property in question" to secure the payment of the debt. This doubtless gave to the appellants the right to pay their proportion of the loss to the mortgagee, and claim subrogation as respects the mortgage existing on the property; but it did not give them the right to contest the payment of their own policies, denying all liability thereon, and at the same time insist that the mortgagee should not make a settlement with their insurers, for less than the face of their policies, without their consent. If the appellants desired to avail themselves of the right of subrogation which was reserved to them by the mortgage clause, and to acquire an interest in the mortgage, so as to be able to dictate or control settlements with other insurers, they should first have paid their respective losses. Until they did pay their own losses, the mortgagee was entitled to make any settlement with the other insurers which it deemed fair and just without consulting the wishes of the appellants. In the case of Royal Ins. Co. v. Stinson, 103 U. S. 25, 28, 26 L. ed. 473, it was said: "Where a creditor effects insurance on property mortgaged or pledged to him as security for the payment of his debt, the insurers do not become sureties of the debt, nor do they acquire all the rights of such sureties. . . . A surety of the debt might complain if the creditor should surrender to the debtor collateral securities; but an insurer of the property for the benefit of the mortgagee would have no just ground of complaint. True, after a loss has occurred and the insurance has been paid, sufficient to discharge the debt, the insurers may be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor against the debtor, and to any collateral securities which the creditor may then hold and which are primarily liable for the debt before the insurers. But even then we do not think that the creditor is bound to take any active steps to realize the fruits of a collateral or to keep it from expiring, unless the insurance be first paid and notice be given to him of a desire on the part of the insurers to be subrogated to his rights, with a tender of indemnity against expenses."

These views are strictly applicable to the case at bar, and establish the proposition that the appellants, notwithstanding the provision in the mortgage clause, did not occupy the attitude of sureties with respect to the mortgage indebtedness, and that the right of subrogation did not arise until they had paid the losses incurred under their respective policies, which losses were not paid until long after the Glens Falls policy was settled. For these reasons we concur in the view, which was expressed by the lower court, that, as respects the Glens Falls insurance, the sum paid to the mortgagors ought not to be regarded as a sum paid to the mortgagee and charged against it as a payment in its accounting with the appellants.

The next proposition contended for by the appellants is that, in the accounting between themselves and the National Life Insurance Company, the latter company should be charged with the sum of $1,127, which sum, as it is claimed, was erroneously paid to Byron G. Burbank, an attorney at law, out of the moneys collected from the various insurance companies on their policies. This payment to Burbank was made under the following circumstances: Burbank was the attorney of record for William G. and Conrad Bohn, the mortgagors, in all of the insurance suits, both those which were tried in the Federal court and those that remained in and were tried in the state court. On or about February 15, 1894, Burbank filed a claim for an attorney's lien on the sums due under the policies for services rendered in enforcing the collection of the same. Such a claim was filed in three of the actions that were pending in the state court. In one of the cases an allowance was made in his favor in the sum of $420, in another in the sum of $600, and in another in the sum of $107. No opposition appears to have been made by anyone to the allowance of these several demands for legal services rendered for and in behalf of the Bohns, although a notice of the claim which was filed in one of the cases appears to have been served by Burbank upon the attorney who now represents the appellants. The several claims as made by Burbank were allowed by orders of court duly entered of record in the several cases in which the claims were preferred, one on October 22, 1896, and the other on January 9, 1897.

The contention of the appellants with respect to the sum paid to Burbank may be stated as follows: That the Bohns had no interest in the policies upon which they caused suits to be instituted by Burbank, because they had sold and conveyed the insured property prior to the fire; that by reason of such conveyance they had no right to an allowance for counsel fees out of the moneys recovered on the policies; that the National Life Insurance Company should have resisted the claim; and that, as it did not do so, it should now be charged with the sum erroneously paid to Burbank. We have not been able to concur in this view of the law for the following reasons:

The allowances were made in the several cases pending in the state court, and it appears to have been held by the state court that the Bohns did have an insurable interest in the property covered by the policies, and that they were entitled to maintain actions on the same and to recover for their own benefit whatever was due thereon in excess of the amount of the mortgage indebtedness. Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Bohn, 48 Neb. 743, 750, 751, 67 N. W. 774, 777. The suits that were brought by the Bohns and those that were brought by the National Life Insurance Company were consolidated for trial in the state court, so that in that court the mortgagors and the mortgagee were treated as joint plaintiffs; and while the amount which each plaintiff was entitled to recover was not formally stated in the several judgments, yet when the court allowed the claims of Burbank for services rendered for and in behalf of the Bohns, and directed them to be paid out of the sums recovered, that was in effect an adjudication that the mortgagors were at least entitled to so much of the sums recovered as were awarded to their attorney. As this was an adjudication of a question which was properly before the state court for determination, the ruling made thereon must be accepted as conclusive. The state court adjudged, in effect, that the sum which it ordered to be paid to Burbank was not due to the National Life Insurance Company, but to the mortgagors; and, even if it should be conceded that this ruling was erroneous, yet such concession would afford no sufficient reason for charging the National Life Insurance Company with a sum of money which was not paid to it, and which it was not allowed to recover.

Nor are we able to decide that the National Life Insurance Company should be charged with the sum of money in question because it did not appeal from the orders making the allowances in favor of Burbank. These orders were made after the appellants had paid their own policies and had become subrogated to an interest in the mortgage by a formal assignment of an interest amounting to three tenths. It was their duty to appear and object to the allowances if they deemed them erroneous, and the fact that they did not so appear, or request the National Life Insurance Company to appear, and object thereto, and that they did not tender to the latter company any indemnity against the costs and expenses which would be incurred by taking such appeal, effectually prevents them at this time from making any objections to the allowances within the doctrine heretofore quoted from Royal Ins. Co. v. Stinson, 103 U. S. 25, 28, 26 L. ed. 473, 477.

Another objection was made by the appellants in the trial court, and is renewed here, to a payment in the sum of $2,500, which the National Life Insurance Company made to its attorneys for long and laborious services rendered by them in prosecuting the numerous suits to final judgments. The trial court sustained this exception to the extent of reducing the credit claimed to the sum of $800, which latter amount it considered a reasonable allowance for services that had been rendered in behalf of the National Life Insurance Company in collecting the amount due from the Gleps Falls Insurance Company. We perceive no reason whatever why the National Life Insurance Company should not be allowed credit in its accounting with the appellants for this latter sum, and we think it most probable that the appellants would have had no just ground for complaint if a greater credit had been allowed. However, as the appellee took no exception to the action of the lower court, and has not appealed, we are not called upon to decide whether an error to its prejudice was committed.

No other questions are presented by the record which in our judgment deserve special notice, and the decrees below is accordingly affirmed.

COLD BLAST TRANSPORTATION COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

KANSAS CITY BOLT & NUT COMPANY.

- *1. A contract for the future delivery of personal property is void for want of consideration and mutuality, if the quantity to be delivered is conditioned by the will, wish, or want of one of the parties; but it may be sustained if the quantity is ascertainable otherwise, with reasonable certainty.
2. An accepted offer to furnish or deliver such articles of personal property as shall be needed, required, or consumed by the established business of the acceptor during a limited time is binding, and may be enforced, because it contains the implied agreement of the acceptor to purchase all the articles required by his business during this time, from the party who makes the offer.
3. But an accepted offer to sell or deliver articles at specified prices during a limited time, in such amounts or quantities as the acceptor may want or desire in his business, or without any statement of the amount or quantity, is without consideration and void, because the acceptor is not bound to want, desire, or take any.
4. Accepted orders for goods under such void contracts constitute sales of the goods thus ordered, on the terms of the contracts; but they do not validate the agreements as to articles which the one refuses to purchase, or the other refuses to sell or deliver, under the void contracts, because neither party is bound to take or deliver

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain articles sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

This writ of error challenges a judgment on the pleadings in favor of the defendant in error, who was the plaintiff in the court below. For convenience, the plaintiff in error will be called the "defendant," and the defendant in error the "plaintiff," in this statement, and in the opinion which follows it. The plaintiff's petition stated a cause of action upon a verified account for $5,573.43. The defendant in its answer denied the averments of the petition, and pleaded a counterclaim for $5,341.94 damages for the failure of the plaintiff to deliver to the defendant after June 1, 1899, certain manufactured articles which it ordered and needed, and which the defendant alleged that the plaintiff was bound to deliver under an alleged written contract, which it averred was made and broken in this way: On October 27, 1898, the plaintiff sent to the defendant this letter:

Kansas City, Mo., Oct. 27, '98.

C. S. Ullman, Esq., Purchasing Agent Cold Blast Transportation Co., S. & S. Packing Co.

Dear Sir:—

We offer to deliver at your works, during six months from November 1st, 1898, the following materials at the prices stated:

Bar iron, $1.20 flat delivered by car, $1.25 by wagon.

Soft steel bars, $1.25 car load, $1.30 by wagon.

Machine bolts, 80 and 10% discount.

U. S. Std. sq. nuts, $6.50 off.

" hex. " 7.40 off.

70 % off extras for tapping.

—and will make in part payment No. 1 wrought scrap at $8.50 net ton, or arch bars and transoms at $10.50 net ton, or wrought iron car axles at $12.50 net ton, delivered your works; the quantity of scrap to be taken not to exceed the weight of materials sold to you. Yours truly,

R. C. Howes, Sec'y.

With option of renewal for 6 months from June 1st, 1899.

The K. C. Bolt & Nut Co.,

R. C. Howes, Sec'y.

On receipt of the proposition contained in this letter the defendant accepted it; and between November 1, 1898, and June 1, 1899, it ordered, the plaintiff delivered, and the defendant paid for, nuts, bolts, and bars of the character specified in the letter, under the terms and at the prices there stated. Before June 1, 1899, the defendant notified the plaintiff that it exercised its option to renew the contract evidenced by the letter and acceptance. Between June 1, 1899, and December 1, 1899, the defendant ordered of the plaintiff nuts, bolts, and bars of the character described in the letter, which it needed in its business, which the plaintiff refused to deliver, and which the defendant was forced to purchase of others at prices which, in the aggregate, exceeded those specified in the alleged contract between the parties by $5,341.94. In addition to the counterclaim, which has been stated, the defendant pleaded an offset of $2,727.18, founded on the alleged fact that the plaintiff had charged that amount in excess of the prices specified in the alleged contract for nuts, bolts, and bars which it had furnished to the defendant on its orders between June 1, 1899, and December 1, 1899. The answer of the defendant was not verified. There was a reply to it. But upon this review of a judgment upon the pleadings against the defendant the averments of the reply became immaterial because the allegations of the answer stand admitted, and those of the reply which assert new matter are denied. The only question for consideration is whether the answer stated any legal defense, counterclaim, or offset to the cause of action pleaded by the plaintiff.

Argued before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. N. H. Loomis, R. W. Blair, and O. L. Miller, for plaintiff in error:

The party making a promise is bound to nothing until the promisee within a reasonable time engages to do, or else does or begins to do, the things which are the condition of the first promise. But after an engagement on the part of the promisee which is sufficient to bind him, then the promisor is bound also, because there is now a promise for a promise, with entire mutuality of obligation. So, if the promisee begins to do the thing in a way which binds him to complete it, here, also, is a mutuality of obligation; but if, without any promise whatever, the promisee does the thing required, then the promisor is bound on another ground. The thing done is itself a sufficient and a complete consideration.

Contracts should be upheld if possible, rather than declared void; and the court will take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the parties, and give effect to their manifest intention when it can do so without violating the language actually used; and, when it can be done without contradicting the terms of a contract, the obligations intended by the parties will be implied; and this is especially true where the parties have in large part performed the contract, as in the case at bar, according to such intention of the parties as interpreted by them.

The neglect or refusal of the defendant to order goods under this letter would give no right of action to the plaintiff. In other words, there was no mutuality of promise for the sale of a definite or ascertainable quantity of the material.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The main question in this case is whether or not the answer states a legal counterclaim. The basis of this counterclaim is that the plaintiff failed to deliver nuts, bolts, and bars between June 1, 1899, and December 1, 1899, under the alleged renewal of the so-called contract of October 27, 1898. This supposed contract consisted of a written offer to deliver manufactured articles in unnamed quantities at certain specific prices at any time between October 27, 1898, and June 1, 1899, and the acceptance of that offer, without more. The answer contains no averment that either the plaintiff or the defendant paid any consideration or performed any act to induce the contract, except the remitting of the offer 57 L. R. A.

by the plaintiff, and the sending of its acceptance by the defendant. There was, therefore, in the inception of this alleged agreement no consideration for the promise of either of the parties to it, except the promise of the other. Neither the letter nor the acceptance names any quantity or amount of the articles specified that is to be delivered or received under it. The plaintiff does not agree to deliver, nor does the defendant contract to receive or pay for, any quantity or amount whatever of the articles named in the writings. A promise is a good consideration for a promise. But no promise constitutes such a consideration which is not obligatory upon the party promising. It must bind the promisor, so that the promisee may maintain an action for its breach, or it is without legal effect and void. A promise to furnish, deliver, or receive specified articles at certain prices, without any agreement to order or to accept any amounts or quantities of the articles, is without binding force or effect, because neither party is thereby bound to deliver or to accept any quantity or amount whatever. Such promises are void, because they lack one of the essential elements of an agreement,—certainty in the thing to be done. Contracts for the future supply during a limited time of articles which shall be required or needed or consumed by an established business, or used in the operation of certain steamships or other machinery, are no exceptions to this principle, because they fall under the rule, Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. But an accepted promise to furnish goods, merchandise, or other property, at certain prices, during a limited time, in such quantities as the acceptor shall require or want in his business, is without consideration and void, because the acceptor is not bound thereby to require or take any articles whatever under the supposed agreement. The line of demarcation between valid and invalid contracts here runs between the requirements of machinery, or of an established business, and the wants, desires, or requirements of the tentative vendee; and that because the former are either reasonably certain, or may be made so by evidence, while the latter are conditioned by the will of the tentative vendee alone, and are both uncertain and capable of infinite variation.

It is, however, contended that even if this alleged contract was void in its inception, it became valid and binding upon the parties when the defendant ordered, and the plaintiff delivered and received payment for, a large quantity of the manufactured articles at the prices and in accordance with the terms of the letter of October 27, 1898. But the fatal defect in the alleged contract was that the plaintiff was not bound to deliver, nor the defendant to take and pay for, any specific quantity of the offered articles. As to all undelivered articles, that defect still inheres in the agreement. The plaintiff is not bound to deliver, nor the defendant to take and pay for any articles that have not been delivered, because there is no specification in the alleged contract of the amount or quantity which the one is to deliver and the other to receive. The orders for these articles which have been filled by their delivery specified the amounts so delivered, and thus effected contracts for their sale. But these orders and deliveries have in no way remedied the fatal defect of the offer and acceptance regarding those articles which the defendant has ordered, and the plaintiff has refused to deliver. The defendant never agreed to order or to pay for any quantity of these undelivered articles. If it had refused to order and take them, no action could have been maintained for its failure, because no court could have determined what amount it was required to take. Nor can an action be better maintained against the plaintiff for its failure to deliver the articles which the defendant has ordered, because the offer contains no measure of the quantity which the plaintiff was to deliver, and consequently no agreement on its part to deliver any whatever. As the contract was void in its inception, and has continued to be void as to all undelivered goods, the notice of its renewal which was delivered by the defendant was futile, since the renewal of a void contract but continues its invalidity.

It is said that the intention of the parties was to make an agreement that the plaintiff should sell and deliver, and the defendant should buy, all the articles of the character specified in the offer which should be needed or required by its business between October 27, 1898, and June 1, 1899; that the purpose of the construction and interpretation of contracts is to ascertain the intention of the parties; and that this contract should be interpreted to effect this intent. The answer is that, while ambiguous terms and doubtful stipulations may be interpreted to carry out the intention of the parties when they fairly evidence it, their secret intention cannot be imported into contracts whose terms and meaning are plain and unambiguous, and do not express it. It is only the intention of the parties which the contract itself expresses that the courts may enforce. In the case at bar the offer of the plaintiff is nothing but a price list. The acceptance of the defendant contains no agreement to buy any of the articles specified in the list, and there is no ambiguity in the terms, or doubt in the meaning, of the writings in issue. To give effect to the intention of the parties which the defendant now alleges would be to ascribe to them a purpose, and to make and enforce for them a contract, which their writings neither express nor suggest; and this is beyond the province of the courts. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bagley, 60 Kan. 424, 431, 56 Pac. 759; Woolsey v. Ryan, 59 Kan. 601, 54 Pac. 664; Davie v. Lumberman's Min. Co. 93 Mich. 491, 24 L. R. A. 357, 53 N. W. 625; Vogel v. Pekoc, 157 Ill. 339, 30 L. R. A. 491, 42 N. E. 386; Campbell v. Lambert, 36 La. Ann. 35, 51 Am. Rep. 1; Dayton, W. Valley & X. Turnp. Co. v. Coy, 57 L. R. A.

13 Ohio St. 84; Stensgaard v. Smith, 43 Minn. 11, 44 N. W. 869.

The rules applicable to contracts of this class may be thus briefly stated: A contract for the future delivery of personal property is void, for want of consideration and mutuality, if the quantity to be delivered is conditioned by the will, wish, or want of one of the parties; but it may be sustained if the quantity is ascertainable otherwise with reasonable certainty. An accepted offer to furnish or deliver such articles of personal property as shall be needed, required, or consumed by the established business of the acceptor during a limited time is binding, and may be enforced, because it contains the implied agreement of the acceptor to purchase all the articles that shall be required in conducting his business during this time from the party who makes the offer. Wells v. Alexandre, 130 N. Y. 642, 15 L. R. A. 218, 29 N. E. 142; Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Whitebreast Coal Co. 160 Ill. 85, 31 L. R. A. 529, 43 N. E. 774; Parker v. Pettit, 43 N. J. L. 512. But an accepted offer to sell or deliver articles at specified prices during a limited time in such amounts or quantities as the acceptor may want or desire in his business, or without any statement of the amount or quantity, is without consideration and void, because the acceptor is not bound to want, desire, or take any of the articles mentioned. Bailey v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535, Gil. 465; Tarboe v. Gotsian, 20 Minn. 139, Gil. 122; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Bagley, 60 Kan. 424, 433, 56 Pac. 759; American Cotton Oil Co. v. Kirk, 15 C. C. A. 540, 34 U. S. App. 60, 68 Fed. 791; Crane v. C. Crane & Co. 45 C. C. A. 96, 105 Fed. 869. Accepted orders for goods under such void contracts constitute sales of the goods thus ordered at the prices named in the contracts, but they do not validate the agreements as to articles which the one refuses to purchase, or the other refuses to sell or deliver, under the void contracts, because neither party is bound to take or deliver any amount or quantity of these articles thereunder. Crane v. C. Crane & Co. 45 C. C. A. 96, 105 Fed. 869; American Cotton Oil Co. v. Kirk, 15 C. C. A. 540, 34 U. S. App. 60, 68 Fed. 791; Campbell v. Lambert, 36 La. Ann. 35, 51 Am. Rep. 1; Houston & T. O. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 38 Tex. 85, 95; Ashcroft v. Buttermoorth, 136 Mass. 511, 514; Drake v. Vorse, 52 Iowa, 417, 3 N. W. 465; Thayer v. Burchard, 99 Mass. 508, 520; Hoffman v. Maffioli, 104 Wis. 630, 47 L. R. A. 427, 80 N. W. 1032, 1035; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Jones, 53 Ill. App. 431, 437; Rafolovits v. American Tobacco Co. 73 Hun, 87, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1036.

Tested by these rules, the accepted offer of October 27, 1898, was void in its inception for want of consideration and mutuality. No quantity of nuts, bolts, or bars was named in the offer or in the acceptance. The defendant was not bound to order, to receive, or to pay for any of the articles named in the offer; and there was therefore no consideration for the offer itself, and no mutuality in the supposed agreement. The orders which were made and filled prior to June 1, 1899, constituted valid contracts for the purchase and sale of the goods so ordered at the prices named in the offer. But they effected no agreement on the part of the defendant to order, or on the part of the plaintiff to deliver, any other goods under the offer, because the amount of goods whose delivery was contemplated was still unnamed. The defendant was not legally bound to order, to receive, or to take any articles which it had not ordered, so that there was still no consideration and no mutuality in the contract as to any articles which the defendant had not ordered, or which the plaintiff had not delivered. The refusal of the plaintiff to honor the orders of the defendant was therefore no breach of any valid contract, and formed no legal cause of action for the counterclaim.

It is specified as error that the court refused to permit the defendant to amend its answer at the trial so as to allege that it orally, and by the written contract, agreed to purchase all of the goods of the kinds mentioned in the offer of October 27, 1898, "that it might use or desire to use during the times mentioned in the contract," but no argument is presented in support of this specification, and no plausible reason for its assignment is suggested. If the amendment had been allowed, the alleged contract would still have been void, because, under the agreement stated in the amendment, the defendant would not have been bound to desire to use, or to use, any of the articles mentioned in the price list, and there would still have been no mutuality in the contract. Moreover, the granting of the motion was discretionary with the court below, and it was made so late that it would have been no abuse of discretion to have denied it if the amendment had been material. It was properly denied because the amendment was immaterial, because if it had been allowed the answer would not have stated facts sufficient to constitute a legal counterclaim, and because its allowance was discretionary, and there was no abuse of that discretion.

In addition to the counterclaim which has been considered, the answer contained a denial of the allegations of the complaint, and an offset against the plaintiff's claim for the sum of $2,727.18, which the defendant alleged the plaintiff had charged it in excess of the prices specified in the offer of October 27, 1898, for goods delivered subsequent to June 1, 1899. But the statutes of Kansas provide that, "in all actions, allegations of the execution of written instruments and indorsements thereon, of the existence of a corporation or partnership, or of any appointment or authority, or the correctness of any account duly verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney, shall be taken as true unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the party, his agent or attorney." Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 95, § 108.

The correctness of the account set forth in the plaintiff's petition was verified by affidavit. The denial in the answer and the offset which it pleads challenge the correctness of this account. But the answer was not verified. Consequently, under the express provisions of the statute which has been quoted, the verified account must be taken as true, and neither the denial nor the offset can be considered under the pleadings.

The judgment below was right, and it is affirmed.

Cassandra PURPLE, Piff. in Err.,
v.
UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

- *1. One who, knowing that a conductor has no authority to grant free transportation, enters and rides upon his train, with the deliberate intention not to pay his fare, under an agreement, or under a tacit understanding, with the conductor that he shall ride free, commits a fraud upon the railroad company, and is not a passenger, but is a mere trespasser, to whom the only duty of the company is to abstain from wilful or reckless injury.
2. One who enters and rides upon a car or train which he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence would know, is prohibited from carrying passengers, is a trespasser, and not a passenger; and the only duty of the railroad company toward him is to abstain from wanton or reckless injury to him.
3. In the absence of any rule or practice permitting freight trains to carry passengers, the presumption is that one riding for his own convenience on a freight train, an engine, a hand car, or any other carriage of a common carrier not designed for the transportation of passengers, is unlawfully there, and is a trespasser.
4. One about to board a train, who has knowledge of facts which would put a person of ordinary prudence and diligence upon inquiry to ascertain whether or not the train is permitted to carry passengers, is charged with a knowledge of all the facts which a reasonably diligent inquiry would discover.
5. It is not error to refuse to instruct the jury that a defendant is guilty of gross negligence, as distinguished from ordinary negligence on the one hand, and wilful or reckless negligence on the other, because there is no such legal degree of negligence as "gross" negligence. The word "gross" in this connection is a mere epithet used to characterize one of the two legal classes of negligence mentioned.
6. The statement of facts in a bill of ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kansas to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

On the 9th of January, 1900, Cassandra Purple, who is the widow of Harry G. Purple, brought an action against the Union Pacific Railroad Company for negligence causing his death. She alleged that on October 18, 1899, between Laramie and Cheyenne, in the state of Wyoming, he was a passenger upon a train of the railroad company, and was killed through the negligence of the latter by another train which ran into the rear of that upon which Purple was riding. The railroad company denied these allegations, and averred that Purple was riding upon an extra freight train, which was prohibited from carrying passengers, that he knew that this train was not authorized to carry passengers, and that he was riding without pass or other free transportation, with the intention of paying no fare. The issues presented by these pleadings were submitted to a jury, which returned a verdict for the defendant, and a writ of error has been sued out to reverse the judgment founded upon this verdict. The case is presented upon a bill of exceptions, which contains but a portion of the evidence. It discloses these facts: The train upon which Purple was riding was an extra freight train running east from Laramie to Cheyenne. It was prohibited from carrying passengers by the rules of the company, but those rules permitted regular freight trains to take passengers. At Sherman, on its way from Laramie to Cheyenne, it became a section of passenger train No. 6. The sectionizing of a train is the act of the train despatcher. It is an act of temporary application, and may be discontinued at any suitable point. Its sole purpose is to give certain track rights that a train does not possess before the order is issued. The order at Sherman which made this train a section of regular passenger No. 6 directed a freight train ahead of this one, this train, regular passenger No. 6, another passenger train, and another freight train to run as sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the regular passenger No. 6. These sections were running in this way when the accident occurred. The evidence of the defendant tended to show that an extra freight train did not lose its distinctive character as such by being made a section of a passenger train, but that it still remained an extra freight train. One of the rules of the company was that, where "freight trains on which passengers are allowed to be carried are run in sections, 57 L. R. A.

the last section of the train only" will be permitted to carry passengers, and another was that "conductors will collect fare from all persons traveling without a ticket or pass, and will be allowed no discretion in the matter."

Harry G. Purple was an employee on the Union Pacific Railroad from 1884 until 1893, and a part of the time was a conductor. The rules for the operation of this road in force at the time of his death were the same as those in force when he was employed upon the road, and at that time he was thoroughly familiar with them. The train upon which Purple rode left Laramie at 8.15 P. M. on October 15, 1899. Its conductor was an old friend and acquaintance of Purple. The train consisted of 27 or 28 freight cars and a caboose. Purple had been visiting at Laramie for two or three days, and he had in his pocket on this day a time card which disclosed the fact that this train which he boarded was not a regular freight train, and therefore was not entitled to carry passengers. He was in the train despatcher's office before the departure of the train, and that despatcher could have informed him that this was not a regular freight train. The evidence of the defendant tended to prove that he had no intention of paying his fare, and that there was a tacit understanding between him and Davis, the conductor of the freight train, that he was to be permitted to ride on this train from Laramie to Cheyenne without the payment of any fare. He did not pay or offer to pay fare, nor did the conductor or anyone else ask him to do so.

The bill of exceptions contains a statement that all evidence tending to show the fact or character of the defendant's negligence is found in it, and that there was no evidence in the case tending to show wanton, wilful, or reckless disregard on the part of the company of the safety of the deceased. These are the principal facts disclosed by the record which condition the determination of the questions presented by the alleged errors specified in this case, which all relate to the charge of the court and to its refusal to give certain requested instructions.

Argued before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Hutchings & Keplinger, for plaintiff in error:

The evidence shows that the train upon which Purple was riding at the time of his death was represented on the time-table, and therefore it was a regular freight.

It was not sufficient for defendant to show that the train which Purple entered was not entitled to carry passengers. It must at least go one step further, and show that the train upon which he was riding at the time of the accident was not entitled to carry passengers. The train upon which he entered may not have been, while the one upon which he was riding at the time of the accident may have been, entitled to carry passengers.

Assuming that the sectionizing of the train changed it from one which was not, into one which was, entitled to carry passengers, the fact that there was an understanding that no fare was to be paid did not prevent one from being a passenger.

Whatever the rule may be in cases where freight trains are exclusively for the carriage of freight, a different rule governs in cases and as to roads where, as a general rule, freight trains carry passengers, and where all freights do so under some circumstances.

Purple was not a trespasser. The only wrongful act on his part was in accepting transportation without payment of fare; but this did not render his presence in the caboose a trespass.

The freight train upon which plaintiff's husband was riding was not permitted to carry passengers. He was a trespasser upon the train.

Purple was guilty of perpetrating a fraud upon the rights of the company, and he was simply a trespasser.

ceased being a trespasser upon the train, defendant would be responsible for his death only in the event of a wilful, wanton, or reckless disregard of his safety.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The court refused to instruct the jury that the deceased was a passenger on the freight train of the defendant at the time he was injured, and that if he was killed by the negligence of the company the plaintiff was entitled to recover. This ruling is the first and the chief complaint of counsel for the plaintiff in error. There are, however, two reasons why this specification of error cannot be sustained.

In the first place, Purple had no pass, ticket, or permit to ride free upon this train, he paid no fare, and there was evidence tending to prove that he did not intend to pay fare, and that there was a tacit understanding between him and the conductor, Davis, that he should ride free. He was a man of years, intelligence, and experience. He had been employed upon this railroad for about nine years. He knew that he had no right to ride, and that the conductor of this train had no authority to permit him to ride, without the payment of his fare. The rules governing the operation of this railroad during the nine years when he was employed upon it prohibited this course of action, and they forbade it when he was killed. He had been familiar with these rules during the nine years of his employment upon this railroad, from 1884 to 1893, and in the seven years which followed, from 1893 to 1899, before he was injured, it is hardly possible that he could have forgotten or could have become ignorant of the specific fact that conductors were not empowered to grant free transportation upon this railroad, or of the general and universally known fact that it is not the custom to permit them to do so upon any railroad. If, knowing this fact, he entered and rode upon this train with the deliberate intention not to pay his fare, under the tacit understanding between himself and the conductor that he should not pay it, the entire transaction was a fraud upon the railroad company, and a deliberate attempt to appropriate transportation without compensation, in violation, not only of the rules of the company, but also of the civil and the moral law. If he entered and continued upon this train under this understanding with the settled intention not to pay his fare, the relation of passenger and carrier was never created between him and the company, but he was a mere trespasser upon its property, fraudulently appropriating his ride, and the only duty which the company owed to him was to abstain from wilfully or recklessly inflicting injury upon him. One who, knowing that a conductor has no authority to grant free transportation, enters and rides upon his train with the deliberate intention not to pay his fare, under an agreement or under a tacit understanding with the conductor that he shall ride free, commits a fraud upon the railroad company, and is not a passenger, but is a mere trespasser, to whom the only duty of the company is to abstain from wilful or reckless injury. Condran v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 28 L. R. A. 749, 14 C. C. A. 506-508, 32 U. S. App. 182, 185, 67 Fed. 522, 523; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 250; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Co. 64 Tex. 146; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Campbell, 76 Tex. 175, 13 S. W. 19; Way v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 48, 52 Am. Rep. 431, 19 N. W. 828, 73 Iowa, 463, 35 N. W. 525; Hendry v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 45 Kan. 377, 25 Pac. 893; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Whipple, 39 Kan. 531, 18 Pac. 730; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gants, 38 Kan. 608, 17 Pac. 54. A contract is indispensable to the relation of carrier and passenger. The minds of the parties must meet upon the agreement that the carrier will transport and the passenger will pay for the transportation, in the absence of a specific agreement or permission by the proper officer of the transportation company that the latter will carry the passenger without compensation. This contract of carriage may, it is true, be express or implied, but if it does not exist in either form the relation of carrier and passenger cannot have been created. An implied agreement to pay fare, and hence the relation of carrier and passenger, undoubtedly arises where one enters a passenger car and rides towards his destination. But it is equally true that if one enters and rides under an express or implied agreement with a conductor, whom he knows or has reasonable cause to believe has no authority to make such a contract, that he shall not pay his fare, but shall cheat the company out of the transportation, no contract of carriage is created, but the existence of such an agreement is conclusively negated by the actual fraudulent contract so that it cannot exist. Therefore, if the deceased entered and rode under the fraudulent understanding with the conductor that he should pay no fare and with the deliberate intention to pay none, there was neither an express nor an implied agreement that he should pay for his transportation, and no relation of carrier and passenger arose, because the minds of Purple and the conductor never met upon any such contract, but came together upon the contrary understanding that Purple should pay no fare and should not be a passenger, but should fraudulently appropriate his transportation. The bill of exceptions instructs us that there was evidence tending to establish this state of facts, and in the presence of it the court properly refused to instruct the jury that Purple was a passenger, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover if he was killed by the negligence of the defendant, because if this state of facts existed he was not a passenger, and the limit of the duty of the defendant toward him was to refrain from wilful and reckless injury to him.

In the second place, Purple was riding on a train which was prohibited from carrying passengers by the rules of the company, and there was evidence tending to prove that he either knew this fact, or had notice of such facts as would have led a person of ordinary prudence and diligence to an inquiry which would have disclosed its existence. The record is clear that at the time Purple boarded the train on which he rode to his death that train was an extra freight train, which was forbidden to take or carry passengers. After he started upon his ride and at Sherman it was made the second section of regular passenger train No. 6 by the orders of the train despatcher, but the character of the train and the number of the cars remained unchanged. It still contained the 27 or 28 freight cars and caboose with which it started from Laramie, and it contained no passenger cars. The orders of the despatcher made this the second of five sections running on the time of regular passenger train No. 6. The first section which preceded it was a freight train, the two sections which followed it were passenger trains, and the fifth or last section was a freight train. Thus, this passenger train No. 6 consisted of five sections, the first, second, and fifth of which were composed exclusively of freight cars and cabooses, and were in fact freight trains.

It will be convenient to notice here the earnest argument of counsel for the plaintiff presented in the discussion of another specification of error to establish the proposition that, if the extra freight train on which Purple was riding was prohibited from carrying passengers before it reached Sherman, it was permitted to do so after it passed that point, so that at the time Purple was killed it was not under this ban. Stated in syllogistic form, this is the contention: The rules permitted regular freight trains to carry passengers and forbade extra freight trains to do so. They declared that regular freight trains were those running on schedule time, while extra freight trains were those which did not run upon such time. Prior to its arrival at Sherman the train on which Purple rode was not running on the schedule time of any train. After it passed Sherman it ran on the schedule time of regular passenger train No. 6. It therefore became from that time a regular train, because it was running on the schedule time of the regular passenger train, and hence it became authorized to carry passengers before the fatal injury was inflicted. This argument is not persuasive or convincing, because the composition, character, and function of the train on which Purple rode remained the same after it became a section of the passenger train that it was before that time, and because after it passed Sherman it was not running on any schedule time prescribed for it upon the time card, but upon the time of a passenger train, under the special and temporary orders of the train despatcher. It is, however, unnecessary to discuss this question, because the right of the conductor of this train to carry passengers upon it after it passed Sherman is conclusively negatived by another admitted rule of the company. That rule is that, where freight trains on which passengers are allowed to be carried are run in sections, the last section of the train only will be permitted to carry the passengers. If, therefore, this became a regular freight train authorized to carry passengers when it passed Sherman, it was only the fifth section of this freight train which was permitted to do so, while the conductor of the second section, on which Purple was riding, was expressly prohibited from exercising this privilege. The train upon which Purple rode, therefore, was when he boarded it, and continued to be until the fatal collision, a train which was forbidden by the rules of the company to accept or carry him as a passenger.

Purple had worked on this railroad for nine years,—from 1884 to 1893. During a part of this time he had been a conductor upon the railroad. The rules for the operation of the railroad were the same in 1899, when he was injured, that they were in 1893, when he left his employment. At and before that time he was familiar with them. It is difficult to believe that in 1899 he could have forgotten that these rules permitted some freight trains to carry passengers and prohibited others from doing so. For a day or two before he started on his fatal ride he had been visiting at Laramie, where he boarded the train. On the day upon which he started he had been in the office of the train despatcher, where he could have readily learned by a simple inquiry whether or not the train upon which he entered was permitted to carry passengers. Beyond all question, these facts charged Purple with notice sufficient to put any man of ordinary prudence and diligence upon inquiry for the answer to the question whether or not this train was authorized to carry passengers, and brought him far within the established rule that notice sufficient to put one on inquiry for a fact is notice of all the facts relative to the matter in question that a reasonably diligent investigation and inquiry will disclose. In this state of the evidence the court below rightly charged the jury: "It was the duty of the deceased to inquire whether this train was such as was authorized to carry passengers. It does not appear that he did so; consequently he was charged with such knowledge and information as reasonable inquiry would have elicited." No exception was taken to this portion of the instructions of the court, and it comes here, the established law of this case. If, therefore, Purple knew, or by a reasonably diligent inquiry he could have learned, that the train which he boarded was not permitted to carry passengers, he was not a passenger upon it, but was a mere trespasser on that train, because, in the eyes of the law, he was there knowingly violating the rules of the company. There was evidence tending to show this state of facts, and in the presence of it the court could not have lawfully instructed the jury that Purple was a passenger, and that the defendant was liable for his death if it was caused by its negligence, because, if this state of facts existed, Purple was a trespasser, and not a passenger, and the only duty of the defendant to him was to abstain from wantonly or recklessly inflicting injury upon him. One who enters and rides upon a car or train which he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence would know, is prohibited from carrying passengers, is a trespasser, and not a passenger, and the only duty of the railroad company toward him is to abstain from wanton or reckless injury to him. Virginia Midland R. Co. v. Roach, 83 Va. 375, 5 S. E. 175; Robertson v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 91; Eaton v. Delacare, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 384, 15 Am. Rep. 513; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Langdon, 92 Pa. 21, 37 Am. Rep. 651; Powers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 188, 191, 192, 26 N. E. 446; Flower v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 69 Pa. 210, 8 Am. Rep. 251; Ecliff v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 64 Mich. 196, 31 N. W. 180.

The conclusions which have now been announced have not been reached without a careful perusal and consideration of the authorities cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, such as Dunn v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 58 Me. 187, 4 Am. Rep. 267; Lucas v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 33 Wis. 41, 54, 14 Am. Rep. 735; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 484, 14 L. ed. 502, 508; Gradin v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 30 Minn. 217, 220, 14 N. W. 881; St. Joseph & W. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 35 Kan. 185, 10 Pac. 461; and Whitehead v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 99 Mo. 263, 6 L. R. A. 409, 11 S. W. 751,—in which boys and men who had never been employed upon the railroad, or who had no notice of facts sufficient to put them upon inquiry as to the power of the conductor or officer in charge of the train to permit them to ride upon it as passengers, were held, under the circumstances of these particular cases, to stand in this relation to the companies. The rules and principles announced in those cases are inapplicable to the facts of the case in hand, because the evidence here conclusively establishes the fact, which did not exist in those cases, that before the alleged passenger boarded the extra freight train he knew facts which would put any man of reasonable prudence upon inquiry to ascertain—First, whether or not that train was permitted to carry passengers; and, second, whether or not the conductor had any authority to allow him to ride upon it, and because there was evidence in this case, which was not presented in any of those cases, tending to show that the alleged passenger entered and rode upon the train with the deliberate intention not to pay his fare, under a tacit understanding with the conductor that he should ride free. Purple did not approach this train in the relation to the company of a boy or of an ordinary individual honestly seeking transportation without knowledge of the rules or practices of the company. The conceded facts that he had been employed upon the railroad for nine years, had been familiar with the rules and practices upon the road, and the evidence of his intention not to pay, and tacit understanding with the conductor that he should not pay fare, gave him notice of facts, and suggested inquiry which the ordinary applicant for passage upon the train of a railroad company does not have. This case is not governed by the authorities cited by the plaintiff in error, which declared the liabilities of railroad companies upon very different states of facts, but is controlled by the rules and the 57 L. R. A.

decisions to which reference has been made in the earlier portion of this opinion.

It will be convenient to notice here another contention of counsel for plaintiff in error allied to those which have already been considered. It is that although Purple was not a passenger he was not a trespasser, and the court should have instructed the jury that the defendant was liable to him for gross negligence. In support of this proposition cases are cited like Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 483, 14 L. ed. 502, where a passenger who was riding free upon the railroad by the invitation of the president of the company was carelessly injured, and Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 102 Fed. 17, where one riding in a passenger car upon a pass sustained injury through the negligence of the company, and it was held that the defendant was liable to these persons for the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, and that any failure to exercise such care might well be characterized as gross. These authorities, and the rules of law upon which they rest and which they announce, have no application to the case in hand. Purple was not traveling on a free pass. He was not a licensee. He was either a passenger without knowledge and without notice of facts suggesting an inquiry which would have led a prudent man to knowledge of the fact that the conductor of this train was not authorized to permit him to ride upon it as a passenger, or he was a trespasser with knowledge, or with notice charging him with knowledge, of this fact, engaged in executing a deliberate intention to ride upon the train in violation of the rules of the company. He was not a licensee, and he could occupy no middle position. There was, therefore, no error in the refusal of the court to charge that if he was not a passenger the railroad company was liable to him for gross negligence. The term "gross" in this connection is nothing but an epithet. It means no more than the failure to exercise ordinary diligence in the circumstances of the particular case. It distinguishes no legal degree of negligence, and it is not error to refuse to apply it to the negligence for which a defendant may be liable, because its use merely tends to create doubt and to increase confusion. Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113; The New World v. King, 16 How. 474, 14 L. ed. 1021; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 494, 23 L. ed. 374, 376; Beal v. South Devon R. Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 337; Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (1866) L. R. 1 C. P. 600; Perkins v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 196, 207, 82 Am. Dec. 281.

Another complaint of the plaintiff in error is that the court instructed the jury that there was no evidence in the case sufficient to warrant them in finding that there was any wanton, wilful, or reckless disregard by the company of the safety of the deceased. But the bill of exceptions contains these two statements: "All evidence tending to show the fact or character of defendant's negligence is contained in this bill of exceptions;" and "there was no evidence in the case tending to show wanton, wilful, or reckless disregard on the part of the company of the safety of the deceased." Counsel review the evidence contained in the bill of exceptions, and ask a holding that there was evidence tending to show wilful and reckless injury. But this question is not here for our consideration. The only way in which it could have been presented in the present state of the record was by an exception to the statement in the bill of exceptions that there was no such evidence in the case taken and recorded in the bill itself. No such objection or exception was taken, so that the question whether or not there was such evidence was not presented to the court below when it certified the record, and as, in an action at law, this is a court for the correction of errors exclusively, there could have been no error in the court below, because that question was not presented to or ruled upon by that court when the bill of exceptions was made. In this court the record presented by that bill, in the absence of objection or exception thereto, is conclusive.

It is assigned as error that the court refused to instruct the jury that, although the conductor did not intend to demand transportation, the fact that he had such intention could not in any way affect the right of the plaintiff to recover, in the absence of evidence to show that Purple in some way induced the conductor to form such intention. But there was evidence tending to show that Purple did induce him to form this intention by presenting himself for transportation, by forming with him the tacit understanding that he should ride free, and by entering and riding upon the train without the payment or the offer to pay fare, in pursuance of his deliberate intention and tacit understanding that he should ride without the payment of any. The instruction requested was therefore inapplicable to the facts of this case, and there was no error in its refusal. It is not the duty of a trial court to instruct the jury what the law would be in the absence of material evidence which has been presented and submitted to the jury upon the crucial issues in the case. It completely discharges its duty when it gives the law applicable to the evidence before the jury.

For the same reason there was no error in the refusal of the court to charge the jury that some of the defendant's freight trains carried passengers, that Purple was riding on one of them with the knowledge and assent of the conductor in charge, and that under these circumstances, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it would be presumed that he was a passenger. This instruction ignored all the material evidence in the case upon which the jury based its finding that he was not a passenger, the evidence of his deliberate intention not to pay fare, of the tacit understanding that he should ride free, of his employment upon the road for nine years, and his familiarity with the rules, and of his presence and opportunity to learn the facts at Laramie before he started upon his fatal ride.

It is said that it was error for the court to refuse to charge that the payment of fare is not necessary to give rise to the liability to pay it, and that if the carrier permits the passenger to take his seat without requiring payment the obligation to pay will stand for actual payment. But the rule of law embodied in this request was fairly given to the jury in the general charge of the court. Although the evidence was conclusive that Purple never paid any fare, and never was asked to pay any, the court instructed the jury that if he was invited onto a train authorized to carry passengers, either by express words or by a tacit understanding between him and the conductor, he became a passenger, and it was the duty of the company to exercise the highest degree of practicable care for his safe transportation.

It is contended that the court erred because it failed to submit instructions (1) that if the car on which Purple was riding was of the same general appearance of other trains on which passengers were carried on that division of the railroad, but by reason of other facts, unknown to Purple, the train was not permitted to carry passengers, and if the failure of the conductor to demand fare was not procured by Purple, he was a passenger; and (2) that a person riding by the unauthorized permission of the conductor on a train not intended for the carriage of passengers is not a trespasser, unless it was known to him that the conductor exceeded his authority. It may be conceded for the purpose of this discussion, although the proposition is not considered or decided, that one without any knowledge and without any notice of facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry which would lead to knowledge of the lack of the authority of a conductor upon or of the character of a train which was not permitted to carry passengers might become a passenger upon that train under the circumstances stated in these propositions. The difficulty with the instructions is that Purple was in no such situation. He was an old employee on the road. In its practical operation he had known and had experienced the fact for nine years that regular freight trains might carry passengers and that extra freights might not. It is certainly probable that he knew this fact when he boarded the train, seven years later. Whether he did or not, the record clearly shows that he had ample knowledge of facts to put him upon an inquiry which would have led to an acquaintance with this fact. Under these circumstances, he could not escape this duty of inquiry. He was in this situation: If he had forgotten the rules and the practices, then he did not know that any freight trains on that railroad carried passengers, and the fact that he placed himself upon a freight train was notice to him that he was wrongfully there, because the presumption is that freight trains are for freight and passenger trains for passengers. In the absence of any rule or practice permitting freight trains to carry passengers, the presumption is that one riding for his own convenience on a freight train, an engine, a hand car, or any other carriage of a common carrier that is evidently not designed for the transportation of passengers, is unlawfully there and is a trespasser. Bryant v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 4 C. C. A. 146, 147, 12 U. S. App. 115, 123, 53 Fed. 997, 998; Powers v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 188, 190, 26 N. E. 446; Eaton v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 57 N. Y. 382, 15 Am. Rep. 513; Files v. Boston & A. R. Co. 149 Mass. 204, 21 N. E. 311; Hoar v. Maine C. R. Co. 70, Me. 65, 72, 73, 35 Am. Rep. 209; Gardner v. New Haven & N. Co. 51 Conn. 143, 50 Am. Rep. 12; Graham v. Toronto, G. & B. R. Co. 23 U. C. C. P. 541; Sheerman v. Toronto, G. & B. R. Co. 34 U. C. Q. B. 451; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Michie, 83 Ill. 427.

If, on the other hand, Purple knew the rules and the practice of the railroad company, then he knew that conductors were forbidden to carry passengers, and passengers were prohibited from riding, on extra freight trains. So that, whether he knew the rules or not, the duty was imposed upon him to inquire and to ascertain whether or not the train upon which he entered was a regular or an extra freight train. The instructions under consideration ignore this duty of inquiry which the situation and knowledge of Purple imposed upon him, and for that reason they were properly refused. He was a trespasser, not only if he knew that the train on which he rode was not permitted to carry passengers and that the conductor was not authorized to allow him to ride upon it, but also if he knew such facts relative to this matter as would have put a man of ordinary prudence and diligence upon an inquiry which would have led to a knowledge of these facts.

The specifications of error in this case are numerous. They have not all been specifically set forth, but the rules and principles of the law and the facts, by which they must be judged, have now been carefully considered and declared. Our conclusion is that the material issues in this case were fairly and impartially tried, that the charge of the court tersely and correctly presented to the jury the rules of law applicable to the evidence, and that there was no error in the refusal of the court to submit the requested instructions of counsel for the plaintiff.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

H. A. SCHOER.

1. The states have the right to regulate within reasonable limits the relations between employers and employees within their borders, and to fix by legislative enactments the liabilities of the former for the acts and negligence of the latter.
2. Sections 1342 and 1343 of the Revised Statutes of Utah make all servants employed in the service of a master doing business in that state, who are intrusted by him with authority to command his other servants, or with the authority to direct another of his servants in the discharge of his duties, vice principals of their master, and charge him with liability for their negligence, whether it was committed in the discharge of the positive duties of the master or in the performance of the primary duties of the servants.
3. Those sections make the master liable for the negligence of superior servants committed in the discharge of their duties as employees, whether the negligence was committed while they were exercising their authority to command or superintend others, or not.
4. A writing which contains competent evidence upon a material issue cannot be lawfully rejected because it also contains evidence which is incompetent and irrelevant.
5. Nothing less than such a fortuitous gathering of circumstances as prevents the performance of a duty, and such as could not have been foreseen by the exercise of reasonable prudence, or overcome by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, constitutes an act of God which will excuse the discharge of a duty.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Between 1 and 2 o'clock on the dark and foggy morning of December 20, 1899, the second section of a passenger train of the Southern Pacific Company, upon which H. A. Schoer was a fireman, ran into the rear of the first section near the yard limits of the company at Terrace, in the state of Utah, threw this fireman against the boiler of the engine, and fastened him there under a mass of coal which was thrown from the tender by the shock of the collision, until he was so scalded by steam that escaped on account of the breaking of the water gauge that he died. C. Schoer, the administrator of his estate, brought an action against this company for alleged negligence causing his death, and obtained a verdict and judgment which this writ of error has been sued out to review.

The main complaint of the company is that the court below charged the jury that under the statutes of the state of Utah the engineer of the locomotive on which the deceased was a fireman was the representative of the company, and that his negligence, if any, in following the first section of the train too closely, and in running his engine too rapidly as he approached the yard limits at Terrace at the time of the collision, was the negligence of the company. The sections of the statute of Utah which induced this instruction are:

"1342. All persons engaged in the service of any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in this state, who are intrusted by such person, firm, or corporation as employer with the authority of superintendence, control, or command of other persons in the employ or service of such employer, or with the authority to direct any other employee in the performance of any duties of such employee, are vice principals of such employer, and are not fellow servants.

"1343. All persons who are engaged in the service of such employer, and who, while so engaged, are in the same grade of service and are working together at the same time and place and to a common purpose, neither of such persons being intrusted by such employer with any superintendence or control over his fellow employees, are fellow servants with each other; provided, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to make the employees of such employer fellow servants with other employees engaged in any other department of service of such employer. Employees who do not come within the provisions of this section shall not be considered fellow servants."

Utah Rev. Stat. 1898.

It is not denied that the engineer in charge of the engine upon which the deceased was employed at the time of his death was intrusted by the company with authority to superintend and direct him in the performance of his duties, but it is contended that this master was not responsible for his negligence, because the negligence which caused the injury was committed while this engineer was discharging the primary duty of a servant, and was not engaged in performing one of the positive duties of the master, and because this negligence was committed while he was not exercising his authority to superintend the action of the fireman or to direct him in the performance of any of his duties.

The argument in support of the first contention is: Under the general law the master was not liable for the negligence of this engineer, because he was discharging one of the primary duties of the servant, and was not performing one of the positive duties of the master, when he committed the fatal acts of negligence. The purpose and effect of the sections of the statute of Utah which have been cited were not to change or to extend the liabilities of masters for the negligence of their servants, but their sole object and effect were to give an authoritative legislative definition of the terms "vice principal" and "fellow servant," and to leave the liabilities of the masters for the acts of their servants as they were before these sections were enacted. Therefore, since the Southern Pacific Company would not have been liable for the negligence of this engineer under the general law, it is not liable for it under this statute. The truth of the major premise of this syllogism is conceded. In the absence of a statute the liability of a master for the negligence of his servant is a question of general law, upon which the decisions of the state courts are not controlling upon the Federal judiciary, and, unless the negligent servant is the general manager or general superintendent of the business of the master, it is not his grade, rank, or authority over other employees, but it is the nature of the duty he is discharging when he is guilty of the negligence, that determines whether he is a vice principal or a fellow servant, and when the master is liable or is exempt from liability for the injury caused by his carelessness. If he is discharging one of the absolute duties of the master, the latter is liable for his acts and for his negligence. But, if he is discharging one of the primary duties of the servants, his employer is exempt from liability. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; New England R. Co. v. Conroy, 175 U. S. 323, 327, 44 L. ed. 181, 184, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85; Minneapolis v. Lundin, 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525. 527; What Cheer Coal Co. v. Johnson, 6 C. C. A. 148, 12 U. S. App. 490, 56 Fed. 810. The construction and maintenance of a railroad is the business of the master. Its operation is the business of his servants. The failure to exercise reasonable care in construction and maintenance is the negligence of the master. The failure to exercise such care in the operation of a railroad is the negligence of the servant for which the master is not liable. The alleged negligence of the engineer of the second section of this train in running his engine too close to the preceding section, and too rapidly as he approached the yard limits at Terrace, was negligence in the operation of the railroad, for which the Southern Pacific Company was not liable, in the absence of a statute which changed the rules and principles of the general law. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham, 25 L. R. A. 833, 11 C. C. A. 56, 58, 27 U. S. App. 227, 63 Fed. 107, 109; Northern P. R. Co. v. Mass, 11 C. C. A. 63, 27 U. S. App. 238, 63 Fed. 114, 115; Brady v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 114 Fed. 100. These principles and authorities amply sustain the first proposition of counsel for the plaintiff in error.

But the correctness of the second premise of their syllogism is not so obvious. A vice principal is the representative of the master, for whose acts and negligence the master is responsible. Minneapolis v. Lundin, 7 C. C. A. 344, 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. 525, 527. The rule that the master is liable for the negligence committed by a servant while he is discharging one of the positive duties of the master, and that he is not liable for his negligence when he is performing one of the primary duties of a servant, was not adopted to measure the liability of the master for the acts of a vice principal. It was established to determine who were and who were not vice principals. The master has been invariably held liable by all the courts for the acts and for the negligence of his vice principals. The question upon which they have disagreed—the question which has occasioned debate—has been, Who were vice principals? Under the general law in the Federal courts and in many of the state courts that question has been answered by the rule which has already been stated, based upon the nature of the duty the servant was discharging when the negligence was committed. In this condition of the law and of the decisions the legislature of the state of Utah enacted the statute which has been quoted. It declares that employees who are intrusted by their employers with the authority to superintend other employees of the same master, or with the authority to direct any other employee in the discharge of any of his duties, are vice principals of such employer. This declaration is a plain departure from the general rule of law which we have been considering; an unequivocal declaration that servants who have the authority to direct and superintend other servants are vice principals of their masters, whether they are engaged in discharging the duties of their employers or the duties of their servants. There is no ambiguity in the terms, or uncertainty in the meaning of this statute, and no possible doubt of the purpose of the legislature in enacting it. It is too positive to be disregarded, too plain for construction, and its manifest legal effect cannot be ignored. To sustain the position of counsel for the plaintiff in error that this clear and authoritative declaration of the relation of superior servants to their masters in the state of Utah did not modify or extend the liability of the master beyond that fixed by the general law would be to defeat the manifest object of the legislature in passing this act, and to arbitrarily strike down a law which that body had the undoubted right to enact and to enforce; for the unquestioned rule is that the states have the right to regulate within reasonable limits the relations between employers and employees within their borders, and to fix by legislative enactments the liabilities of the former for the acts and the negligence of the latter. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 378, 37 L. ed. 772, 777; 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Northern P. R. Co. v. Hogan, 11 C. C. A. 51, 27 U. S. App. 184, 63 Fed. 102, 105. Our conclusion is that §§ 1342 and 1343 of the Revised Statutes of Utah of 1898 make all servants employed in the service of a master doing business in that state, who are intrusted by him with authority to command his other servants, or with the authority to direct another of his servants in the discharge of his duties, vice principals of their master, and charge him with liability for their negligence, whether it was committed in the discharge of the positive duties of the master or in the performance of the primary duties of the servants.

Another reason why counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that the Southern Pacific Company is not liable for the negligence of this engineer is that when he committed the acts of negligence charged he was not engaged in exercising his authority to superintend the fireman, or his power to direct the performance of any of his duties. It is earnestly contended that it is only when the superior servant is guilty of negligence while he is actually engaged in exercising his authority of superintendence and control over those subject to his direction that his master is liable for his negligence under the provisions of this statute. In support of this position Shaffers v. General Steam Nav. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 356, 357; Fitzgerald v. Boston & A. R. Co. 156 Mass. 293, 31 N. E. 7; Brittain v. West End Street R. Co. 168 Mass. 10, 46 N. E. 111, and Dantzler v. De Bardeleben Coal & I. Co. 101 Ala. 309, 22 L. R. A. 361, 14 So. 10, have been cited, and these cases adopt and enforce the rule for which counsel contend. But they enforce it because the limitation which counsel seek to read into the statute of Utah was written into the statutes these decisions were interpreting by the legislative bodies which enacted them. The employers' liability act of 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. chap. 42) § 1, subsec. 2, which the opinion in the Shaffers Case was construing, charges the master with liability for injuries caused "by reason of the negligence of a person in the service of the defendants who had superintendence intrusted to him whilst in the exercise of such superintendence." The Alabama and Massachusetts statutes under which the cases from those states arose contain a like limitation. Dantzler v. De Bardeleben Coal & I. Co. 101 Ala. 318, 22 L. R. A. 361, 14 So. 10; Mass.

Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 1, subsec. 2. The statute of Utah under which this case arose contains no such limitation, and no indication that the legislature intended to adopt any such restriction. On the other hand, it plainly declares that all persons intrusted by the master with the authority of superintendence of other persons in his employ are vice principals, and are not fellow servants. This is a declaration that they are vice principals, not only when they are engaged in performing acts of superintendence and control, but at all times when the authority of superintendence and control is vested in them, and they are engaged in discharging their duties as servants of their master. This statute is so plain that it cannot be lawfully construed. To write into it the limitation suggested by counsel and found in the laws of England, Alabama, and Massachusetts would be to so amend it as to deprive it of the greater portion of its effect, in violation of its terms, and of the intention of the legislature which its words clearly disclose. It would be judicial legislation, which it is not the province of the courts to enact.

In their brief in reply counsel for the company suggest a third reason why, in their opinion, the Southern Pacific Company was not liable for the negligence of this engineer. It is that this company pleaded in its answer that the night was so dark and foggy that the proximity of the first section of the train could not be discovered by employees on the engine of the second section in time to stop the latter. But, if the night was so dark and foggy that this engineer could not discover the first section in time to stop his engine, reasonable care and prudence on his part demanded that he should either send forward his fireman as he approached the yard limits at Terrace to ascertain its location, or should run his engine so slowly and carefully that he could stop at any moment, and could surely avoid a collision. The complaint of the plaintiff did not estop him from a recovery for the negligence of this engineer which the evidence at the trial established. The result is that there was no error in the charge of the court that the engineer upon the second section of this train was the representative of the company, and that, if his negligence in operating his engine caused the injury, the company was liable to the plaintiff for the damages that resulted. Dryburg v. Mercur Gold Min. & Mill. Co. 18 Utah, 410, 412, 55 Pac. 367; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Calvert, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 297, 32 S. W. 246, 247; San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. McDonald (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 72; Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Wrenn, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 628, 50 S. W. 210.

It is assigned as error that the train sheet of the railroad company, which disclosed the times when the two sections of the train which collided left the various stations of Toana, Montello, Tacoma, Gartney, and Lucin before they arrived at Terrace, and which also disclosed the time of the collision at Terrace, was admitted in evidence over the objection of counsel for the company. An examination of the record, however, discloses the fact that the only objection to this train sheet was leveled at the entries thereon of the times when the two sections arrived at Terrace. No objection whatever was made to the introduction of the train sheet for the purpose of showing the movements of the sections of the train before they reached Terrace, or to the train sheet as a whole; and the train sheet disclosed the times when the sections left all the stations mentioned above before they arrived at Terrace. It was tacitly conceded that for the purpose of showing everything which appeared upon this sheet except the time of the arrival of these sections at Terrace it was admissible evidence. Conceding, without deciding, that the entries upon the train sheet of the times of the arrival of the two sections at Terrace and of the time of the collision were not competent testimony of those facts, the train sheet was still admissible, and the objection of counsel was properly overruled. If the train sheet contained any evidence competent and material to the issue, it could not be lawfully rejected; and it was tacitly conceded that the entries of the times when the sections of the train left the preceding stations were competent evidence of those facts, for no objection was made to these entries, and no objection was interposed to the train sheet as a whole. Since a portion of the train sheet was competent evidence, the objection to its introduction could not be sustained, and the proper remedy of counsel for the company was to request the court to instruct the jury at the time of its introduction or at the close of the case that it must not be considered as evidence of the time of the collision, or of the times of the arrival of the two sections at Terrace. No such request was made and there was no error in the ruling of the court upon this subject.

The next objection to the trial of this case is that the court refused to instruct the jury that, if the death of the deceased was proximately caused by a sudden and unusual fog, and without fault or negligence of the defendant, their verdict must be for the company. The court clearly and emphatically instructed the jury that there could be no recovery in this case, and that their verdict must be for the defendant, unless they were satisfied by a reasonable preponderance of the evidence that the death of the fireman was caused by its negligence. There was evidence at the trial that the night was dark and foggy, that it was difficult to distinguish objects at any considerable distance, and that the headlight of the second section of the train was not perceived until it was very near to the employees upon the first section. But there was nothing in all this, or in any of the evidence in the case, to warrant an instruction to the jury that they might find that this collision was caused by an act of God; and nothing less than an act of God would relieve the defendant from the duty of exercising reasonable care in the operation of these trains. The foundation of the rule that the act of God excuses the failure to discharge a duty is the maxim, Lex neminem cogit ad impossibilia. If, by the use of reasonable care, prudence, and diligence under the circumstances of a particular case, it is possible to discharge the duty, then those circumstances do not constitute a valid excuse for a failure to perform it. Nothing less than such a fortuitous gathering of circumstances preventing the performance of a duty as could not have been foreseen or overcome by the exercise of reasonable prudence, care, and diligence constitutes an act of God which will excuse the discharge of the duty. The record discloses no such circumstances. The night was dark and foggy. This condition of the atmosphere imposed upon the operators greater watchfulness and care to prevent collisions and the duty of driving their engines with less speed and more caution. But there was nothing in the foggy air or in the darkness of the night which would have prevented them from safely operating their trains if they had exercised a care, watchfulness, and diligence proportionate to the situation and the circumstances in which they were placed. In other words, it was not impossible to operate these trains safely by the use of reasonable care; and in this state of the case there was no error in the refusal of the court to submit to the jury the question whether or not the death of the deceased was the act of God. It discharged its full duty when it told the jury that the defendant was not liable for his death unless it appeared by a fair preponderance of the testimony that the defendant was guilty of negligence which caused it.

Another complaint is that the court refused to instruct the jury that, if there was ample time for the flagman to go back and warn the second section of the train after the first section stopped, and no flagman went back a sufficient distance to give that warning, and if the failure or neglect to do so was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased, the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant. But the court instructed the jury in its general charge that there had been some evidence introduced tending to show negligence on the part of the employees of the first section of the train, and that, if there was any such negligence, the defendant was not in any way liable for it, because the employees of that section did not represent the company, but were fellow servants of the deceased. It further instructed them that the risk flowing from the negligence of these servants was a risk assumed by the fireman. This instruction, in view of the evidence in the case, sufficiently presented to the jury the principle of law stated in the request which was refused. That principle was that, if the proximate cause of the death was the negligence of the brakeman on the first section of the train, the plaintiff could not recover. A charge that the defendant was not liable if the proximate cause of the death was the negligence of any of the employees on the first section of the train clearly announced this rule, because the brakeman was one of those employees, and the whole is greater than any of its parts. Where a rule or principle of law is clearly declared by the court in its general charge, it is not error for it to refuse to repeat it in the words of counsel. Lesser Cotton Co. v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 114 Fed. 133; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Morris, 44 C. C. A. 350, 353, 105 Fed. 49, 53; Trumbull v. Erickson, 38 C. C. A. 536, 97 Fed. 891; Union P. R. Co. v. Jarvi, 3 C. C. A. 433, 10 U. S. App. 439, 53 Fed. 65.

One of the charges of negligence was the failure to use reasonable care to keep the coal gate of the engine in proper repair, and it is assigned as error that the court admitted the testimony of a witness that this gate was defective and weak thirty days before the accident. The only ground for this specification is that the time named by the witness was too remote from the date of the accident. But it is competent to prove defects in tools and machinery for a reasonable time before the accident which those defects are charged with inducing, and it cannot be said that thirty days is an unreasonable time within which to permit such testimony to range. There is at least a reasonable probability, in the absence of other evidence, that a defect existing thirty days before an accident was not remedied before the casualty occurred. There was no error in the admission of this evidence.

Finally, it is contended that the court erred because it permitted one witness to testify that a rule of the company which required trains to keep ten minutes apart did not apply to any train in particular, and permitted another to state that the conductor upon the first section of this train had "full charge of the running of the train over all the employees on the train." The only grounds for these objections are that the rules are the best evidence of their contents, and that the testimony of the witness as to the power of the conductor was a conclusion of law. Conceding that the written rule was the best evidence of its terms, it was competent for the witness to testify whether or not this rule applied to all the trains of the company or only to a portion thereof, and conceding that the statement of the witness who testified to the authority of the conductor was a conclusion of law, the admission of that testimony was not prejudicial, because the legal presumption is, in the absence of evidence, that the conductor has exactly the power which this witness testified was vested in him (Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 390, 28 L. ed. 787, 792, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 381, 37 L. ed. 772, 779, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914), and error without prejudice is no ground for reversal.

There was, therefore, no error in these rulings, and the judgment below must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

CHICAGO & GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

- *1. The duty of so operating a safely constructed and equipped railroad, subject to the rules and general supervision of the master, as to keep it reasonably safe for those employed upon it, is not a positive duty of the master, but a primary duty of the servant.
2. A railroad company operating its trains over the railroad of another corporation by permission is liable to its passengers for the negligence of the servants of the licensing corporation.
3. A railway company running its trains over another road by permission is liable to its employees for the negligence of the servants of the licensing corporation in the discharge of the absolute duties of the master.
4. But such a railway company is not liable to its servants for the negligence of the employees of the licensing corporation in the discharge of their duties as servants.
5. The power of the alleged master or principal to command or direct the alleged servant or agent is the test of the liability of the former for the acts of the latter, under the maxim, Respondet superior. If the master or principal has no power to command or direct the alleged servant or agent, he is not responsible for his acts, because there is no superior to respond.
6. The Great Western Railway Company was operating a train through the yards of a depot corporation, under the customary contract for the use of the yards and depot jointly with other companies having like contracts, when one of its employees was killed by the alleged negligence of the servants of the depot company in failing to properly turn the switches, which were under the control of the latter company. Held, the switchmen of the depot company were not the fellow servants of the employees of the railway company; nor were they the agents or servants of that company, within the meaning of the fellow servant statute of Minnesota (Stat. 1894, § 2701).
7. The ordinary contracts between a depot corporation and several railroad companies for the use of a depot and transfer yards do not establish a partnership relation between the companies, nor make the depot corporation the servant or agent of the railroad companies, so that they become liable for the negligence of its servants, under the maxim, Respondet superior.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Iowa to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Caldwell, Sanborn, and Thayer, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Charles A. Clark & Son and William G. Clark, for plaintiff in error:

There was a breach of the primary duties which defendant owed decedent. Defendant owed to the decedent the primary duty to maintain the safety of the complicated system of tracks and switches which it had adopted as a part of its railroad, by all reasonable and needed precautions to secure its safety.

The defendant was bound, as master, to see that reasonable precautions were taken to prevent collision with unguarded cars on the "dead track" in the night. The habitual leaving of that track open, without care, in the night, was not provided for. That was the negligence of the master, and not of the servant.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Elizabeth Brady, as administratrix of the estate of John J. Brady, brought an action against the Chicago & Great Western Railway Company for negligence resulting in the death of Brady, and at the close of the evidence produced on her behalf the court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant. The judgment, based upon this instruction, is challenged by this writ of error.

The facts established at the trial were these: John J. Brady was the foreman of a switch crew in the employment of the Chicago & Great Western Railway Company engaged in discharging the customary duties of such crews at the city of St. Paul. In the early morning of November 1, 1896, while it was yet dark, it became Brady's duty to take his train, which consisted of an engine, tender, and caboose, from West St. Paul across the Mississippi river, and through the yards of the St. Paul Union Depot Company, to Mississippi street, a distance of 2 or 3 miles. He had exclusive charge of this train, and he directed the crew to couple the caboose on to the rear of the engine, and to back the train across the river and through the yards. He took his station on the forward end of the caboose as it was sent into the darkness. The only light he had at that end of the train was a lantern. As he was backing this train through the yards at a speed of about 6 miles an hour, it collided with a refrigerator car on a portion of one of the transfer tracks of the depot company, called the "dead track," and so injured Brady that he died. This dead track was long enough to hold four or five cars. It was used by several railroad companies as a place of deposit of cars that were ready to be transferred from one railroad to another. It was provided with a switch at each end, by means of which trains could be sent around it when it was occupied by cars. When the switches were turned to send trains around it they displayed red switch lights, and when the dead track was clear, and was lined up with that on which Brady approached it, the switches displayed green lights. At such times it formed a part of the main track through the depot yards used by the defendant for the passage of its freight trains. At the time of the accident the switch lights were green, thus indicating that the dead track was clear. It was not the duty or the privilege of the servants of the Great Western Railway Company to operate these switches. The dead track, the switches connected with it, and all the railroads and switches in this yard were the property of the St. Paul Union Depot Company, a corporation of the state of Minnesota. This company had the exclusive management and control of all these tracks and switches, and the Great Western Railway Company had a contract with it for a transfer of its cars and engines and for permission to run its trains through the yards. Six other railroad companies had similar agreements with the terminal company. The depot company employed three or four switchmen whose exclusive duty it was to throw the switches in the yards for those who were entitled to use them under these contracts. The dead track on which the accident happened was used largely in the daytime for the deposit of cars to be transferred from railroad to railroad, but it was used at night only for special work, such as perishable freight and stock. One of the plaintiff's witnesses said that from his experience it was lined up anywhere after 10 o'clock at night until 5 o'clock in the morning so that it was proper to proceed without delay or bothering a switch tender to be there; that there was liable to be some transferring at night, and the placing of cars upon this dead track; that all the trainmen and switching crews knew that this track was used for standing cars; and that the customary way of protecting these cars on this dead track was to set the switches so that they would display red lights, and send approaching trains around it. He also testified as follows: "The crew of one railroad company would set cars there, to be afterwards received and taken by the crew of another company. But the cars were to be immediately afterwards taken or protected. To the best of my knowledge they were always immediately taken or else protected. If they were protected, then they might remain there for some considerable length of time. It is a piece of track that is busily used for transfer work, and very seldom anything stands there long, but there may be some delay where they could not possibly get the car, and it would stay there for half an hour. They couldn't allow anything to stand there any longer, you know, to make a rule of it. It is true that this dead track was very much in use, and that cars were frequently stood there for a greater or less length of time,—freight cars which were not attached to an engine. At various times in the evening they wouldn't even allow you to cut your engine from the car there at all, and leave it there. You could stay right there and hold the car until the other engine was ready to take right hold of it; that is, at certain times. The Union Depot yards at the place in question are very thickly laid and covered with switches. The yards at that time consisted of almost a complete net-work of railway tracks running in all directions, used by the various railroad companies I have referred to and by the Union Depot Company for transferring, switching, and handling freight trains, and also passenger trains. . . . It was not defendant's custom to have anyone at the dead track in question to watch or protect cars placed upon the dead track by other companies. It was the custom for the Union Depot switch tenders to protect those cars."

There was no evidence that the defendant or any of its servants placed the refrigerator car with which Brady's train collided upon the dead track.

Upon this state of facts counsel for the plaintiff in error insist that the direction of the court to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant was erroneous (1) because the railway company was liable for the negligence of the depot company in its discharge of the positive duty of the master to exercise ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place for the servant to work, and there is some evidence of such negligence on the part of the terminal company; and, (2) because the servants of the depot company were the fellow servants of the employees of the railway company, there was some evidence that the servants of the former company were negligent in the discharge of their primary duties as servants, and under the statute of Minnesota a railway company is liable to its employees for injuries inflicted upon them by the negligence of their fellow servants.

Before entering upon a discussion of these contentions, it will be well to fix clearly in mind the negligence and the nature of the negligence which was the cause of this deplorable accident. Was it negligence in the construction, repair, or maintenance of the road, its switches and appurtenances, or was it carelessness in their operation? For the line of demarcation which separates the absolute duty of the master from the primary duty of his servants lies here. It is the duty of the railroad company to use ordinary care to furnish a reasonably safe railroad machine; to exercise reasonable diligence to keep it in repair; to use ordinary care to employ a sufficient number of reasonably competent servants to operate it; to establish reasonable rules for, and to exercise proper supervision of, its operation. But when this duty is performed an equally positive duty rests upon the servants to keep the great machine from becoming dangerous by their operation of it and to work it with reasonable care. The railroad tracks, the switches, the engine, and the caboose were on November 1, 1896, well constructed and in good repair. If they had been operated with ordinary care, they would not have caused the death of Brady. If the servants who put the refrigerator car on the dead track had placed red lights upon it, if when it was placed there the switchman of the depot company had turned the switches so as to display red lights and so as to send Brady's train around it, or if Brady had run his train through the yard in the dark with the engine and its blazing headlight foremost rather than the caboose (Southern P. Co. v. Yeargin, 48 C. C. A. 497, 109 Fed. 436), the fatal result could not have followed. The failure to do these things was negligence, but it was not negligence in the discharge of any duty of the master. It was negligence in the discharge of the duties of the servants; negligence in the operation of the railroad machine, which had been safely constructed and maintained, and which was made dangerous by the negligent discharge of the duties of these servants in its operation. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham, 25 L. R. A. 833, 11 C. C. A. 56, 58, 59, 27 U. S. App. 227, 231, 63 Fed. 107, 109; Northern P. R. Co. v. Mase, 11 C. C. A. 63, 64, 27 U. S. App. 238, 240, 63 Fed. 114, 115.

Bearing in mind the nature of the negligence which caused the accident, let us now consider the first position of counsel for the plaintiff in error. It is that the defendant was liable for the death of Brady because the depot company was negligent in the discharge of the positive duties of the master. The defendant was operating its trains in the yard and over the railroads of the depot company under a contract which excluded it from all management and control of this yard, its railroads and switches, and imposed upon the depot company exclusively all the positive duties of the master in this regard. The rules of law governing the liability of a railroad company while running its trains over the railroad of another corporation are too well settled to admit of discussion. Such a company is liable to passengers and shippers for the casual negligence of the licensing company and of its servants, whether this negligence occurs in the discharge of the positive duties of the master or in the performance of the primary duties of the servant. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Barron, 5 Wall. 104, 18 L. ed. 594; McElroy v. Nashua & L. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 400, 402, 50 Am. Dec. 794; Central Trust Co. v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 38 C. C. A. 143, 97 Fed. 239; Murray v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 66 Conn. 512, 32 L. R. A. 539, 34 Atl. 506, 508. The reason for this rule is that the carrier contracts with the passengers and shippers to carry them and their property with reasonable safety, and the failure so to do is equally a breach of this contract, whether it results from negligence in the discharge of the duties of the master or of those of the servants. There is, however, no such contract between the railroad company and its employees. Their relations and their liabilities are governed by the relative duties imposed upon them by the law. They join in a dangerous occupation. The servants know its dangers as well as the master. If they are operating over the railroad or in the yards of a corporation which does not employ them, they are aware of that fact and of the risk of accident from the negligence of the employees of that corporation. All these risks which they know, or which they might know by the exercise of reasonable prudence and diligence, excepting only those dangers which it is the positive duty of the master to protect them from, they assume as between themselves and their master when they enter upon and continue in the employment. They may undoubtedly recover of those who are guilty of the negligence which causes their injury just as they may recover of any stranger who commits a tortious act that inflicts injury upon them while they are operating their trains. This is all that the cases of Lockhart v. Little Rock & M. R. Co. 40 Fed. 631, and McMarshall v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 80 Iowa, 757, 45 N. W. 1065, cited by plaintiff in error's counsel, decide.

But their master does not assume and is not liable to them for the negligence of the servants of the licensing company when the latter are not engaged in the discharge of the positive duties of the master. Clark v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 92 Ill. 43; Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 24 L. R. A. 693, 9 C. C. A. 666, 22 U. S. App. 220, 61 Fed. 605, 608; Miller v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 655, 659, 39 N. W. 188; Hilsdorf v. St. Louis, 45 Mo. 94, 98, 100 Am. Dec. 352.

On the other hand, the master cannot renounce his absolute duties to his servant, or so delegate them to another as to relieve himself from liability for their discharge, and a railroad company which operates its train over another's road remains liable to its servants for any failure of the employees of the latter in their discharge of the positive duties of the master. Stetler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 46 Wis. 497, 1 N. W. 112; Harding v. Railway Transfer Co. 80 Minn. 504, 83 N. W. 395; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 60 Tex. 148, 18 S. W. 444.

The Great Western Railway Company, therefore, was liable to the plaintiff for any negligence of the servants of the depot company in the discharge of the absolute duties of the master which contributed to the death of Brady, and for that negligence only; and the first question presented to the court was whether or not the testimony presented any substantial evidence of such negligence which would warrant the jury in returning a verdict to that effect. There is always a preliminary question for the judge at the close of the evidence before a case can be submitted to the jury, and that question is not whether or not there is any evidence, but whether or not there is any substantial evidence, upon which the jury can properly render a verdict in favor of the party who produces it. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Belliwirth, 28 C. C. A. 358, 362, 55 U. S. App. 113, 121, 83 Fed. 437, 441; Railway Officials & Employees' Acci. Asso. v. Wilson, 40 C. C. A. 411, 413, 100 Fed. 368, 370; Marion County v. Clark, 94 U. S. 278, 284, 24 L. ed. 59, 61; North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 123 U. S. 727, 733, 31 L. ed. 287, 288, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266; Dclavare, L. & W. R. Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 469, 35 L. ed. 213, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 569; Laclede Fire-Brick Mfg. Co. v. Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co. 9 C. C. A. 1, 4, 19 U. S. App. 510, 515, 60 Fed. 351, 354; Gowen v. Harley, 6 C. C. A. 190, 12 U. S. App. 574, 585, 56 Fed. 973; Motey v. Pickle Marble & Granite Co. 20 C. C. A. 366, 368, 36 U. S. App. 682, 687, 74 Fed. 155, 157.

It is not claimed that the railroad, the switches, or any of the apparatus of the Union Depot Company were defective, or that there was any negligence in their construction or maintenance. It is, however, urged that there was evidence that that company was negligent (1) in promulgating reasonable rules, (2) in failing to employ a sufficient number of switchmen, and (3) in exercising control and supervision of the operation of its yard. The argument in support of this position proceeds upon the assumption that there was evidence in this record from which the inference may properly be drawn that there was no rule or supervision of the depot company which required a switchman to be in attendance in the yards and to protect cars placed upon the dead track by turning the switches between 11 o'clock at night and 5 o'clock in the morning. But this assumption is unwarranted by the evidence. It rests on this statement of one of the witnesses: "From my experience these tracks were lined up anywhere after 11 o'clock at 57 L. R. A.

night until 5 o'clock in the morning, so that it was proper to proceed without delay or bothering a switch tender to be there." This testimony does not indicate that no switchman was required to be there or that no switchman was there during these hours. It tends to show that there was one in attendance, because it speaks of bothering him, and, if he had not been there, he could not have been bothered. If it shows anything, it proves that there were one or more switchmen in attendance, but that it was proper for Brady to proceed without bothering them, because at the hour when he passed through the yards the tracks were usually lined up and clear. Other portions of the testimony of this witness make it plain that it was the custom and practice of the depot company to have switchmen in the yards, to protect cars left on this dead track, at all hours of the day and night. He says: "There was liable to be some transferring at night, and placing of cars on the dead track. . . . It was the duty of the switch tenders employed by the Union Depot Company to set the switches in this locality, including the switches that led to and from the transfer track referred to. . . . The crew of one railroad company would set cars there to be afterwards taken and received by the crew of another company, but the cars were to be immediately afterwards taken or protected. To the best of my knowledge, they were always immediately taken or else protected. . . . It was not the defendant's custom to have anyone at the dead track in question to watch or protect cars placed upon the dead track by other companies. It was the custom for the Union Depot switch tenders to protect those cars."

The plain effect of this testimony is that, while it was not the duty or the custom of the defendant to protect these cars, it was the invariable custom and the practice of the switch tenders of the depot company to do so, both by night and by day.

Now, the burden was on the plaintiff to prove the negligence upon which its counsel relies. The legal presumption was that the depot company made and announced reasonable rules, and that it exercised reasonable supervision. Conceding that it should have made such rules, and should have exercised such supervision, that it would have been the duty and the practice of its switchmen to protect this refrigerator car on the dead track by turning the switches at night, the legal presumption is that it made such rules and exercised such supervision. There is no evidence to the contrary, and the necessary inference from the testimony is that this terminal company fully discharged its duty, for the evidence is that it was the duty and custom of all the switchmen to protect these cars, and the only conceivable way in which this duty could have been imposed and this custom established was by a rule and supervision which required it. Such a rule and supervision constitute the discharge of the whole duty of the depot company in this regard. It was not required to go farther. The duty of supervision does not require a master to place a spy or a watchman by the side of each switchman or employee to see that he discharges his duty. It is enough that reasonable rules are established and made known to him, and that a supervision and control are exercised which establish the custom of compliance with them. The legal presumption is that the servant as well as the master will discharge his duty, and upon this presumption the master has the right to rely in the performance of his duty. There was no evidence in this case which would have sustained a finding of the jury that there was any negligence on the part of the depot company in promulgating rules for, or in exercising supervision over, the operation of its railroads and yards.

There is no claim that it did not employ competent servants, but it is said that it did not engage a sufficient number of them. The suggestion is without support in the evidence. The only testimony on the subject is that there were something like 100 switches in the yard, and three or four switchmen, who did nothing but throw them. There was no evidence that these switchmen were at any time insufficient in number to speedily and carefully work the switches, much less that they were so in the night when this accident happened and when the business in the yard was necessarily light. Nor was there any evidence that the accident was the effect of a lack of employees. The result is that there was not only no evidence from which the inference could have been fairly drawn that the depot company was guilty of negligence in the discharge of any of the positive duties of the master, but the legal presumptions and the testimony alike concur in establishing the conclusion that it completely discharged these duties, and that the sole cause of the accident was the negligence of one or more servants in the discharge of the primary duties imposed upon them. The defendant, therefore, was not liable on account of its own negligence or on account of the negligence of the depot company in the discharge of the absolute duties of the master.

The second proposition of counsel for the plaintiff in error is that the depot company and its employees were fellow servants of Brady and the other employees of the defendant, and that the latter is liable for their negligence in failing to turn the switches and protect the refrigerator car under the Minnesota statute, which reads: "Every railroad corporation owning or operating a railroad in this state shall be liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant thereof, without contributory negligence on his part." Minn. Stat. 1894, § 2701.

Let it be borne in mind in the consideration of this contention that, if there was any act of negligence on the part of the servants of the depot company established in this case, it was the failure of its switchmen to throw the switches and protect the refrigerator car when placed on the dead track. The question, then, is whether at the time this car was set upon the track, and the switchmen of the depot company failed to turn the switches, they were the agents or servants, or their master was the agent or servant, of the defendant, so that the latter may be held for their carelessness under the doctrine of respondeat superior. This question must be answered by a determination of the question whether or not the defendant had the power to command these switchmen, and to direct them what to do and where to do it, when that car was set upon the track. The power of control is the test of liability, under the maxim, Respondeat superior. If the master cannot command the alleged servant, then the acts of the latter are not his, and he is not responsible for them. If the principal cannot control and direct the alleged agent, then he is not his agent, and the principal is not liable for his acts or his omissions. In such case the maxim, Respondeat superior, has no application, because there is no superior to respond. In an action against an alleged master or principal for the act of his alleged servant or agent under the maxim, Respondeat superior, there can be no recovery in the absence of the right and power in the former to command or direct the latter in the performance of the act charged, because in such a case there is no superior to answer. Atwood v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 72 Fed. 447, 454, 455; Byrne v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 24 L. R. A. 693, 9 C. C. A. 666, 22 U. S. App. 220, 61 Fed. 605, 608; *Hilsdorf v. Let us test the claim of the counsel for the plaintiff by this rule. The defendant was a railway corporation which owned and operated railroads from St. Paul to Chicago and from St. Paul to Kansas City. The depot company was a corporation of the state of Minnesota which owned and operated the union passenger depot and the transfer yard in the city of St. Paul. Its capital stock was $350,000, and this stock had been taken in equal amounts by seven railroad corporations, which used the yard and the depot. It had mortgaged its property for $250,000. On January 15, 1894, it made a contract with the defendant in which the parties agreed that the railway company should have the use of the station and yard of the depot company with the other six railroad corporations until 1979, and that it would make this station its main passenger depot in St. Paul; that the depot company would maintain and operate with its own employees its station and its yard; that it would provide all necessary buildings and machinery and all needed mechanics and workmen; that the defendant would pay its proportionate share, to be fixed by the board of directors of the depot company, of the aggregate annual rental of the property of the latter company, which should consist of the current expenses of maintaining and operating the depot and yards, the interest on its mortgage debt, and a dividend of 6 per cent on its capital stock, less the income derived from the rent of the use of the privileges in or on the property to others than the seven railroad companies; that the depot company should have the exclusive right and power to establish reasonable rules and regulations for the operation of the property used, and that the railway company should comply with them; that the depot company would permit the railway company to transfer to and receive from other companies passenger and freight cars, engines, and trains through its yard; that the depot company should have the general control, management, and supervision of the passenger depot, grounds, tracks, and railways constituting its property, and of the business conducted thereon; "that inasmuch as the officers, agents, and employees of the party of the first part (the depot company) are in fact employed for and in furtherance of the business of the companies using said grounds" the depot company shall not be liable to the railway company for any damage resulting to the latter from the negligence of the servants of the former, and the railway company will indemnify the depot company against any claims for damages caused by its engines or cars, or by the negligence of the employees of the depot company while acting for or in furtherance of the business of the railway company, or as the mutual servant of both.

Counsel seize upon the stipulation of this contract last quoted, and insist that by it the depot company and its servants are made the agents and the servants of the defendant, because it recites that they are employed for and in furtherance of the business of the companies using the grounds, and because it promises indemnity against their negligence when acting in furtherance of the business of the defendants or as mutual agents of both. But the relation of the parties to this contract is not to be determined by a single excerpt from it. It must be found by a careful perusal and interpretation of the entire agreement. When the entire contract is read, the true intent of the parties is ascertained, and the test of the power of the defendant to command and direct the switchmen in the performance of the fatal act of negligence is applied, there can remain little doubt that they were neither the servants nor agents of the defendant, and that it was not liable for their omission. The express provisions of the contract that the depot company should have the exclusive management and control of the station grounds and railroads and of the business thereon, the exclusive right and power to make rules and regulations for their operation, and that it should furnish the employees to carry on this business, cannot fail to prevail over the mere recital on which counsel relies for success, and they demonstrate the fact that the defendant company was without any power or authority to control or direct the switchmen in the discharge of any of their duties. It had no right to turn a switch or to command any employee of its own or of any other company to throw one. The limit of its privilege was its right to demand that its cars and trains should be transferred under its agreement; but the exclusive power to determine and to direct its servants how, when, and where this transfer should be made was expressly reserved to the depot company.

The provision that the defendant will indemnify the terminal company against claims for damages arising out of the acts and omissions of the latter's servants while acting in furtherance of the business of the defendant or as the mutual agents of both cannot change the established relations of the parties. It is nothing but a contract of indemnity, and a contract of indemnity does not make the persons against whose acts the indemnity is promised the agents or servants of the indemnifier.

Nor is there anything inconsistent with this conclusion and with the express stipulations of the contract that the depot company shall have the exclusive control and management of its yards and servants in the recital that the latter are employed for and in furtherance of the business of the companies using the grounds. The servants of contractors for the construction of buildings, of railways, and of machinery are employed in furtherance of the business of the parties with whom such contracts are made. But the latter are not the superiors of such servants, within the meaning of the doctrine respondet superior. In the same way the servants of the depot company were employed for, and in furtherance of the business of, the companies using the yards. Yet not one of those companies was their superior, within the true interpretation of the maxim here invoked, because no one of them had the right to control, direct, or command these servants how, when, or where they should discharge their duties. Their acts and omissions, therefore, were not the acts or omissions of the railway companies, and they cannot be charged with liability for them.

The next contention of counsel is that, if the switchmen were not the general agents of the defendant, yet in the omission to throw the switches when the refrigerator car was set upon the track they were acting in its business, and were its servants pro hac vice. This position is untenable for two reasons. In the first place, the act of negligence was not committed when the switchmen were acting for, or in the business of, the defendant. It was committed when they were acting for, and in the business of, one of the other companies using the grounds, viz., in the business of that company which deposited the car upon the dead track. The testimony is that it was the duty and the custom of these switchmen to protect every car deposited on the track at the time it was left there by then throwing the switches. It was in the transaction of the business of the company which left this car, and not in the transaction of the business of the defendant or of any other company, that this duty devolved upon the switchmen. This is demonstrated by the fact that this duty never would have been imposed upon them at all if the car had not been left upon the track. Before it arrived there the switches and the track were in proper position for the passage of the defendant's train. If the car had not been placed there, no change of the switches, no act on their part, would have been required of the switchmen. The deposit of the car imposed upon them the duty to immediately throw the switches to protect it. This duty would have been as fully imposed and the negligence of these switchmen would have been as complete if the defendant had never run another engine or train upon the tracks after the car was deposited. The fatal act of negligence was not committed in furtherance of any business of the defendant, and it is only when the servant of another is engaged in transacting the business of the defendant that he can be held to be the latter's servant pro hac vice.

In the second place, if the switchmen had committed the act of negligence in furtherance of the business of the defendant, they would not have been the servants of the latter, because by the express terms of the contract between the two corporations and by the testimony these switchmen would not have been subject to the control or the direction of the defendant. The testimony is that they were employed and paid by the depot company, that they had exclusive control of the switches, and that no servant of the defendant was permitted to touch them. The contract is that the depot company has the exclusive management and control of the grounds, railways, business, and necessarily of the employees who do the business of that corporation. This stipulation vests this power of control and direction of the switchmen in the depot company just as absolutely, and deprives the defendant of it just as completely, when they are assisting to transact the business of the latter, as when they are acting in furtherance of the business of other railway companies or of the depot company. They could not, therefore, have been the servants pro hac vice of the defendant in the transaction of its business in this yard, because they could not have been subject to its command or direction, under the contract and the testimony. Northern P. R. Co. v. Craft, 16 C. C. A. 175, 29 U. S. App. 687, 69 Fed. 124, 129; Central R. Co. v. Stoermer, 2 C. C. A. 360, 1 U. S. App. 276, 51 Fed. 518, 520; *Kastl v. Wabash R. The cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error where, as in Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. 46 L. J. C. P. N. S. 283, an employer lends his men to another to perform services for him and under his direction; as in Johnson v. Boston, 118 Mass. 114, where he rents them to a city to work with its servants under its direction in constructing a sewer; or as in Ewan v. Lippincott, 47 N. J. L. 192, 54 Am. Rep. 148, and Wiggett v. Fox, 11 Exch. 832, where he furnishes them to others to perform services for them under their control; or as in Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Peyton, 108 Ill. 534, 46 Am. Rep. 705; Vary v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 248; Taylor v. Western P. R. Co. 45 Cal. 323; Miller v. Cornwell R. Co. 154 Pa. 474, 26 Atl. 779; and Mills v. Orange, A. & M. R. Co. 2 MacArth. 314,—where, under the agreement between two individual companies, the employee of the one becomes subject to the control and direction of the other in the very matter wherein the negligence is committed,—are plainly distinguishable from the case before us by the fact that in each of these cases the power to command, direct, and control all the employees in respect to the negligent act was vested in the master of the servant injured. The case of Murray v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 66 Conn. 512, 32 L. R. A. 539, 34 Atl. 508, is not in point, because the cause of action in that suit was based on a contract with a passenger; and the case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 66 Tex. 148, 18 S. W. 444, has no application to this issue, because the negligence there charged was a breach of one of the absolute duties of the master resulting in a defect of the cars and track.

In the case in hand Brady was employed, paid, and commanded by the defendant. The switchmen were employed, paid, and directed by the depot company. Neither corporation had any control over the men in the employment of the other; neither corporation could select, employ, or discharge them. The defendant never had any right or power to direct the switchmen of the depot company what to do or where or how they should discharge their duties. Their acts, therefore, were not its acts. It was not liable for their negligence, and they were not the fellow servants of Brady.

Finally, it is contended that the seven railroad companies which held the stock of the depot company were partners, and that each of them is therefore the coemployee of all the servants of the depot company and liable for all their torts. In the discussion of this proposition cases are cited wherein one corporation which held all the stock of another owned a part of its motive power, and employed and controlled its agents and servants, was held liable for its infringement of a patent (York & M. L. R. Co. v.

Winans, 17 How. 30, 15 L. ed. 27), and where three individual partners in operating a coach line were held liable for the negligence of the driver of one (Bostwick v. Champion, 11 Wend. 571). But these and similar authorities have little tendency to support the theory that this depot company is a partnership, and that each of its stockholders is liable for all of its torts. It acquired its charter from the state of Minnesota. The requisite acts have been done under the statutes of that state to make it a corporation. Those statutes declare that, those acts having been performed, it is a corporation. It has issued and sold its stock. It has made its mortgage and it has transacted the business for which it was chartered for many years. The laws of Minnesota prescribe the duties and fix the liabilities of its stockholders. These are not the duties and liabilities of partners. The stockholders, it is true, have made contracts with the corporation; but there is nothing in those contracts which dissolves the corporation, impairs its existence, or changes the legal relation of the holders of its stock to the legal entity which issued it from that of stockholders to that of partners. There is nothing illegal or inequitable in the contracts. The law of the land fixes the liability of the parties to them, and that liability is not that of partners. The fact that under these agreements the stockholders share the prosperity and adversity of their corporation has no tendency to prove that they are partners, because the stockholders of all corporations share the same fate. The deeds of these stockholders will not convey the property of the corporation. Their only control of it is by the vote of its stock, and by the contracts it makes, and it has every attribute of a corporate entity, while they have every attribute of stockholders. Neither it nor its employees are subject to the command or control of any of its stockholders, within the maxim, Respondeat superior, and neither it nor its servants are either the agents or the servants of the defendant, under the fellow servant law of the state of Minnesota.

The result is that there was no substantial evidence in support of the alleged cause of action in this case, and the court's instruction to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant was right. That judgment is accordingly affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

HICKS BROTHERS, Appts.,
v.
SWIFT CREEK MILL COMPANY.

(133 Ala. 411.)

1. The revocation of a parol license to construct a dam and ditch on the land of the licensor is not prevented by the fact that large expenditures have been made on the faith of it, or that it was given with knowledge that such expenditures would be made.
2. A conveyance of land upon which a third person has been given a parol license to construct a ditch operates as a revocation of the license.
3. A grantee of land over which a third person has been given a parol license to construct a ditch may maintain trespass in case the licensee attempts to act under the license after the grant.
4. Exemplary damages may be awarded for wilfully attempting to enjoy a parol license to maintain a ditch over another's land after the license has been revoked.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Autauga County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for trespass. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to revocability of a license to maintain a burden on land after the licensee has incurred expense in creating the burden, see note to Pifer v. Brown (W. Va.) 49 L. R. A. 497; also Ewing v. Rhea (Or.) 52 L. R. A. 140.

Messrs. Lomax, Crum, & Weil, for appellee:

An executed parol license, where the licensee has gone to expense in consequence thereof, is irrevocable, upon the theory that the revocation under such circumstances would clearly work a fraud upon the licensee, and that the licensor, by standing by and allowing the licensee to make expenditures, relying upon the license, has estopped himself from revoking it.

A license not creating an easement or giving rise to an interest in land, is not within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing.

Tyson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Practically but a single question is presented for our consideration and determination. It is whether the defendant, who is sued for a trespass upon the plaintiff's lands, acquired an irrevocable license from the plaintiff's grantor to use and maintain a ditch and dam for the purpose of floating logs. The facts out of which this question arose are undisputed, and are these: One Smith, being the owner of the lands, in 1896 gave verbal permission to the defendant to construct and operate the ditch and dam upon them, which was done by it at great cost. In August, 1899, the plaintiffs became the owners of the lands by deed upon which these structures were constructed, and went into possession of them, with full knowledge that the defendant was actively using and operating the ditch and dam, claiming the right to do so under the permission given it by Smith. Preliminary to a discussion of the question, it may not be amiss to say that under these facts no question of adverse possession can possibly arise. The entry by defendant being permissive, its possession was not adverse, but was in subordination of the rightful title. Collins v. Johnson, 57 Ala. 304; Jesse French Piano & Organ Co. v. Forbes, 120 Ala. 471, 29 So. 683; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1130. It is not insisted by appellee that the permission granted to it created an easement. Clearly, such an insistence, if made, would be untenable, for the reason that it would have required a deed to have conveyed such a right; for "an easement must be an interest in or over the soil," and does not lie in livery, but in grant. Washb. Easements & Servitudes, p. 6; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 409; Jones, Easements, § 80; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 232. The difference between an easement and a license is, the former implies an interest in land, while the latter does not. An easement must be created, as we have said above, by deed or prescription, while a license may be by parol. The former is a permanent interest in the realty, while the latter is a personal privilege to do some act or series of acts upon the land of another without possessing any estate therein, and is generally revocable at the will of the owner of the land in which it is to be enjoyed. Washb. Easements & Servitudes, supra; Jones, Easements, § 63. And when revocable, it is revoked by the death of the licensor, by his conveyance of the lands to another, or by whatever would deprive him of doing the acts in question or giving permission to others to do them. Hodgkins v. Farrington, 150 Mass. 19, 5 L. R. A. 209, 22 N. E. 73; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1141, and note 10; Jones, Easements, § 73, and note 4. Confessedly, the license to the defendant in this case was revoked by the conveyance of Smith, from whom it acquired it, unless he estopped himself to do so. And this, it is insisted, he did, because the defendant has been at great cost in constructing the ditch and dam, being induced to do so under the permission granted to it. It is further contended that the license has become an executed one, and therefore irrevocable. To use the language of Baron Parke: "It certainly strikes one as a strong proposition to say that such a license can be irrevocable; unless it amount to an interest in land." Williams v. Morris, 8 Mees. & W. 488. To say nothing of so thin and gauzy an attempt to evade the provision of the statute of frauds, requiring a sale of all interest in lands to be in writing except leases for a term not longer than one year; unless the purchase money, or a portion thereof, be paid, and the purchaser be put in possession of the land by the seller. Subdivision 5, § 2152, Code. In other words, we are asked to hold, although the license to the defendant, when granted, was not intended by either party to be anything more than a mere personal privilege to it, revocable by Smith at his will, and knowing, as it did, that under this license it acquired no interest whatever in the lands, that, forsooth with a knowledge of all these facts, it acquired an indefeasible title to an easement over them because it expended money in constructing the ditch and dam. For it is too plain for argument that, if Smith is estopped to revoke the license, all others who may acquire his title would be, and the defendant would enjoy a fee-simple title to an easement, which had its origin in a mere license; and this, too, without paying one cent of consideration therefor, to say nothing of so plain and palpable a violation of the statute of frauds. Smith is not so much as shown, with or without consideration, to have made any promise that he would not exercise his privilege of revoking the license. And there is no pretense that he made any misrepresentation of any fact that induced the defendant to expend its money. The broad proposition is asserted that because he granted the license, knowing the purpose for which it was to be used, he could never revoke it, because it would be a fraud to allow him to do so, and because it has become executed. We are aware that many courts hold this contention to be sound, but we cannot subscribe to it. Reason and the great weight of authority is against it. In Browne, Stat. Fr. § 31, it is said: "In some of the earlier decisions, both English and American, the licensee was protected against revocation on the ground that the licensor was estopped to revoke a license on the faith of which the licensee had incurred expense; but it is now well settled that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply, inasmuch as the licensee is bound to know that his license was revocable, and that in incurring expense he acted at his own risk and peril. Courts of equity also have repeatedly declined to interfere on this ground." See also note 3, for cases cited. In Jones, Easements, § 84, it is said: "An oral promise to grant an easement is not sufficient to raise an estoppel in favor of one who has acted upon it. In a case not relating to easements, Mr. Justice Gray states a principle which is applicable to this subject: 'A promise, upon which the statute of frauds declares that no action shall be maintained, cannot be made effectual by estoppel merely because it has been acted upon by the promisee, and not performed by the promisor.'" In 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1146, it is said: "According to the prevailing view of the courts in England and a large number of the courts of the states of the United States, however, neither the execution of the license nor the incurring of expense, nor both combined, affect the right of the licensor, and he may revoke under all circumstances. It is held that the statute of frauds prevents any act other than the giving of a deed from vesting an irrevocable interest in land." See cases cited in note 7 in support of this proposition. Mr. Freeman, in his note to Lawrence v. 57 L. R. A.

Springer (N. J. Eq.) 31 Am. St. Rep. 713, 715, says: "A parol license is founded in personal confidence, and is defined to be an authority given to do some act, or a series of acts, on the land of another without passing any interest in the land; . . . is a complete answer and defense to a claim of adverse possession set up by the licensee. . . . and is not assignable. . . . At common law a parol license to be exercised upon the land of another creates an interest in the land, is within the statute of frauds, and may be revoked by the licensor at any time, no matter whether or not the licensee has exercised acts under the license, or expended money in reliance thereon. In many of the states this rule prevails, while in others the licensor is deemed to be equitably estopped from revoking the license, after allowing the licensee to perform acts thereunder, or to make expenditures in reliance thereon. These two lines of cases cannot be reconciled, for one of them holds that an interest in land cannot be created by force of a mere parol license, whether executed or not, while the other declares that where the licensee has gone to expense, relying upon the license, the licensor may be estopped from revoking it, and thus an easement may be created. The former line of cases, it seems to us, is founded upon the better reason. They decide that a parol license to do an act on the land of the licensor, while it justifies anything done by the licensee before revocation, is revocable at the option of the licensor, and this although the intention was to confer a continuing right, and money has been expended by the licensee upon the faith of the license. Such license cannot be changed into an equitable right on the ground of equitable estoppel." Case after case might be cited to support the principles announced by these text writers, but they are too numerous to do so here. They can be found by reference being had to the notes referred to in the text quoted. However, before examining the decisions of our own court, we will refer to the case of Thoenke v. Fiedler, 91 Wis. 386, 64 N. W. 1030, because of its striking analogy to the one in hand. We quote from a part of the opinion: "The oral agreement under which the ditch across the defendant's land was made did not create an easement in the land. An easement is a permanent interest in the lands of another, with a right to enjoy it fully and without obstruction. Such an interest cannot be created by parol. It can be created only by a deed . . . or by prescription. But this agreement did not have the effect of a parol license. A license creates no estate in lands. It is a bare authority to do a certain act or series of acts upon the lands of another. It is a personal right, and is not assignable. It is gone if the owner of the land who gives the license transfers his title to another, or if either party die. So long as a parol license remains executory, it may be revoked at pleasure. So an executed parol license, under which some estate or interest in the land would pass, is revocable. Otherwise title would pass without a written conveyance, 'in the teeth of the statute of frauds.' Nor is such a license made irrevocable by the fact, . . . or because expenditures have been made on the faith of it. . . . Nor can the parol agreement be enforced in equity by way of specific performance."

We will now examine our own cases. In Riddle v. Brown, 20 Ala. 412, 56 Am. Dec. 202, it was held that the right "to dig and carry away iron ore" from the mine of another is an easement, and any contract for the sale of such right, to be binding, must be in writing; that a verbal contract conferring such a right, though not binding under the statute of frauds, will nevertheless operate as a verbal license, and while unrevoked will protect the person to whom it was given from trespass quare clausum fregit for digging ore, and vest in him the property in the ore that was actually dug under it; but that it is revocable at the pleasure of the party by whom it was given, and was personal and not assignable. In Motes v. Bates, 74 Ala. 378, it was said: "We find no evidence in the record tending to show that the plaintiff, Bates, had any claim of legal right to be upon this portion of the defendant's field. It is shown that the lessee agreed to use the public road; and his employees or subtenants had no greater rights than he had. If the plaintiff's alleged custom in using the pathway for some time previous could be construed into a permission by defendant to do so, this was, at best, only a parol license, which was revocable at the pleasure of the person giving it. Every license of this kind, by which one is permitted, without consideration, to pass over the lands of another, is essentially revocable in its very nature, its continuance depending upon the mere will of the person by whom it was created or granted,"—citing approvingly Riddle v. Brown, 20 Ala. 412, 56 Am. Dec. 202. In Tillis v. Treadwell, 117 Ala. 448, 22 So. 983, quoting from Rudisill v. Cross, 54 Ark. 519, 16 S. W. 575, where it was held: "The obligation of a landowner to build and maintain a division fence, in whole or in part, for the benefit of adjoining land, is something more, indeed, than an obligation to furnish the materials and labor necessary from time to time for the erection and reparation of the fence. It imposes a burden upon the land itself. A partition fence ordinarily must rest equally upon the land of the respective proprietors. Hence, an agreement of one of those proprietors to maintain such a fence necessarily imports a dedication of the use of the land required to support half of it. To that extent it is, therefore, an estate in the land itself. In accordance, then, with the general rule that an easement, being an interest in realty, cannot be conveyed or reserved by parol, an agreement by an owner of land to maintain a partition fence between such land and that of an adjoining proprietor cannot ordinarily rest in parol, but, to be binding, must be in writing,"—our court then proceeds: "A grant to an adjacent proprietor of the use of a wall on his own premises as a partition wall between their buildings is the grant of an easement, and a parol agreement to build and grant the use of such wall is within the statute. . . . Under our decisions parol agreements for the grant of easements are void under the statute. Riddle v. Brown, 20 Ala. 412, 56 Am. Dec. 202; Hammond v. Winchester, 82 Ala. 470, 2 So. 892." See also the following cases in which Riddle v. Brown is cited approvingly: Heflin v. Bingham, 56 Ala. 575, 28 Am. Rep. 776; Chambers v. Alabama Iron Co. 67 Ala. 357; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Boykin, 76 Ala. 564; Motes v. Bates, 80 Ala. 382; Hammond v. Winchester, 82 Ala. 477, 2 So. 892. The right of a licensor to revoke a license given by him is fully recognized by our court, as will appear from a mere cursory examination of the cases cited above; and, indeed, is fully recognized in the case of Rhodes v. Otis, 33 Ala. 578, 73 Am. Dec. 439, upon which the defendant relies to support its contention of estoppel. Suffice it to say that in that case a consideration was paid for the easement or license, and the licensee or transferee put into possession of the land and water way over which the rights to him were agreed to be granted. There was, therefore, no question of the operation of the statute of frauds, and, indeed, could not be. This being true, upon the plainest principles of equity the licensor or seller should not have been permitted to retain the purchase money paid to him, and to destroy the rights which he had sold to the other party. This is far from sustaining the doctrine contended for here. In Clanton v. Scruggs, 95 Ala. 282, 10 So. 758, it is said: "The fact that one of the parties to such an agreement has acted on the faith of its validity does not raise up an estoppel against the other party to deny that it is binding on him. A mere breach of promise cannot constitute an estoppel in pais. Weaver v. Bell, 87 Ala. 385, 6 So. 298." Continuing, on page 283, 95 Ala., and page 758, 10 So., after quoting from Weaver v. Bell, 87 Ala. 385, 6 So. 298, that "a representation relating to future action or conduct operates as an estoppel only when it has reference to the future relinquishment or subordination of an existing right, which it is made to induce, and by which the party to whom it was addressed was induced to act," the court said: "The representation there referred to does not include a mere promise to do or to refrain from doing something in the future. . . . Brightman v. Hicks, 108 Mass. 246. Such a rule of estoppel would take the sting out of the statute of frauds, and defeat its manifest purpose." The case of Brightman v. Hicks, cited approvingly, is the one from which the quotation from Jones on Easements was taken.

It is clear that the decisions of this court are in harmony with the principles announced by us and with the text writers from whom we have quoted at length. Smith, not being estopped, his conveyance of the land ipso facto was a revocation of the license to the defendant; and the plaintiffs, having acquired the legal title to the land and to the ditch, were entitled to the immediate possession thereof, and have a right to maintain this action, and to recover such damages as they may have suffered by reason of the trespass committed by defendant. Davis v. Young, 20 Ala. 151; Boswell v. Carlisle, 70 Ala. 244; Dunlap v. Steele, 80 Ala. 424; Fields v. Williams, 91 Ala. 502, 8 So. 808. And the jury may award exemplary damages if they see proper. Wilkinson v. Searcy, 76 Ala. 181; Alley v. Daniel, 75 Ala. 408. "Whatever is done," says Shaw, J., in Wills v. Noyes, 12 Pick. 324, "wilfully and purposely, if it be at the same time wrong and unlawful, and that known to the party, is, in legal contemplation, malicious." Lynd v. Pickett, 7 Minn. 184, Gil. 128, 82 Am. Dec. 79.

There is nothing in the facts which tends in the remotest degree to show that the plaintiffs ever renewed the license. On the contrary, they are shown to have asserted their rights under the revocation by demanding the payment of rent of defendant.

It is scarcely necessary to say that no damages for the negligent maintenance or operation of the ditch or dam are sought to be recovered in the complaint, and, indeed, could not be under its averments.

Reversed and remanded.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

BRINKLEY CAR WORKS MANUFACTURING COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Fred COOPER.

(.....Ark.....)

A boy six years old, knowing that hot water will burn, cannot recover damages for injuries received from voluntarily or carelessly walking into a pool of it formed by emptying a boiler on premises on which he is trespassing.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Monroe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Riddick, J.:

The Brinkley Car Works & Manufacturing Company, a corporation organized under the laws of this state, has its plant located at Brinkley, Arkansas. It was the custom of the company to let the water out of its boiler once every two weeks to cleanse the boiler. When the water was thus let out, it flowed into a depression on the premises of the company, and formed a shallow pool of hot water, but in about an hour it sank into the earth. The water was usually let out on Sunday so that the boiler could be cleaned out on Monday following. On a Sunday, shortly after the boiler was emptied, Fred Cooper, a boy six years and two months old, who was playing on the premises of the company, walked into the pool of hot water, and was severely scalded on his feet, legs, and hands. He brought this action against the company to recover damages for the injury. In explanation of the accident, he testified that he and another boy were on the side of the mill where the water came out of the box, and went into the pool. "We were," he said, "throwing bark and chips into the water in the mouth of the pit, and watching the steam rise. The pool was covered with bark, except when the force of the water had pushed it back at the mouth of the pool. The rest of the pool was covered up with trash and bark, so that the water could not be seen, and when I stepped in I thought it was ground, and did not see the water."

The court in its instruction No. 1 instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the agent or agents of the defendant had knowledge, or ought reasonably to have known, that the plaintiff, and boys about the age of plaintiff, were in the habit of playing at the pool of water where the plaintiff was injured, and on and about its premises around and near said pool, and thereafter made no effort to protect said pool from exposure as would prevent the plaintiff and other children of his age from going into it and receiving said injury, the defendant would be guilty of negligence, and you will find for the plaintiff." Defendant duly objected, and saved exceptions to the giving of this instruction. The plaintiff recovered judgment for $1,800, from which judgment the company appealed. This is the second time the case has been before this court, and a fuller statement of the facts can be found reported with former opinion, in 60 Ark. 545, 31 S. W. 154.

Riddick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought for a minor by his next friend to recover damages for injuries received by him from a pool of hot water on the premises of the defendant company. The case has been twice tried, and is now before this court for the second time. On the first trial the plaintiff rested his right to recover on the fact that the company permitted a pool of hot water on its premises to be covered over and concealed by bark and trash, so that plaintiff, a boy of six years of age, while playing on the premises, and not knowing that there was a pool of hot water there, walked into it, and was burned. On the appeal from the judgment rendered on that trial the case was reversed by this court, for the reason that the instructions of the trial judge did not submit to the jury the question whether under the circumstances in proof, the company ought reasonably "to have anticipated that children of the age of the plaintiff would probably [go upon the premises and] receive such injury as the plaintiff did receive by reason of the situation and condition of the pool of water at the time the plaintiff received his injury." The court said that "the owner of land is not required to provide against remote and improbable injuries to children trespassing thereon, but he is liable for injuries to children trespassing upon his private grounds when it is known to him that they are accustomed to go upon it, and that, from the peculiar nature and exposed and open condition of something thereon which is attractive to children, he ought reasonably to anticipate such an injury to a child as that which actually occurs." Now, it seems from some of the instructions given on the second trial that the circuit judge understood from this language that the defendant company was liable in this case if its officers knew that boys about the age of plaintiff were in the habit of playing at or near the pool of water where the injury occurred, and made no effort "to so protect the pool from exposure as would prevent the plaintiff and other children of his age from going into it and receiving injury." But the language of the court in the opinion must be taken in connection with the facts as they were alleged and proved on the other trial. It was alleged on that trial, and the evidence tended to show, that the pool of hot water was concealed by trash and bark, and that the boy, not knowing of its presence, accidentally walked into it and was injured.

The court, in effect, said of this state of facts that the mere fact that there was a pool of hot water concealed by bark and trash on the premises of the defendant, into which a boy had accidentally walked and was burned, was not of itself sufficient to make out a case. This shallow depression into which the water ran from the boiler was on the private grounds of the defendant, some distance from the nearest street or traveled way. The water was turned into it only once in two weeks, and remained there but a short time before it cooled or sank into the earth and became harmless. Under these circumstances, the court held, in effect, that the proof must not only show that the pool was concealed and dangerous, but must go further, and show that the company knew that boys were in the habit of frequenting the place or would probably come there, and would be liable to receive injury from the pool left in such concealed condition. There are few boys of six years of age that do not know that fire or hot water will burn, and if this boy possessed that amount of intelligence, and yet went on the premises of the company, and of his own volition or carelessness walked into an open pool of water that he knew was hot, we think that no recovery can be had for injury thus sustained by him. If the law was otherwise, one could not boil water in an open kettle on his premises without being liable for damages to any boy who should come and put his hand into it, unless he went to extra precaution to prevent the boy from getting to the water. Such a rule, carried to its logical conclusion, would, as said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, render the owner of a fruit tree liable for damages to a trespassing boy who in attempting to get the fruit should fall from the tree and be injured. It would charge the duty of protecting children upon every member of the community except upon their own parents. Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365. We did not intend to lay down such a rule in the former opinion in this case, but we hold that if the company owning the premises had notice that children did frequent the place of this pool, or were from the nature of the surroundings likely to do so, and if it carelessly left a pool of hot water there concealed in such a way that one would reasonably expect it to occasion injury to such children, the company would be liable for damages to a boy who by reason of its concealed nature walked into the pool of hot water and was burned.

An owner of land has the right to use it for any lawful purpose, and this company had the right to operate its manufacturing plant and empty the hot water from its boilers on its own premises when it became necessary to do so, and before it can be made liable for an unintentional injury caused to a boy of six years of age by such hot water two things are necessary: First, it must be shown that the company had notice that this boy or other children were likely to come upon its premises; and, second, that by reason of the concealed nature of the pool of water, or the want of notice on the part of the children of the condition of the water, injury to them ought reasonably to have been foreseen on the part of the company as a consequence of leaving the pool of water in that condition. Watson, Damages for Personal Injuries, p. 291, § 234.

If the pool of water was open, and not concealed, and the boy had notice that it was hot, we think the company could reasonably suppose that a boy six years of age would not intentionally or carelessly put his foot into water known by him to be hot, and if he did so, and injury resulted, we do not think the company is responsible. The law on this point was correctly stated in the sixth instruction given at the request of the defendant, and other instructions given at the trial were correct, but others were not so clear, and instruction No. 1, given at the request of the plaintiff, seems in conflict with some of those given for the defendant.

We said in the former opinion that the instructions were erroneous because they assumed that the company was liable to any child trespassing on its grounds for an injury caused by a concealed pool of hot water; whether there was anything to put the company on notice that a child was likely to come upon the premises or not, and now we must hold that one of them is erroneous for the reason that it assumes that the company, if it had notice that children were accustomed to frequent its premises, is liable for any injury inflicted on a boy by a pool of hot water, though he may have known that the water was hot, and may have possessed sufficient intelligence to appreciate the danger, and yet walked into it of his own volition or carelessness. Such a rule might be just as to very young children having no knowledge or appreciation of such danger, but a boy over six years of age should know better than to knowingly or carelessly put his foot into a pool of scalding water. He testified in this case that he did know better. His testimony shows that he knew the water in the pool was hot, and he stepped in it unintentionally. He said that he and a companion were watching the steam rise from the end of the drain where the water ran into the pool. "The pool," he says, "was covered with bark, except where the force of the water had pushed it back at the mouth of the pool. The rest of the pool was covered up with trash and bark, so that the water could not be seen, and where I stepped in I thought it was ground, and did not see the hot water." This tends to show that he was misled by the concealed nature of the pool. But there is conflict in the evidence on this point, and that question was not fairly submitted to the jury. Instruction 1, given at the request of the plaintiff, permitted a recovery without regard to whether the boy had notice that the water was hot or not, or whether the pool was concealed or open.

We think that this instruction was erroneous and prejudicial, and for that reason the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered. The appellant did not comply with the rule requiring all the instructions given on the trial to be set out in the abstract, where a reversal is asked on account of error in instructions. For that reason it is ordered that no costs for printing briefs be taxed in its favor.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

STIMSON MILL COMPANY, Respt.,
v.

F. W. BRAUN et al., Appts.

(136 Cal. 122.)

A statute making a contract for the construction of a building, in which the contract price is payable with something besides money, so far invalid as to furnish the owner no protection from the claims of subcontractors and materialmen, is an unconstitutional infringement of the owner's right to the possession and enjoyment of his property.

NOTE.—The power of the legislature to compel payment of obligations to be made in money, so far as it relates to the payment of wages of employees, is considered in a note to Avent-Beattyville Coal Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 28 L. R. A. 273.

As to the power of the legislature to prescribe the kind of money in which payment may be made by agreement, see cases in note to Skinner v. Santa Rosa (Cal.) 29 L. R. A. on page 516.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to enforce mechanics' and materialmen's liens. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Borden & Carhart, for appellants;

Section 1184, Code Civ. Proc., is repugnant to the Constitution of the state of California.

Liens of subcontractors, materialmen, and laborers, under a valid original contract, are dependent on the contract, and can only be enforced in subordination to the terms of such contract.

Bowen v. Aubrey, 22 Cal. 571; Dore v. Sellers, 27 Cal. 594; Dingley v. Greene, 54 Cal. 336.

The subcontractor cannot acquire any rights against the owner in violation of the terms of the original contract.

Given a valid contract, the lien claimant can only enforce his lien for that portion of the contract price which remains due and unpaid from the owner to the contractor when the lien is filed.

Turner v. Strenzel, 70 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. 389; Whittier v. Hollister, 64 Cal. 283, 30 Pac. 846; Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 170, 6 L. R. A. 588, 22 Pac. 509.

That portion of § 1184 which says that the owner shall be deemed to order the materials, etc., is an effort to force upon the owner a liability which he never assumed. This is in violation of his constitutional rights.

Dore v. Sellers, 27 Cal. 588.

The statute is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

Messrs. Wilson & Bulla, George D. Blake, and Brown & Newby for respondents.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants were the owners of certain property in Los Angeles, upon which was a five-story building, known as "Vickery Block," and entered into a contract with the defendants Parton and Tuttle for its improvement. This improvement included taking out all the interior work of the building and furnishing the material and labor necessary to reconstruct it in accordance with certain drawings and specifications. The contract provided that the appellants should pay to the contractors for the work and materials $12,254 in certain instalments, the last of which, amounting to $3,064, was to be paid thirty-five days after the completion and acceptance of the work. One provision of the contract was, "all old material to be the property of the contractor," and in the specifications attached thereto was the provision, "The contractors shall have the right to use such old material in building the new building and reconstructing the old as may be in conformity with the specifications and plans, to the approval of the architect." No sum was agreed upon between the owners and the contractors as to the value or price of the said old material, but the court found that the value of that portion which was not used in the reconstruction of the building was $2,200. The above-named plaintiff furnished certain materials to the contractors, which were used by them in the performance of their contract, for which it filed a claim of lien, and it is also the assignee of other materialmen and laborers who had filed notices of their respective claims of lien upon the said property. The present action is for the foreclosure of these liens. The appellants paid to the contractors the several instalments of the $12,254 agreed to be paid by them as they became due, except the final one of $3,064, and at the time of filing their answer herein brought into court 57 L. R. A.

and deposited with the clerk said last-named sum, to be distributed by the decree of the court to the parties entitled thereto according to their respective rights. Other actions brought by other lien claimants were consolidated with the action brought by the above-named plaintiff, and were tried at the same time. The court found the value of the labor and materials furnished by the several plaintiffs and their assignors to be $9,804.44, for which, together with attorneys' fees amounting to $553, and the costs of the actions, they were entitled to a lien upon the property. Judgment was thereupon entered, directing a sale of the property, and that the plaintiffs be paid the said amounts out of the proceeds thereof. From this judgment the owners have appealed.

The court held that the provision in the contract that all the old material of the building not used in its reconstruction was to be the property of the contractors was in effect a part of the contract price for the improvement, and being in violation of the provision of § 1184, Code Civ. Proc., that the whole contract price shall be in money, the labor done and materials furnished by the plaintiffs were, under another provision in the section, deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance and request of the appellants. This provision of § 1184 is as follows: "As to all liens, except that of the contractor, the whole contract price shall be payable in money. . . . In case such contracts and alterations do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section, the labor done and materials furnished by all persons, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance and request of the person who contracted with the contractor, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." The section does not declare a contract not made in these terms to be void, but, while holding that it is valid between the owner and the contractor, it purports to give to the materialmen and laborers the right to enforce payment from the owner of the value of the materials and labor furnished by them, irrespective of the contract price or compensation agreed upon between him and the contractor, notwithstanding he may have fully and strictly complied with the terms of the contract. Under many decisions of this court, if the statute was susceptible of such a construction, it would be invalid. See the cases cited in Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 175, 6 L. R. A. 588, 22 Pac. 511, where it was said that, "where there is a valid contract between the owner and contractor, such contract is the measure of the owner's liability." The provision in the Constitution respecting mechanics' liens (art. 20, § 15) is subordinate to the declaration of rights in the same instrument, which declares (art. 1, § 1), that all men have the inalienable right of "acquiring, possessing, and protecting property," and, in § 13, that no person shall be deprived of property "without due process of law." The right of property antedates all constitutions, and the individual's protection in the enjoyment of this right is one of the chief objects of society. He has the right to enjoy his property and improve the same according to his own desires, in any way consistent with the rights of others, subject only to the just demands of the state. This right is invaded if he is not at liberty to contract with others respecting the use to which he may subject his property, or the manner in which he may enjoy it. The legislature may prescribe the form in which contracts shall be executed in order that they may be valid or binding, but it cannot limit the right of parties to incorporate into their contracts respecting property, otherwise valid, such terms as may be mutually satisfactory to them. A statute declaring invalid any contract by the owner of real property for the construction of a building thereon, unless it is provided therein that the contract price shall be payable only in money, is unconstitutional, in that it is an infringement upon the right of the owner in the possession and enjoyment of his property. The legislature could with equal right declare that all contracts for the sale of merchandise, or for the manufacture of machinery, or for the employment of artisans, should be invalid unless they should provide that the payment thereunder should be made only in money. The right of the owner of land to contract with a builder for its improvement, and to compensate him therefor with other real property, or with personal property other than money, is the same, and as inalienable, as the right of the owner of any other property to contract respecting the payment for any improvement thereof. The materialmen and the laborers are protected in their right to a lien by the provision in § 1183, Code Civ. Proc., requiring such contract to be in writing and made a matter of public record. They know that, in accordance with the decisions of this court, the legislature cannot give a right of lien to an extent greater than the contract price. By being placed upon record the contract is open to their inspection and examination, and if they are not content with its provisions they may decline to furnish any materials for the building, or perform any labor thereon. But if they do furnish any, their right to a lien must be limited by the terms of the contract. If, after the owner has agreed with the contractor to compensate him with property other than money, they may, with knowledge of the terms of such contract, still enforce a lien upon the building for the value of materials and labor furnished by them to the contractor, the owner would be deprived of his property without due process of law, by being compelled to pay more for the improvement than he had contracted for. The principle involved herein is cognate to that recently discussed by Mr. Justice Temple in Gibbs v. Tally, 133 Cal. 373, 65 Pac. 970, where it is held that the provision in § 1203, Code Civ. Proc., requiring the contract to be accompanied by a bond, places an unreasonable restraint upon the owner of property in regard to its use, and is therefore invalid. The reasoning of the opinion in that case is applicable to the above provision of § 1184, as is also the rule there stated as follows: "Where there is a valid contract under which the work was done, and which is performed by the owner, all that the statute attempts to do, and in fact all that can be done, is to enable the laborer, materialmen, and subcontractors to cause the contract price to be applied to the payment of their demands."

years without keeping or stating an account, and making improvements on the trust property, go back, charge himself with the income received, and credit the account with the cost of the improvements, leaving himself debtor to the beneficiaries, on the theory that it was his personal duty to support his family, for the purpose of preventing his creditors from reaching the improvements.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court of Lynchburg in favor of defendants in a suit to subject to payment of complainant's claim property held by defendants in trust. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Randolph Harrison and A. R. Long, for appellant:

Defendant's creditors have a right to in-

This note does not collate the cases that turn upon the status of parents who have been divorced or judicially separated.

I. Introductory.

The father is under legal obligation to support his infant child. Authorities to this effect are cited in note to Porter v. Powell (Iowa) 7 L. R. A. 176. In addition, reference may be made to the following cases: Gilley v. Gilley, 79 Me. 292, 9 Atl. 623; Dawes v. Howard, 4 Mass. 97; Raymond v. Loyl, 10 Barb. 483; Furman v. Van Sise, 56 N. Y. 435, 15 Am. Rep. 441.

An infant has no right to an action in equity to compel his father to support him. Huke v. Huke, 44 Mo. App. 308.

The cases differ upon the question whether, in case of the death or disability of the father, the mother is under like obligation to support her infant children. The following cases affirm this obligation: Alling v. Alling, 52 N. J. Eq. 92, 27 Atl. 655; Wilkes v. Rogers, 6 Johns. 566; Furman v. Van Sise, 56 N. Y. 435, 15 Am. Rep. 441; Freyre v. Tiernan, 76 Tex. 286, 13 S. W. 370; State use of Smith v. Martin, 18 Mo. App. 468; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Palmer, 55 Neb. 559, 76 N. W. 169; Bradley v. Sattler, 156 Ill. 603, 41 N. E. 171; Ellis v. Soper, 111 Iowa, 631, 82 N. W. 1041.

The following cases deny the existence, on the part of the mother, of an obligation that is legally enforceable: Englehardt v. Yung, 76 Ala. 534; Hughart v. Spratt, 78 Ky. 313; Whipple v. Dow, 2 Mass. 415; Worcester v. Marchant, 14 Pick. 510; Strawbridge's Appeal, 5 Whart. 568; Jordan v. Coffield, 70 N. C. 110 (Criticism in Re Lewis, 88 N. C. 81); Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Gratt. 143; Re Cottrell, L. R. 12 Eq. 566, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 70, 25 L. T. N. S. 405, 19 Week. Rep. 1076.

The universal rule is that a stepfather, as such, is not under obligation to support the children of his wife by a former husband, but that, if he takes the children into his family or under his care in such a way that he places himself in loco parentis, he assumes an obligation to support them, and acquires a correlative right to their services. Billingsley v. Critchett, 1 Bro. Ch. 268; Williams v. Hutchinson, 3 N. Y. 312, 53 Am. Dec. 301; Re Ackerman, 116 N. Y. 654, 22 N. E. 552; Freto v. Brown, 4 Mass. 675; Mulhern v. McDavitt, 16 Gray, 404; Kirchgassner v. Rodick, 170 Mass. 543, 49 N. E. 1015; Livingston v. Hammond, 162 Mass. 375, 88 N. E. 968; Re Dissenger, 39 N. J. Eq. 227; Brown's Appeal, 112 Pa. 18, 5 Atl. 13; Hardy v. Leary, 43 N. C. (8 Ired. Eq.) 57 L. R. A.

sist that he be required to charge the trust property with the support of his family to the extent of the income, and he will not be permitted, by this voluntary surrender of a right which the law gives, to impose on his creditor the burden of his bounty.

Hauser v. King, 76 Va. 731.

If there is an agreement that the father shall have maintenance out of the trust property, the trustee must apply the income to the support of the children without reference to the father's ability to support them.

II. Obligation of parent who has ability to support.

The obligation of a parent, or of one standing in loco parentis, who is able to support the child, is not affected by the child's interest in a trust estate or other property.

Where the testator gave the residue of his estate to his grandson "at the age of twenty-one, and if he die before that age" then to one Freeman, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said: "The law of nature obliges only fathers to maintain their children, and, unless the child from the mean circumstances of the case is in danger of perishing for want, the court will not direct the interest that should be made of a contingent legacy to be applied for that purpose; so that, unless the parent is totally incapable, or under particular circumstances, as having a numerous family of children, and is bordering upon necessity, the law of the land and of nature make it incumbent upon the parent to maintain his child." Butler v. Freeman, 3 Atk. 58.

Where the father is of sufficient ability to maintain his child no allowance will be granted from the child's estate. Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Atk. 515; Wood's Estate, 13 Phila. 391; Re Harland, 5 Rawle, 323; Haglar v. McCombs, 66 N. C. 845; Burke v. Turner, 85 N. C. 500; Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord, Eq. 254, 16 Am. Messrs. Caskie & Coleman and Wilson & Manson, for appellees:

If the expenditure was intended as a gift to the beneficiaries, and not as a loan, yet, the amount having been returned to the trustee from the trust property that received the benefit of the expenditure, prior to the institution of this suit, the trust fund owes the trustee nothing, and the improvement cannot be subjected.

The beneficiaries have shown that they furnished adequate consideration for the improvement; but if they have shown that they furnished any consideration at all, the decree of the lower court must be sustained, they attained to twenty-one years of age, and if they died without issue before that age a gift over to others, the interest to be applied to the education and support of the children, a reference was ordered to report upon the father's ability before making an allowance to the father from the income. It was said: The court will not direct an allowance to the father of the infants out of their estate where they have any other sufficient provision for their maintenance, or a right, which can be enforced, to demand it from other sources. The court therefore will not direct an allowance to the father of the infants out of their estate, where he is of sufficient ability to maintain and bring them up without it, in reference to their situation and prospects in life, having due regard to the claims of others upon his bounty. Re Kane, 2 Barb. Ch. 375.

Where the infant had a small property, and her father had an income of $7,000 a year, he was not allowed, as guardian, to charge against his daughter the expense of maintaining her for a year at college. Re Wilber, 27 Misc. 53, 57 N. Y. Supp. 398.

The mere fact that a mother has maintained her children gives rise to no implied promise to pay, the presumption being that it was a gratuity on her part. Seltz's Appeal, 87 Pa. 159.

Nothing will be allowed a father for maintenance out of an infant's estate except on special grounds. Addison v. Bowle, 2 Bland, Ch. 606.

A father who was guardian of his child was authorized to use income of the child's property for her support, but died without making such use of it, having himself maintained her. After the father's death, where the question arose between the infant and her father's widow and other children in reference to the amount that was due the infant from the trust fund left in the hands of the guardian, it was held that the claim of the widow and other children that the support of the infant should be charged against the fund in the father's hands could not be sustained. Stigler v. Stigler, 77 Va. 163.

A guardian will not be credited for the expense of supporting his ward where the ward's father was of ability to furnish such support. Windon v. Stewart, 43 W. Va. 711, 28 S. E. 776.

The administrator of a father may not maintain a claim for the past maintenance of his children. Such maintenance creates no debt. Presley v. Davis, 7 Rich. Eq. 105, 62 Am. Dec. 396.

"The rule is that a father, if he be of ability, 57 L. R. A.

for the bill does not allege that the improvement was made on an inadequate consideration, but that it was made wholly without consideration.

Millhiser v. McKinley, 98 Va. 207, 35 S. E. 446.

A father is bound to maintain his infant children if he has sufficient ability; therefore a trustee cannot apply any part of the income of an infant's estate to its maintenance without an order of court. If the father has the means to maintain his children, the trustee cannot apply income to their support, although there is a provision for their maintenance in the instrument of trust.

2 Perry, Tr. § 612; Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Gratt. 146; Griffith v. Bird, 22 Gratt. 80; Evans v. Pearce, 15 Gratt. 515, 78 Am. Dec. 635; Stigler v. Stigler, 77 Va. 171.

must maintain his child, unless totally incapable, or, by having a numerous family of children, he borders upon necessity, the duty of providing for them devolves on him." Dupont v. Johnson, Ball. Eq. 279.

Where a father, on the ground of his inability, was given an allowance from the child's estate, and subsequently, and during the minority of the child, he became able to furnish support, he was held liable to reimburse the child. Fuller v. Fuller, 23 Fla. 236, 2 So. 426.

A claim against the estate of a deceased child for funeral expenses cannot be enforced where the father is able to pay them. Rowe v. Raper, 23 Ind. App. 27, 44 N. E. 770.

Counter to the authorities above given, is Re Marx, 5 Abb. N. C. 224, in which Surrogate Calvin states: "It is a mistake to suppose that a parent is under obligation to support his minor children where they have property that may be applied for that purpose."

III. Application of child's property.

a. In general.

Where a parent is unable to support his children in a manner suitable to the latter's position and expectation in life, a court having equity powers may authorize or sanction the use of the child's separate estate for its support and education. Bethea v. McColl, 5 Ala. 308; Stewart v. Lewis, 16 Ala. 734; State use of Cannon v. Layton, 1 Harr. (Del.) 324; Holtzman v. Castleman, 2 MacArth. 555; Osborne v. Van Horn, 2 Fla. 360; Chapline v. Moore, 7 T. B. Mon. 173; Gerdes v. Weiser, 54 Iowa, 591, 37 Am. Rep. 229, 7 N. W. 42; Kinsey v. State ex rel. Shirk, 71 Ind. 32; Corbaley v. State ex rel. Holmes, 81 Ind. 62; Pyatt v. Pyatt, 46 N. J. Eq. 285, 18 Atl. 1048; Harring v. Coles, 2 Bradf. 349; Clark v. Montgomery, 23 Barb. 464; Kendrick v. Wheeler, 85 Tex. 247, 20 S. W. 44; Re England, 1 Russ. & M. 499.

Such authority for, or sanction of, the use of the child's separate estate for its support and education, may also be given when the terms of the instrument making a provision for the child's benefit provide for it, notwithstanding the fact that the parent has ability to support it. See infra, III. b. 1, 2, 3.

"Suppose the father or mother should be in a low or mean condition in the world, the court will order, especially in the case of a mother, that the child should be maintained out of a provision left to it by a collateral relation." Fawcner v. Watts, 1 Atk. 406.

Keith, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears from the bill that the National Valley Bank of Staunton on the 20th of December, 1894, discounted for the Traders'

Bank of Lynchburg its note for $5,000, which, after being curtailed from time to time, was renewed on the 19th of December, 1896, for $3,150 at sixty days. Along with this note certain collaterals were delivered from which there was realized the sum of $1,150.25. Those uncollected were returned to the Traders' Bank, and in place of them the Bank of Staunton received six notes as security for its debts. The collaterals thus received were three notes of Rucker, Clark, & Co., dated August 23, 1894, payable thirty-nine months after date to James Hancock, and indorsed by James Hancock and the Traders' Bank of Lynchburg, each for the sum of $225.20; two notes of P. V. Rucker, dated October 1, 1894, payable three years and forty-two months, respectively, after date to Rucker, Clark, & Co., and indorsed by Rucker, Clark, & Co., James Hancock, the father was without ability to maintain his children, it was held that the estate of the wife could not be taken into consideration, she not being under a legal obligation to maintain the children, and that maintenance should be allowed to the father from the children's estate. Haley v. Bannister, 4 Madd. 275.

Where the infants were entitled to the fund absolutely on attaining the age of twenty-one years, and only £30 each per annum was given by the will to the mother for their maintenance, and her own income was only £100 under the will, an increase of the amount granted for maintenance was allowed. Aynsworth v. Pratchett, 13 Ves. Jr. 321.

In England the general rule has been modified by statute. Section 126 of chapter 145, 23 and 24 Vict., passed in 1860, and § 43 of the conveyancing and law property act 1851, hereinafter referred to more at length under infra, III. b. 6, authorize trustees to apply income to the infants' support, whether there be any other fund applicable to the same purpose, or any other person bound by law to provide for such support.

A widowed mother stands in the same relation to her child as the father does during his life. In a case where the mother was poor, and had become insane, a claim for board was charged against the children's property. Girls' Industrial Home v. Fritchey, 10 Mo. App. 344.

In Matthews v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 75, and Mauerman v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 41 Mo. App. 348, it is held that on the death of the father the mother succeeds to the duties and obligations of her husband touching minor children.

In a case where the father had died intestate, leaving a large fortune, and it appeared that the income of the mother alone was not sufficient for all, it was held that the mother was entitled to an allowance for the support of the children. Wilkes v. Rogers, 6 Johns. 566.

In Heyward v. Cuthbert, 4 Desausa. Eq. 445, an allowance was made to the mother for the maintenance and education of her daughters and for the maintenance only of the sons, the education of the sons to be left to the executor of their father's estate.

In Trimble v. Dodd, 2 Tenn. Ch. 500, the court says: "If the father be without the necessary means to maintain his children according to their future expectations, or if he have the means but the income of the children is larger than his own, the modern usage is to make an allowance to the parent for maintenance."

b. In particular cases.

1. Contract.

Certain English cases, some of which are referred to in NATIONAL VALLEY BANK V. HANCOCK, make a distinction between cases where the trust fund has its origin in a contract, usually a marriage settlement, and those in which it arises from a will or deed of gift. These cases go back to Mundy v. Howe, 4 Bro. Ch. 224, decided in 1793. In that case, pursuant to a marriage settlement and the will of the wife thereunder, trustees were "authorized and required" to pay for the maintenance and education of the children. The father of the children, without making any suggestion that he was not able himself to support them, applied for an allowance from the trust funds. The Lord Chancellor said: "It is perfectly clear from the cases that where the fund is given as a bounty, notwithstanding a provision for maintenance, the father if of ability must maintain the child; but in this case it is part of the execution of the trust contained in the contract." Maintenance was allowed.

Where by a marriage contract a fund, the property of the wife, was settled in trust for the children of the marriage at twenty-one, with a proviso that after the death of the wife, and until the children's shares should become payable, it was "upon trust to pay and apply" the income "for and toward the maintenance and education of such child or children" with a gift over to the husband for life, etc., the Master of the Rolls said: "This must be considered as a fund provided by the father, inasmuch as, but for the settlement, he would have taken it by virtue of his marital right. The settlement, however, altogether deprived him of any personal benefit (and so it was intended) so long as there was living issue of the marriage; but the proviso that the issue should have maintenance out of the trust fund clearly formed an integral part of the contract, and was one of the considerations which had moved the husband to join as a party in the settlement. He therefore had a right to have it strictly enforced in his favor without reference to the question of his ability." Meacher v. Young, 2 Myl. & K. 490.

In a similar case, where the settlement was by the wife's father, and trustees were authorized to apply the income, at their discretion, for the maintenance and education of the children during their minorities, it was held after the wife's death that the husband, without regard to his ability, was entitled to require that and the Traders' Bank of Lynchburg, for $250; and one note of W. E. Clark, dated October 1, 1894, payable thirty-nine months after date to Rucker, Clark, & Co., and indorsed by Rucker, Clark, & Co., James Hancock, and the Traders' Bank of Lynchburg, for $250.

The bill charges that after exhausting every means to collect the collaterals in the possession of the Bank of Staunton, there was a balance due by the Traders' Bank of Lynchburg of $1,999.75 of principal and $267.55 of interest as of February 24, 1899, which will be wholly lost unless it can realize on the notes indorsed by James Hancock.

It is charged that James Hancock holds title as trustee under the fifth clause of the will of his father, the late A. G. Hancock, to a valuable house and lot situated on Main street in the city of Lynchburg, called the "Traders' Bank Building," now occupied by the National Bank of Lynchburg. The trust declared by the will of A. G. Hancock is as follows:

"Item 5. I give and devise to my said son, James Hancock, as trustee for his wife and children, including those now born and all that may be born to him by his present or any future wife he may take, my storehouse and lot on Main street, Lynchburg, on the west side, between Ninth and Tenth streets, now occupied by M. E. Doyle, which I value at $14,000, to be held in trust, not subject to his debts or liabilities, for the support and maintenance of his present and any future wife he may take and all his children; the said trust to continue during the life of the said James Hancock, and if at his death he shall leave a wife surviving the income should be applied to the maintenance and education of the children, following the last two cases. Stocken v. Stocken, 4 Myl. & C. 95, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 305, 2 Jur. 693, 4 Sim. 152, 2 Myl. & K. 489.

Where by a marriage settlement trustees were merely given power to apply income to the maintenance and education, the father was held not entitled to an allowance without proof that he was unable himself to maintain the children. Referring to the distinction taken between cases where the property of the children is derived from the bounty of a stranger and under marriage settlements, such as Mundy v. Howe, 4 Bro. Ch. 224, Stocken v. Stocken, 4 Myl. & C. 95, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 305, 2 Jur. 693, 4 Sim. 152, 2 Myl. & K. 489, and Meacher v. Young, 2 Myl. & K. 490, Lord Chancellor Cottonham says that the distinction "has been carried quite as far as can be justified upon principle;" adding: "In both cases the question is one of construction and intention. In all the cases referred to there were distinct and positive trusts to apply the income to the maintenance of the children, applicable, according to the construction put upon the whole of the provision, to the case of a surviving father." It was held that where there is a mere power in the trustees to apply, the father cannot compel the exercise of that power, except as he can show that he is himself unable to support the children. Thompson v. Griffin, Craig & P. 317, 5 Jur. 90.

In Ransome v. Burgess, L. R. 3 Eq. 773, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 84, 15 Week. Rep. 189, there was a marriage settlement under which trustees were to apply the whole of the income, or so much as they might think fit, to the maintenance and education of the children,—the principal to be vested in them at the age of twenty-one years. Vice Chancellor Kindersley repeated and indorsed the criticisms upon the distinction made in Mundy v. Howe, 4 Bro. Ch. 224, and the cases that follow it, but held that in the case before him the father was entitled to have applied for the maintenance of the child so much of the income as might be necessary for that purpose, without reference to his own ability.

Attention is called to the references to the last case cited, and to Hadow v. Hadow, 9 Sim. 438, and Brown v. Paull, 1 Sim. N. S. 92, 20 L. J. Ch. N. S. 75, 15 Jur. 5, in NATIONAL VALLEY BANK v. HANCOCK.

Where trustees held two sums of £10,000 each, upon two trusts, one created by marriage settlement and one by will, but in the same terms, with the provision that the income "shall and may be paid and applied and disposed of by the said trustees for the time being, for or towards the maintenance, education, and advancement in life of the children, or child, or issue who, for the time being, shall be presumptively entitled thereto, in such way and manner as they, the said trustees or trustee for the time being, shall think proper." Vice Chancellor Mallins says: "The words are 'shall and may' and those words in my opinion constitute a trust, and not merely a power, and the consequence is that the father, whether he is of ability to maintain the children or not, is entitled to such part of the income of the property for the maintenance and education of the children as is necessary. . . . Although the question arises partly under a settlement and partly under a will, and although perhaps as to the latter on the cases the point is not quite clear, I think it is sufficiently so to enable me to make the same declaration as to both sums." Newton v. Curzon, 16 L. T. N. S. 696.

Where a father made a voluntary post-nuptial settlement for the benefit of his wife and children, and authorized the trustee to "apply the whole or such part as the said trustees or trustee shall think fit of the income" "for and towards" the maintenance or education of his child, Mallins, Vice Chancellor, uses the following language: "If this were a case of an ante-nuptial settlement, and therefore having its basis in contract, and where probably money of the wife would also be put into settlement, the case would have been completely settled by authority; because it has been treated as settled law, from Mundy v. Howe, 4 Bro. Ch. 223, downwards,—contrary, in my opinion, as well as in expressed opinions of Lord Cottonham and Vice Chancellor Kindersley, to sound principle,—that where there is a trust for maintenance in a settlement made upon marriage, and the father has maintained the children without calling for contribution from the fund, he is in the position of a purchaser of so much of the fund as it would have been proper to apply towards maintenance. The construction put upon the trust is, that it constitutes a contract which entitled the father to claim the fund, though no demand may have been made by him for contribution from it. These decisions are, in my opinion, most unreasonable, but I should have followed them in a case of a settlement upon marriage. There is, however, no case where the doctrine has been held to apply, except where the trust for maintenance is contained in an ante-nuptial settlement, and where, consequently, it can be sup-him, until her death. Upon his death, if no wife survive him, or if one do survive him, upon her death, the said property shall pass in fee simple absolute to all the children of the said James Hancock in equal shares; the descendants of any who now have died leaving descendants them surviving to take the share of their deceased ancestor."

This will bears date April 17, 1888, and was recorded in the clerk's office of the corporation court of Lynchburg on June 6, 1888. Those interested in the foregoing clause are Alice Hancock, wife of James Hancock, and certain infant children.

The bill states that the building at present on the lot was "erected during the year 1895 by the said James Hancock, and paid for by him with his individual funds, at which time Hancock was indebted as aforesaid on the notes held by your orator herewith filed; and your orator is advised that the said Hancock, being thus indebted, could not lawfully divert his own estate to the improvement of the trust estate as aforesaid, and leave his indebtedness to your orator unpaid and unprovided for; that the money expended by Hancock out of his individual estate in improving the trust estate being voluntary, and without consideration, was in fraud of the rights of your orator, and that the estate can, in favor of your orator, be charged with the value of said improvements."

James Hancock, in his answer, denies that the present indebtedness of the Traders' Bank to the complainant, or that any part thereof, existed in 1895, and claims that only one of the respondent's notes ever came into the complainant's hands as collateral ported by the marriage contract. The question, therefore, is still open in the case of a purely voluntary settlement like the present." Re Kerrison's Trusts, L. R. 12 Eq. 422. It was held, accordingly, that the accumulations of income belonged to the children, and could not be reached by the trustee of the father in bankruptcy. A further reference to this case is made infra, IV.

Mundy v. Howe is limited, and Ransome v. Burgess is disapproved, in Wilson v. Turner (1883) L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 521, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 270, 48 L. T. N. S. 370, 31 Week. Rep. 438. That was the case of a marriage settlement where personal property was settled upon trust for the wife for life, and after her death for the children, with a provision that after the death of the wife the trustees should "apply the whole or such part as the said trustees or trustee should think fit of the annual income of the share or fortune to which any child should for the time being be entitled in expectancy under the trusts thereinbefore declared for or towards the maintenance or education of such child, either directly, or to his or her guardians or guardian, without seeing to the application thereof, or requiring any account of the same." After the death of the wife the trustees paid the whole of the income to the father (who supported the infant) as the father's property and without exercising any discretion. After the father's death the son claimed repayment from his father's estate, with an accounting. This was decreed. Jessel, M. R., said, in criticising Mundy v. Howe, 4 Bro. Ch. 223: "But it is difficult to see how the construction of a marriage settlement can be different from that of a will. . . . On the other hand, considering the number of times Mundy v. Howe has been recognized in this court, it is quite impossible for this court now to say that that case is not law and not binding upon it. But it does appear to me, having regard to the dissatisfaction of so many judges, and considering the effect of that decision, that it is not part of our duty to carry it any further."

In the same case Lindley, L. J., says: "The question which arises must be looked at from two points of view: First, What is the principle? and secondly, how it has been applied. I understand the principle to be, that we must look at every clause that comes before us in order to see whether there is a trust for the maintenance of the children such as would enable the father to insist on the trust fund being applied for the maintenance of the children, although he is himself able to maintain them. If 57 L. R. A.

there is such a trust he is entitled to have the children maintained out of the trust fund; if there is no such trust he is not." It was held that in the case at bar there was no such trust. Ransome v. Burgess, L. R. 3 Eq. 773, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 84, 15 Week. Rep. 189, was said to be on all fours with the case at bar, the words of the trust in that case being undistinguishable from those under consideration; but that case was disapproved.

2. Express trust for maintenance.

Where the language of the instrument whereby the children obtain the title to the property is such as to constitute an express trust for their maintenance, then application of the income for that purpose must be made without regard to the father's ability to support them.

This principle is involved in Newton v. Curzon, 16 L. T. N. S. 696, and Re Kerrison's Trusts, L. R. 12 Eq. 422, supra, III. 1, b.

Where there was a bequest to the children of H. when they should attain the age of sixteen years, with the direction to pay the income to H. for their maintenance and education, there was a reference to consider what would be a proper allowance for such maintenance, notwithstanding the fact that the father had a considerable income. Hoste v. Pratt, 3 Ves. Jr. 730.

Where the trust included a direction to apply the income for the maintenance and education of the children, and the father received the rents and mingled them with his own funds, maintaining the children himself, it was held, after the death of the father, that his executors were entitled to be allowed, in account, sums which it would have been proper to apply for those purposes, on the ground that he had been entitled to an allowance independently of his own means. Stocken v. Stocken, 4 Sim. 152, 2 Myl. & K. 489, 4 Myl. & C. 95, 7 L. J. Ch. N. S. 305, 2 Jur. 693.

Where the will directed that the yearly income should be paid to the testator's husband "to be by him applied in or towards" the maintenance of the children, the court held that it constituted a trust, and, though the trustees were given discretion, directed the application of the income "for the maintenance and education of the children, but to no greater amount than is proper for the purpose." White v. Grane, 18 Beav. 571.

3. Gift to parent for maintenance.

Where the gift is to the parent for the main-for the original debt. The answer denies the allegation that James Hancock expended money out of his individual estate in improving the trust property held under the will of his father, or that it was made in fraud of complainant's rights. His account of the transaction is that when the property was devised by his father it was valued at $14,000, with a storehouse which was rented out up to January 1, 1895; that during this period respondent had a good income from his own property and business, which was that of a leaf tobacco dealer; that he was able to maintain and did maintain his wife and children from his own means, and, as the storehouse was old and getting into bad condition, he determined to tear it down, and erect a bank building on the trust property; that respondent owed the trust fund the sum of $602.30, with interest from November 5, 1888, and rents received from the trust property from 1888 to 1895, amounting to the sum of $5,765; that he erected the building under a contract with the Traders' Bank to rent it at an annual sum of $1,750; that it cost $9,100; and that since January 1, 1895, and prior to the institution of this suit, he had collected from the rents of said property the sum of $6,391.66, had paid the city taxes, amounting to $408.90, and state taxes, amounting to $109.08, so that the balance due respondent from the trust fund had been paid back to him in full.

Upon the issues thus made and the proof in support of them, the judge of the circuit court, "being of opinion that the allegation of the bill that the moneys expended by the defendant, James Hancock, trustee, in improving the trust property, was of his in-tenance of the children it is regarded as in effect a gift to the father, and he is entitled to receive the income without regard to his ability to maintain the children.

Where the bequest was to the father, "the better to enable him to provide for his younger children," the income was ordered paid to the father. Brown v. Casamajor, 4 Ves. Jr. 498.

Where a grandfather vested his estate in trustees to pay certain annuities, and, subject thereto, to pay the residue of the income "for and towards the maintenance and education" of the grandchildren, the Lord Chancellor said: "The practice was to refer it to the master to inquire whether the parents were of ability to maintain the children; if not, then to report what would be a proper maintenance; and this practice did not vary where a maintenance was directly given by the will, unless in cases where it was given to the father, under which circumstances it was a legacy to him." Hughes v. Hughes, 1 Bro. Ch. 387.

In so far as the last case holds that maintenance of infants is not allowed where a parent is of ability, although there is a direction to that effect in the will, it has not been followed by later cases, and, as stated in NATIONAL VALLEY BANK v. HANCOCK, it is understood that Lord Thurlow, who pronounced the judgment in Hughes v. Hughes, himself changed his opinion upon that point.

Where there was a legacy to the testator's niece of a sum to be allowed to and expended by her, at her discretion, for the education of her son, and she was not to be accountable to her son, or to any other person, for such application of the money, it was held that the niece was entitled to the money subject to the setting apart of a sufficient sum for the education of her child during his minority, and this, notwithstanding the fact that the father of the child was living. Hamley v. Gilbert, Jac. 354; Thurston v. Essington, Jac. 361, note.

"Where the interest of the children's legacies is given to a parent to be applied for or towards their maintenance and education, there, in the absence of anything indicating a contrary intention, the parent takes the interest subject to no account, provided only that he discharges the duty imposed on him of maintaining and educating the children." Browne v. Pauli, 1 Sim. N. S. 92. See, to the same effect, Berkeley v. Swinburne, 6 Sim. 613, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 165, and Hadow v. Hadow, 9 Sim. 438, cited in NATIONAL VALLEY BANK v. HANCOCK.

his two daughters, granddaughters of the testator, and, after giving the two grandchildren eleven negroes, he directs that his son "shall have the use of the property herein devised to them until they come of age or marry, for their maintenance and education." It was held that the use of the slaves was given as an equivalent for the education and maintenance of the daughters, and that their father was not liable to any account other than to show that he had performed that obligation. Rainsford v. Rainsford, Rice, Eq. 348.

Where a testatrix gave the income of one fourth of her estate to her husband to be used in the maintenance of her children by him, it was held to be a gift to relieve the father of their support, and he was allowed credit for the entire amount, it appearing that it was a proper amount for their support. Camden Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Ingham, 40 N. J. Eq. 3.

4. Where trustees have discretion.

Where a testator gave an annuity to his grandchild to be applied "in and towards her maintenance and education and for her benefit and advantage and in such manner as his trustees should in their absolute and uncontrollable discretion think fit, whether John Stephens, her father, should be able to maintain and provide for her or not," and the trustee made a very small payment, while the father had maintained the infant, it was ordered that the full amount of the annuity, both for the time past and as it accrued in the future, should be paid to the father, he undertaking properly to maintain and educate the daughter, and to abide by the order of the court. Stephens v. Lawry, 2 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 87, 12 L. J. Ch. N. S. 71.

A testator gave £3,000 to three children or the survivor or survivors who should attain the age of twenty-one years, with a gift over if all died under that age, and a direction to the trustees to pay and apply the whole of the income, or such part as they should think fit, to the maintenance and education of the infants. It was held that the discretion of the court should control that of the trustees, and where they had allowed only £80 a year to the father for maintenance (the court being satisfied that the father was of insufficient ability), the court directed the whole income of £100 to be allowed for that purpose. Vice Chancellor Malins says: "Paying every respect, as I always do, and as I am bound to do, to the discretion of the trustees, I still must exercise my own judgment, and take that dividual estate, and voluntary, and without consideration, is not sustained, but, to the contrary, the evidence shows that the moneys belonging to the children and the rents received from the trust property by said trustee constituted a valuable consideration for the expenditures made," dismissed the bill.

The case is before us upon an appeal from this decree.

There can be no doubt of the right of a creditor in a proper case to subject improvements made by his debtor on the property of another. This subject was recently considered by this court in New South Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Reed, 96 Va. 345, 31 S. E. 514, where the court, speaking through Judge Harrison, said: "D. V. Reed, having created the debts due to the appellants, could not thereafter lawfully divert his estate to the payment of purchase money due from his wife on her separate real estate, or to the cost of improving said real estate, leaving his own debts unpaid, and without the means of payment. It is well settled that improvements put upon the wife's separate realty by the husband in fraud of creditors can be followed by the creditors on the premises where they are put, and the realty can, in favor of the creditors, be charged with the value of such improvements. It would be contrary to the plainest principles of right and justice to permit an insolvent husband to divert his means, and invest it in improving his wife's separate estate, which is not liable to his debts, and thus defeat the demands of his creditors."

Appellee insists, however, that, inasmuch as the notes with which it is now sought to charge the trust property were assigned to course for my wards which I think is most for their benefit." Davey v. Ward, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 754, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 335, 26 Week. Rep. 390.

Where trustees under a will were to pay the income of a bequest to children to their mother, "to be by her applied for their benefit at her discretion," and the father and mother lived apart and the father supported the children, on the petition of the father for an allowance to him the court held that the mother did not "exercise a sound discretion, and that, where the court finds such to be the case, though the income is by the words of the will left to the discretion of a given person, the court has power to control that discretion and to deal with the income." Re Roper's Trusts, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 272, 27 Week. Rep. 408, 40 L. T. N. S. 97.

Where trustees were given power to apply income for the maintenance of children, notwithstanding their father might be living and able to maintain them, and the trustees desired to apply the same, the court held that it would not interfere with such discretion. Brophy v. Bellamy, L. R. 8 Ch. 798, 43 L. J. Ch. N. S. 183, 29 L. T. N. S. 380.

In Davey v. Ward, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 754, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 335, 26 Week. Rep. 390 (cited in NATIONAL VALLEY BANK V. HANCOCK), there was a legacy to three children and to the survivor who should attain the age of twenty-one years; if none lived to be twenty-one, then over. Trustees were authorized to "apply the whole or such parts as they or he [the said trustees or trustee for the time being], shall think fit" of the income "for or towards" the maintenance, education, and advancement in the world of the infants. The surplus of income was to be accumulated. Vice Chancellor Mallins held that he had power to overrule the discretion of the trustees, and to direct a larger share of the income than the trustees were willing to appropriate for that purpose, to be paid to the father for the support and education of the children.—It appearing that the father was unable himself to give them proper advantages.

Where a trustee has discretion to apply income to the support of a child, and the father becomes bankrupt, and the trustee, in the exercise of his discretion, advances sums to the father for such support, and thereafter the father acquires property, he cannot be compelled to refund to the trustee the amount of the advancements. Pearce v. Olney, 5 R. I. 269.

Where a trustee is given discretion as to the maintenance of children the court will not interfere if he has exercised that discretion within the limits of a sound and honest exercise of the trust. Read v. Patterson, 44 N. J. Eq. 211, 14 Atl. 490.

5. Where there is a direction for accumulation, or no express authority for use of income.

Under this and the next following subdivision certain cases are cited, not as directly involving the question of a parent's liability, but as laying down principles of construction that probably would be applicable in cases involving the additional element of a parent's inability to support his child. This explanation applies to Harvey v. Harvey, 2 P. Wms. 21; Greenwell v. Greenwell, 5 Ves. Jr. 194; Kime v. Welfitt, 3 Sim. 533; Rhoads v. Rhoads, 43 Ill. 239; Lomax v. Lomax, 11 Ves. Jr. 48; Ex parte Kebble, 11 Ves. Jr. 604.

The courts have gone far in favoring the application of income to the maintenance of infants when it seemed to be for their welfare.

A father had devised all his property to his eldest son, charged with the payment of £1,000 each to his younger children when they should attain the age of twenty-one years, but made no provision for maintenance for the younger children during their minorities. Application was made in behalf of the younger children for maintenance, "upon which the Master of the Rolls, having taken time to consider the case and having also been attended with precedents, decreed that the younger children should recover maintenance. His honor observed that, these being vested legacies and no devise over, it would be extremely hard that the children should starve when entitled to so considerable legacies for the sake of their executors, administrators, who, in case of their deaths, would have the legacies." Harvey v. Harvey (1722) 2 P. Wms. 21.

There was a direction for accumulation of income during the minority of infants, with a gift over in case none attained full age. Maintenance was allowed by Lord Chancellor Rosslyn, though he stated that he feared that it would be his will, and not the testator's. Greenwell v. Greenwell, 5 Ves. Jr. 194, Cavendish v. Mercer, 5 Ves. Jr. 195, note, and Fendall v. Nash, 5 Ves. Jr. 197, note, are to like effect, it appearing, however, in Cavendish v. Mercer that the father was of insufficient ability, and in Fendall v. Nash that the father was bankrupt.

In Errat v. Barlow, 14 Ves. Jr. 202 (where the Bank of Staunton after the erection of the building, appellant would have no right to attack the transaction, even though it were conceded that Hancock had improved the trust property with his own funds, invoking for his protection the principle that "an assignment of a bare right to file a bill in equity for a fraud committed upon the assignor will be held void as contrary to public policy, and as savoring of the character of maintenance."

It is true that a mere naked right to sue in equity to avoid a fraud is not assignable, but, as stated in 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 1024, 1025, this rule applies only to a case where the assignment does not carry anything which has itself a legal existence and value independent of the right to sue for a fraud. It does not apply to a case where such right is merely incidental to a subsisting substantial property which has been assigned, and which is itself intrinsically susceptible of legal enforcement. In such a case the assignee is entitled to maintain an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the property assigned, if his assignor might have done so.

Wait, Fraud. Conv. 2d ed. § 92, says "that the right to avoid a fraudulent conveyance is not personal to the then existing creditor. His successors and assigns may enforce the right. Thus, the subsequent purchaser of a pre-existing note may attack a transfer." Warren v. Williams, 52 Me. 349; Billingsley v. Clelland, 41 W. Va. 234, 23 S. E. 812; Schaferman v. O'Brien, 28 Md. 585, 92 Am. Dec. 708.

2 Minor, Inst. p. 690, treating of the right to avoid voluntary conveyances, says it appeared that the father was not of ability), Greenwell v. Greenwell and Fendall v. Nash were disapproved by Lord Chancellor Eldon, who states: "The result is that if the chance of surviving [among several children] is equal among all, and no other interest that upon any contingency would take effect would be defeated, maintenance shall be allowed out of the interest; but it is impossible to give it where, in any event, under the operation and construction of the will, that interest may possibly belong to other persons."

Where there was an express direction for accumulation during minority of infants (the testator, their father, understanding that other ample provision had been made for the children, which proved to be a mistake), with a gift over if no child lived to be twenty-one years of age; and it appeared that there was the possibility of issue unborn who might be entitled to the accumulated fund,—it was held that it would not be proper to affect their rights by an allowance for maintenance. Kime v. Wellitt, 8 Sim. 533.

Where the testator had directed his trustees to accumulate the income of the infant's trust fund it was held to be intended to preserve the income, and not to prevent the application of it to their benefit if necessary, and that therefore no "contrary intention" was expressed in the will, under § 43 of the conveyancing act of 1881 (infra, III. b, 6). It appeared that the income of the father of the children was not sufficient for their support. Re Thatcher's Trusts, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 428, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1050, 32 Week. Rep. 679.

In the case of an absolute direction for accumulation for twenty-one years of property worth £10,000 a year, thereafter to be held in trust for Sir Henry Havelock, a major general in the army, and "the brave, pious, and highminded son of the illustrious soldier, Sir Henry Havelock," and for his eldest son and other sons in tail,—it was held that, as Sir Henry Havelock was possessed of only a moderate income, the sum of £2,700 per annum from the death of the testator should be allowed him for the benefit of his two infant sons. Havelock v. Havelock, L. R. 17 Ch. Div. 807, 50 L. J. Ch. N. S. 778, 44 L. T. N. S. 168, 29 Week. Rep. 859.

The will of a father gave a trustee discretion to apply the income of a trust fund to the education of his infant child. The child's mother was the only other person who, in case of the death of the infant, could have an interest in the income, and upon her application the court ordered an allowance from the £7 L. R. A.

income for the maintenance, as well as the education, of the infant, proof being given of the necessities of the mother. Pitts v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. 21 R. I. 544, 48 L. R. A. 783, 45 Atl. 553.

An allowance is made, even where the will directs accumulation during the minority of the infant, provided it appear that the father is unable to support. Tompkins v. Tompkins, 18 N. J. Eq. 303.

"Where legatees comprise a class, all or some of whom must absolutely take the fund, all having a common interest in it and an equal chance of taking or being survivors, . . . courts of equity will allow interest for maintenance to infant legatees, and this though there is a direction for the accumulation of the interest for the benefit of the common fund, and although the infant legatees have a father living, but without sufficient ability to support and educate them according to their future expectations." Newport v. Cook, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 332.

Where a will directed an estate to be accumulated for fifteen years, it was held that the court could direct anticipation for maintenance of infants. The court says: "This does not subvert the will, or tend to defeat the intention of the testator, for the children were the darling objects of his solicitude, and were he living he would undoubtedly make ample provision for them. A court of chancery may do what it is evident from the will the testator would do if living." Rhoads v. Rhoads, 48 Ill. 239.

6. Where infant's rights are contingent.

The following English cases, in addition to those already cited, in which the element of contingency is found, occurred before the passage of the English statute modifying the early rule.

A petition was presented for maintenance out of the interest of a legacy to the children of testator's daughter, to be vested when the youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years. Lord Chancellor Eldon says: "If all die under twenty-one, and a child, not yet in existence, should come into existence and attain that age, that child clearly would take the whole interest as well as principal. Therefore I may give it to these children who may never become entitled to it." The application was therefore refused. Lomax v. Lomax, 11 Ves. Jr. 48.

In Ex parte Keble, 11 Ves. Jr. 604, Lord Eldon says: "The case in which maintenance that the statute upon the subject protects persons suing ex maleficio, as for adultery or seduction, or any tort, and, a fortiori, those claiming ex contractu, as for a debt, or for breach of an official bond; and that whether as the original creditor or his assignee. Clough v. Thompson, 7 Gratt. 28; Staton v. Pittman, 11 Gratt. 102; Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. (Va.) 735.

This brings us to the consideration of the controlling question in the case: Does the record establish the allegation of the bill that Hancock, being at the time indebted, diverted his own estate to the improvement of the trust estate in derogation of the right of his creditors?

It is true that a father, if of ability to do so, is bound to maintain his infant children, even though they may have property of their own. Evans v. Pearce, 15 Gratt.

has been allowed, though not given by the will, is where there are children, some or one of whom must take the property, and all have an equal chance of surviving and a present interest. But it cannot be done if there is a gift over, or if the children are not all the persons among whom it is to go."

Where legacies with interest were given to grandchildren on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, with a gift over in case neither attained that age, maintenance was refused, though it appeared that the father was unable to furnish it. Errington v. Chapman, 12 Ves. Jr. 20.

In 1860, what is known as Lord Cranworth's act was passed, being 23 and 24 Vict., chap. 145, which provided as follows: "In all cases where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant, either absolutely or contingently on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, or on the occurrence of any event previously to his attaining that age, it shall be lawful for such trustees, at their sole discretion, to pay to the guardians (if any) of such infant, or otherwise to apply, for or towards the maintenance or education of such infant, the whole or any part of the income to which such infant may be entitled in respect to such property, whether there be any other fund applicable to the same purpose or any other person bound by law to provide for such maintenance or education or not." Then follows a provision for accumulation of residue of income "for the benefit of the person who shall ultimately become entitled to the property from which such accumulation shall have arisen," and a provision that the trustee might at any time "apply the whole or any part of such accumulations as if the same were part of the income arising in the then current year."

In Re Cotton, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 232, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 201, 33 L. T. N. S. 720, 24 Week. Rep. 243, Jessel, M. R., says that Lord Cranworth's act "really extends to all infants the benefit which in Chambers v. Goldwin, 11 Ves. Jr. 1 [cited herein under III. b, 5, supra] and other cases, the court had extended to infants for whom a provision had been made on the contingency of their attaining twenty-one, by a parent or a person standing in loco parentis. In cases where the person making the provision was a parent or stood in loco parentis the court held that the attaining of twenty-one was put in simply to fix the time of payment, and not to deprive the child of the benefit in the meantime, and accordingly it gave the income by way of maintenance. But it declined to ex-

515, 78 Am. Dec. 635; Griffith v. Bird, 22 Gratt. 73. This principle is stated by Perry on Trusts as follows: "A father is bound to maintain his infant children if he has sufficient ability. Therefore a trustee cannot apply any part of the income of an infant's estate to its maintenance without an order of court. If the father has the means to maintain his children, the trustee cannot apply income to their support, although there is a provision for their maintenance in the instruments." § 612.

There seems, however, to be an exception or modification of this rule, which, in the section just quoted from Perry, is thus stated: "If there is an agreement in a marriage settlement that the father shall have maintenance out of the trust property, the trustee must apply the income to the support of the children without reference to the tend the rule to other cases, and consequently the legislature intervened."

Where a definite sum was set apart for maintenance, with a direction that the balance of the income of the trust fund should accumulate in order that it might form a part of the testator's general personal estate, it was held that the court could not, under Lord Cranworth's act, appropriate an additional sum from the income for maintenance (the capital being payable "if and when" the infant should be twenty-one, or marry). The court says: "The rule of law is well established that a contingent legacy does not carry interest while it is in suspense, except in the case of a legacy by a parent or one standing in loco parentis to the legatee; and that exception is subject to another exception that the rule giving interest to the child does not take effect when the testator has provided another fund for his maintenance so that the income of the legacy is supposed not to be required for the purpose." In that case it was held as to the infant: "If she attains twenty-one she will not become entitled to any of the intermediate income." Re George, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 837, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 118, 37 L. T. N. S. 204, 26 Week. Rep. 65.

Where the trust fund was to go to the daughters who should attain twenty-one years of age, and their father was unable to furnish them maintenance, a charge upon the principal was allowed sufficient to raise a considerable amount for the maintenance of the daughters, together with the amount of a single payment of premium on insurance against the event that none of the daughters should attain the age of twenty-one. DeWitte v. Pallin, L. R. 14 Eq. 251, 26 L. T. N. S. 825, 20 Week. Rep. 858.

In 1881 was passed the English conveyancing and property act (44 & 45 Vict. chap. 41), § 43 of which provides: "Where any property is held by trustees in trust for an infant, either for life or for any greater interest, and whether absolutely or contingently on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, or on the occurrence of any event before his attaining that age, the trustees may, at their sole discretion, pay to the infant's parent or guardian, if any, or otherwise apply for or towards the infant's maintenance, education, or benefit, the income of that property, or any part thereof, whether there is any other fund applicable to the same purpose, or any person bound by law to provide for the infant's maintenance or education, or not." Then follow provisions for accumulation of income and use of the same as father's ability to support them. If, however, the trustees have a discretionary power in that respect, the father cannot compel them to exercise it in his favor; nor will the court interfere if they choose to exercise their discretion. But where the income is expressly given to the father for the maintenance of his children, these rules do not apply, for such gift is in some sort a gift to the father."

3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1309, note, gives the exception to the rule as follows: "Where the property is not given to the infants simply with a direction for their maintenance, but is conveyed upon an express trust for their maintenance, then it must be so applied irrespective of their father's ability to support and educate them." This distinction is recognized in 2 Story, Eq. Jur. p. 600, note.

needed, and the following qualification of the effect of the act: "This section applies only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the instrument under which the interest of the infant arises, and shall have effect subject to the terms of that instrument and to the provisions therein contained."

Where the testator directed the trustees to accumulate the income of infant's trust fund, it was held, under the act last cited, that the provision was intended to preserve the income, and not to prevent the application of it for the infant's benefit if necessary, and therefore that no "contrary intention" was expressed in the will. Re Thatcher's Trusts, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 426, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1050, 32 Week. Rep. 679.

Section 48 of the act of 1881 was held to be an extension of Lord Cranworth's act, and to replace § 26 of that act, and to avoid the question raised in Re George, L. R. 5 Ch. Div. 837, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 118, 37 L. T. N. S. 204, 26 Week. Rep. 65. The act was held to give to the trustees "extraordinary powers of dealing with the interest upon infant's contingent legacy so that they can take away from the residuary legatee so much of the interest or accumulations as may be necessary for the infant's maintenance, education, or benefit." But where the contingency was the infant's survival of a third person then in being, it was held not to be a contingency "on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, or on the occurrence of any event before his attaining that age;" and where in such a case the contingent legacy did not carry interest until it was payable, it was held that no application of the statute could be made. Re Judkin's Trusts, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 743, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 496.

The court has no power to allow maintenance to infants out of a fund which may on the happening of a contingency belong to some other person. Re Davison, 6 Paige, 136; Re Ryder, 11 Paige, 185, 42 Am. Dec. 109; Deen v. Coxsens, 7 Robt. 178.

Where there is a legacy by a parent to his child, or a grandparent to his grandchild, or by one standing in loco parentis, equity may decree an allowance of interest, if necessary, for the support of the infant, whether the legacy be vested or contingent on the attainment by the infant of a certain age. Seibert's Appeal, 19 Pa. 49; Leiby's Appeal, 49 Pa. 182.

c. To what extent.

1. Need of child.

The general rule is well stated in Ela v. 57 L. R. A.

In a note to Hughes v. Hughes, 1 Bro. Ch. 387, it is said that maintenance of infants is not allowed by courts where the parent is of ability, although directed by the will. In a note it is said that Lord Thurlow continued of this opinion for some time, and the precedents certainly supported him; but that afterwards he changed his opinion, and the practice afterwards became varied, and was settled to the contrary. "It appears, therefore," says the annotator, "that each case must be viewed by the court so as to meet its exigencies by a sound discretion, unfettered by any strict rule of mere technicality; and that it will not only now allow maintenance for the time past, where it should be allowed at all, but will, in a fit case, direct maintenance, although the author of bounty may not have expressly prescribed it. The court

Brand, 63 N. H. 14, as follows: "What allowance, if any, shall be made to a father out of his children's property for their maintenance, is a broad question of equity. The circumstances of each case, including the respective estates of father and child, are considered, and the decision is a just and reasonable conclusion of fact with due regard for the general rule of parental duty."

Where the trustee was to receive the income, and "to apply and dispose of the same or a sufficient part thereof for and towards the maintenance, education, support, and bringing up" of the children, and it was shown that the father had a clear income of only £1,000 a year, Lord Chancellor Loughborough ordered a reference to consider what would be a proper allowance for the maintenance of the children. Hoste v. Pratt (1798) 8 Ves. Jr. 730.

"Where there is a numerous family of children who are infants, upon an application for maintenance for the eldest son, the court will make a liberal allowance to him that he may be the better able to maintain his brothers and sisters, considering him in the light of the father of the family." Petre v. Petre, 3 Atk. 511; Lanoy v. Athol, 2 Atk. 447.

In Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, 1 Jac. & W. 647, a liberal allowance was made to an infant in order that he might provide for the maintenance of an illegitimate brother otherwise unprovided for.

Where six children had an income of £8,600 a year, an allowance of £1,400 a year for their support was made to the father, notwithstanding he had himself an income of £6,000 a year. It appeared that the father had to maintain two houses to the absorption of his own income. Sir William Grant says: "It would be a harsh thing for the court to oblige the petitioner to put down his establishment in any part to educate his children when they have large incomes of their own." Jervoise v. Silk, Coop. Ch. 52.

Where the trust was to pay the income to the father "to be applied by him for the maintenance and education" of the infant children, and the misconduct of the father and mother had led the court to commit the guardianship of the children to others, and the parents were indigent, the allowance for the maintenance of the children was increased to provide for the support of their parents. The court said: "To do so is evidently for the benefit of the infants themselves." Allen v. Coster, 1 Beav. 202, 9 L. J. Ch. N. S. 131.

Where it appeared that the children had a joint income of between $3,500 and $4,000 a will also dispense with any reference as to the father's ability where the circumstances are strong; as where the fortune of the child is very large, and the father has other children, or will be much inconvenienced by the burden of supporting the child adequately to a fortune in which he (the father) cannot participate."

In Mundy v. Howe, 4 Bro. Ch. 226, the Lord Chancellor said: "It is perfectly clear from the cases that, where the fund is given as a bounty, notwithstanding a provision for maintenance, the father, if of ability, must maintain the child; but in this case it is part of the execution of the trust contained in the contract."

In Davey v. Ward (1877-78) L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 754, a testator gave a legacy of £3,000 to three children, or the survivors or survivor, who should attain twenty-one; but, year, and the father was unable himself to keep up an establishment such as would correspond to their prospects in life, he was allowed $2,500 a year, the court stating that the rule was to seek that which was best calculated to promote the permanent interest, welfare, and happiness of the children, rather than an accumulation of income. Re Burke, 4 Sandf. Ch. 617.

In McKnight v. Walsh, 23 N. J. Eq. 136, the rule laid down in Re Burke, 4 Sandf. Ch. 617, and in the English cases just cited, is disapproved. The court says: "The dotage and authorities in the English cases are founded upon the law of primogeniture, and the established custom among the nobility and gentry by which the heir at law upon whom the family seat devolves, as well in infancy as when of age, is, by their customs, bound to keep up the family mansion as a home for his sisters and younger brothers, and is allowed out of his estate sufficient for that purpose." The testator had directed his executor to invest $25,000, and after the death of testator's daughter to expend the legal interest toward the proper maintenance of her child or children during their minority. The executor paid the entire income to the father of the daughter's child. It was held that the executor was entitled to credit only for such part of the payments to the father as were reasonable for the support of the child, and that no further credit could be given on the theory that larger payments were proper to enable the father to live in a style suitable to the condition and prospects of the infant.

To obtain an allowance a father need not be actually bankrupt. The welfare of the child, the means of the father, the demands of others upon him, and the future expectancy of the child will all be considered. Bedford v. Bedford, 136 Ill. 354, 26 N. E. 662.

2. Past and future maintenance.

The old English rule was that if a father had by any means maintained his children the court would not grant him an allowance by way of reimbursement for what he had spent in the past. This was the doctrine of Hill v. Chapman, 2 Bro. Ch. 231, and Andrews v. Partington, 3 Bro. Ch. 60, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 223.

In Hoste v. Pratt, 3 Ves. Jr. 730, it was stated by Sir John Mitford as amicus curie that Lord Thurlow afterward changed his opinion on this point as expressed in Andrews v. Partington.

And in Nisson v. Shaw, 9 Ves. Jr. 286, the Master of the Rolls said, referring to Andrews v. Partington: "That case has been very much 57 L. R. A.

if all three died under twenty-one there was a gift over. The will contained a direction to the trustees to apply the whole or such parts as they should think fit of the income of the legacy for the maintenance and education of the legatees while under twenty-one. The court held that it had power to control the discretion of the trustees in the allowance to be made for children; and the court, in opposition to the trustees, directed that the whole income should be paid to the father of the children for their maintenance, together with an equal amount for past maintenance.

In Ransome v. Burgess (1866-67) L. R. 3 Eq. 773, Vice Chancellor Kindersley states the result of the cases to be "that, where the trust property is derived from the bounty of a stranger, the father, if of sufficient ability, is not entitled to have the in-shaken. I have found two decrees of Lord Alvanley allowing maintenance for the time past."

In Reeves v. Brymer, 6 Ves. Jr. 425, and Sherwood v. Smith, 6 Ves. Jr. 454, Lord Eldon made orders for an allowance to the father for past maintenance, expressing his approbation of the change in the rule which permitted such allowance.

The later rule, however, was disapproved by the Master of the Rolls in Re parte Bond, 2 Myl. & K. 440, 4 L. J. Ch. N. S. 84, where the court said: "To allow for past maintenance, and to treat as a debt the expenditure which the law imposed upon the father as a duty, would be to go against the settled rule of the court."

Where the question was what allowance should be made to a mother for past maintenance, an inquiry was directed to ascertain as nearly as possible what had been the actual cost to her for maintenance, and an allowance for the past based on the amount of the child's fortune was refused, although it was held that, as to the future, such an allowance would be proper. Bruin v. Knott, 9 Jur. 979, 1 Phill. Ch. 572, 14 L. J. Ch. N. S. 440.

The fact that the father had lived out of the country, and could not make earlier application for an order for maintenance, was held to be a special circumstance permitting an allowance for past maintenance, it appearing that the father had incurred a large debt for that purpose. Carmichael v. Hughes, 6 Eng. L. & Eq. 71.

Where the father was unable to support his child, and had as her guardian received the rents of her property, and had maintained her and spent a considerable sum for her benefit, it was held that he was entitled to retain the rents by way of allowance for his expenditures for maintenance, etc. Wright v. Vanderplank, 8 DeG. M. & G. 133.

A mother maintained her infant son without making manifest any intention to seek repayment. Six years after attaining his majority the son died. The mother's claim as a creditor of the son's estate was rejected. The court said: "When a mother maintains an infant child, although not under any legal liability to do so, she may be considered to do it under one of three views: First, with the intention of afterwards claiming the amount as a debt due to her; secondly, as an act of maternal duty, or of kindness, or as bounty,—that is, as a gift; or thirdly, she may do it on an intermediate footing, that is to say, in the expectation or the hope of being recouped by means of an come applied to the maintenance of his children; but that, if the trust property is the subject of a marriage settlement, and therefore the creation of the trust is a matter of contract, then, if the language of the settlement is so framed as to express a trust to apply the income or any part of the income in maintaining the children, although the quantum of income to be so applied is left to the discretion of the trustees, the father is entitled to have whatever is proper and necessary for the maintenance of his children applied for that purpose, without reference to his ability to maintain them; but, if the language of the settlement expresses merely a power so to apply the income, or any part thereof, to the maintenance of the children, then the father is not so entitled."

order for maintenance out of some fund under the jurisdiction of the court, and which it would allow to be so applied, although such expenditure had not been previously sanctioned by the court. But if a mother, or any other person, confers a gift, intending it as a gift at the time, she cannot afterwards, under a changed state of circumstances, assert that it was a loan." Re Cottrell, L. R. 12 Eq. 566, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 70, 25 L. T. N. S. 405, 19 Week. Rep. 1076.

Where a father was of insufficient ability an allowance was made to him for past maintenance to the extent of the payment of a debt incurred by him for the benefit of the child. Re Hodges, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 754, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 335, 26 Week. Rep. 390.

The guardian of a ward may, without leave of the court, pay to the ward's widowed mother a reasonable amount to reimburse her for the ward's support, theretofore furnished by her, subject upon his accounting to proof that the allowance was reasonable. Melaney v. O'Driscoll, 164 Mass. 422, 41 N. E. 654.

In Wilkes v. Rogers, 6 Johns. 566, there was an allowance to the mother for past maintenance.

Where an allowance for past support is asked for, the court will make only such as would have been granted if asked for in advance. A subsequent increase in the ward's fortune will not justify an allowance for the past greater than actual expenditure. Ailing v. Ailing, 52 N. J. Eq. 92, 27 Atl. 655.

Where application is made for past maintenance the court will consider whether it would have been allowed if application had been made in advance. Norris v. Fisher, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 411.

On his accounting a father was allowed payments from his child's estate for her maintenance and education on his evidence that he would not have been able of his own means to give his daughter the advantages that she thus received. Holtzman v. Castleman, 2 MacArth. 555.

A guardian on the settlement of his accounts was allowed for payments to a ward's father for board, on proof of the father's indigent circumstances, and of a demand made by him. Beasley v. Watson, 41 Ala. 234.

In Baines v. Barnes, 64 Ala. 375, the court said that it was unwilling to extend the principle laid down in Beasley v. Watson.

Allowance will be made for past, as well as future, maintenance. State use of Smith v. Martin, 18 Mo. App. 468; Otte v. Becton, 55 Mo. 99.

tator gave one third of his residuary estate to his wife, and the other two thirds to trustees in trust for his children at twenty-one, and directed that, until the shares of his children should be payable to them, the income thereof should be paid to his wife, to be by her applied, or, in case of her death, to be applied by the trustees for the maintenance of the children. It was held "that the wife was entitled to the income of the children's share during their minorities, she maintaining them in a proper manner."

In Browne v. Paull, 1 Sim. N. S. 92, the testator gave all his property to trustees in trust to pay an annuity to his wife, and, subject to that payment, to convey, assign, or transfer all his property unto and equally between his children when and as they severally attained twenty-one, and in the meantime to pay to his wife, or otherwise apply,

Where the guardian of infants loaned money to their mother, which she promised to repay out of her charges for the support of the infants, and she afterward refused to make such charges, the guardian may not have an allowance therefor on the settlement of his accounts. Wyckoff v. Hulise, 32 N. J. Eq. 697.

Where a father, who was guardian of his children, made no charge during his life for their maintenance, it furnishes the strongest proof that he was able to support them, and no charge therefor in favor of his estate will be allowed after his death. Evans v. Pearce, 15 Gratt. 513, 78 Am. Dec. 635.

Where there is no evidence that a mother intended to make a charge for the support of her daughter and ward, her administrator will not be allowed to set up a claim for it. Guilon v. Guilon, 16 Mo. 48, 57 Am. Dec. 223.

An allowance will be made to a mother for all reasonable payments for the past maintenance and education of her children from the time of the death of the father, even if the mother has a separate estate. Re Belsel, 110 Cal. 267, 40 Pac. 961, 42 Pac. 819.

Where a guardian paid income to the mother, and she spent the money for herself, but supported the child out of her own funds, in an accounting of the infant's guardian he is not entitled to credit for support of the ward furnished by the mother, she having furnished it gratuitously and never having made any claim therefor. Taylor v. Hill, 86 Wis. 99, 56 N. W. 738.

But in Pierce v. Pierce, 64 Wis. 73, 54 Am. Rep. 581, 24 N. W. 498, where a mother had supported her infant child, who, a short time before its death, had received real estate, the mother was permitted to enforce against the real estate her claim for support of the child. The court says: "The fact that the mother for a considerable part of the time supported the child when it had no estate, and she could not have had any expectation of an allowance therefor, can make no difference in equity, as her right to any allowance in such a case does not depend upon contract, either expressed or implied, or an implied assumpsit."

3. Income and principal.

Where the welfare of the child requires it, and especially where the legacy is a small one, the court will permit an encroachment upon the principal.

Where the legacy to a child was only £100 the Lord Keeper allowed an encroachment upon the principal for expenses of education. Barlow v. Grant (1684) 1 Vern. 235.

the rents and proceeds of their respective shares for or towards their respective maintenance, education, and advancement. It was held that "where, during the minority of a child, the interest of such child's legacy is directed to be paid to the parent, to be applied for or towards its maintenance, there the direction as to the application is a mere charge for the benefit of the child on what is substantially a gift to the parent subject to such charge."

These cases are not cited because of their similarity to the case under consideration, but as showing that the rule which requires a father to support his child is one which has been in later years greatly relaxed, and which depends in its application upon the circumstances of the particular case. As was said by Judge Robertson in Evans v. Pearce, 15 Gratt. 515, 78 Am. Dec. 635:

The same was done, without a reference, in the case of a legacy of $298. Ex parte Green, 1 Jac. & W. 253.

The earlier English cases were much more strict in requiring authority from the court in advance to break in upon the principal. In Walker v. Wetherell, 6 Ves. Jr. 473, the Master of the Rolls said: "My impression is that the rule has been never to permit trustees of their own authority to break in upon the capital. I am not aware that the court has ever sanctioned that conduct in a trustee. It very rarely has occurred that the court itself has broke in upon the capital for the mere purpose of maintenance, though frequently for the purpose of putting the child out in life; but as to mere maintenance I doubt it, even upon a petition presented. It is a great misfortune if the capital is so small as not to leave a comfortable maintenance and education, but what can the court do?"

The principal may be impaired where necessity is shown. This was a case where the mother had the use of the income, the principal to go to her children on her death, and she was unable to support the children. Re Bostwick, 4 Johns. Ch. 100.

The court may direct application of the principal of a legacy on need shown. Re Muller, 29 Hun, 418.

Where a legacy is given to a child, which vests at once, but is payable at a future time, and the father is unable to support the child, and the income from the legacy is insufficient, the court may authorize application of the principal. The court says: "The source of the power is easy to trace. It is found in the fact that the infant is the absolute owner of the property, no other person having either a present or prospective legal interest in it; and that, if the present enjoyment of the property is withheld, the infant must suffer, possibly for the advantage of some person who has no interest in the infant and was never thought of by the testator as a possible recipient of his bounty." Stephens v. Howard, 32 N. J. Eq. 244.

"A guardian will not be permitted to expend upon the maintenance and education of his ward more than the income of the estate, without the sanction of the court." Villard v. Robert, 2 Strobb. Eq. 40, 49 Am. Dec. 654.

The breaking in upon the capital without a previous order of the court is at the guardian's peril. Osborne v. VanHorn, 2 Fla. 360.

A guardian may maintain a bill for reimbursement from the sale of his ward's lands, for payments made by him for maintenance and

"The court, however, will look with liberality to the circumstances of each particular case, and to the respective estates of father and children, and will authorize the income arising from the estates of infants to be applied to their support whenever, under all the circumstances, it appears to be proper."

In Griffith v. Bird, 22 Gratt. 73, the court held that where a father, who was the guardian of two of his children, maintained and educated them at his own expense, and made no charge against them, and died in February, 1861, up to which time his estate was ample to pay his debts, but became insufficient to do so by losses incurred thereafter, that between the father and his creditors his child would not be charged in the guardianship account with the cost of their maintenance and education.

education, where the father was poor, and the principal and income of the personal estate insufficient. Bellamy v. Thornton, 103 Ala. 404, 15 So. 831.

In Mississippi the statute is peremptory that a guardian shall not exceed income except by order of the court, and this has been construed to mean a precedent order. Boyd v. Hawkins, 60 Miss. 277.

In Bybee v. Tharp, 4 B. Mon. 313, 320, the court says: "The law will not allow the guardian, but at his own peril, to expend upon the ward more than the income of his or her estate, allowing him, however, to look to future years for remuneration as to any casual excess."

Except under stress of special necessity, a guardian has no power to break into the principal without the authority of the court. Beeler v. Dunn, 3 Head, 87, 75 Am. Dec. 761; Hobbs v. Harlan, 10 Lea, 268, 43 Am. Rep. 309; Hart v. Czapski, 11 Lea, 151.

IV. Rights of creditors.

In Re Kerrison's Trusts, L. R. 12 Eq. 422, the facts in which are referred to under III. b, 1, supra, a case of post-nuptial settlement where the father himself maintained the children for nine years and subsequently became bankrupt, it was held that his assignee in bankruptcy was not entitled to receive any portion of the accumulations of the income that might have been applied. The Vice Chancellor says: "Here a man of large means desires to set apart a fund which may be applied for the benefit of his family. He therefore places it in the hands of trustees, and directs them to apply such part as they shall think fit for the maintenance of his children. Then from the time of making the settlement for a period of nine years there is no application by him for any portion of the income. He might have required it to be paid, but he preferred to let it accumulate, and I must conclude that he only intended to apply for a contribution towards the maintenance of his children in case of some unforeseen necessity, and that the original £15,000, and all such accumulations as he did not require, were meant to be treated as the settlement fund. He intended to have the fund ready to be applied if he required it, but if not, that it should accumulate for the benefit of his wife and children. It is clear that he did not intend to benefit himself, or he would have given himself a life interest."

In Beardsley v. Hotchkiss, 96 N. Y. 201, a mother had devised and bequeathed property

The financial condition of James Hancock at his father's death does not appear. The trust property vested in him as trustee under the fifth clause of his father's will for the support of his wife and children passed at once under his control. He collected the rents, commingled them with his own funds, rendered no account, and in January, 1895, claims that he was indebted to that fund in the sum of $5,765.85, which, if true, proves that he had during that period appropriated that much of the rents derived from the trust property to his own use, in violation of the terms of the trust which had been reposed in him. Is that true? Had there been during that period any diversion by the trustee of the trust fund confided to his care? The house valued at $14,000 was devised to him by his father as trustee for his wife and children, to be held, not subject to his own debts or liabilities, but in trust for the support and maintenance of his present or any future wife that he may take, and his children, the said trust to continue during the life of James Hancock; and if, at his death, he shall leave a wife surviving him, until her death. Upon the death of James Hancock and wife, the trust ceased, and the property vested in fee-simple absolute in all of his children in equal shares. His claim now is that in 1895 he was indebted to the trust fund, because it was his duty to support his children; that he was of ability to do so; and that he was guilty of a breach of trust in appropriating the trust property in part discharge of the duty which the law had imposed upon him. If the will of A. G. Hancock had merely conferred a power upon the son, as trustee, so to apply the rents and profits of the trust property, it would be a most dangerous precedent, in our opinion, to allow him, after he had exercised that power, and appropriated the rents of the trust property to the maintenance and support of his wife and children, to recall the exercise of the discretion with which he had been invested, and permit him to reconstruct the past as between himself and the trust fund and his beneficiaries, and after a lapse of eight years to constitute himself a debtor to the fund to her children and to the survivors, if any should die before arriving at the age of twenty-one years. The will contained the clause: "And I hereby commit the guardianship of all my children until they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years unto the said Lemon B. Hotchkiss, my said husband, and give him the power to use, occupy, and control as such guardian, for the use and benefit of my said children, all my real and personal estate devised and bequeathed to my children as aforesaid." After her death the husband, as executor, took possession of the property, occupied portions of the real estate himself at times, rented portions of it to other persons, used the personal property and the avails of the real estate in his own business, and in all respects managed and controlled the property at his discretion. He afterward made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors in which he preferred his three children for the amounts justly due them on account of moneys and property of his wife, their mother, which he had received, as such amounts should be found upon a settlement. Other creditors postponed to the children claimed that the court should have made to Mr. Hotchkiss in diminution of his liability to his children a reasonable allowance for their maintenance, education, and support during their minority. The court says: "He was of sufficient ability to support his children, and did support them from his own means, making no charge against them, and he now makes no charge; but his creditors seek to make it for him. A father is under a natural obligation to support his minor children, and, generally, if of sufficient ability, he is obliged to, without reference to their pecuniary circumstances. There is no doubt of the power of an equity court to make to a father a reasonable allowance for the past and future support of his minor children, out of their property, in his hands, or in the hands of their trustees. But such allowance is not made as matter of course. It depends upon the circumstances of each case, and the interests of the children alone are considered. When the father is of sufficient ability to support his minor children, the circumstances would have to be very peculiar which would authorize or require the court to make the allowance. . . . 57 L. R. A.

If the children were still minors, and the father was of insufficient means, and had become in debt or insolvent, by his efforts to support and educate his children, then there would have been a case, upon his petition, for a reasonable allowance to him out of their property, for both past and future support, that he might continue to furnish them a suitable home. But in such a case no court would make the allowance in order that the husband's creditors might sweep it away in such manner that the infants would in no way be benefited thereby. Here the infants have become of age, and the allowance would neither benefit them, nor their father. In such a case, we cannot say that the court below erred in refusing the allowance."

Where a father, as guardian in socage, had assumed to surrender a life insurance policy owned by his infant children, and the court held that he had no authority so to do, in an action by the beneficiaries to have the policy restored, the insurance company claimed the right to deduct therefrom the money paid to the father, or so much as the father had used for the benefit of the children. This relief was denied. The court says: "There was no proof that Foley was not perfectly able to respond to the defendant for the amount of money received by him from it upon the surrender of the policy. He was bound to support his own children out of his own means, and it does not appear that he was not abundantly able to do so; and if he took this money and used it for the support of his children, instead of using his own means for that purpose, the children did not become responsible for the money so used." Foley v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 138 N. Y. 333, 344, 20 L. R. A. 620, 34 N. E. 211.

In Griffith v. Bird, 22 Gratt. 73, it appeared that a father, who was guardian of his children and able to support them, had supported them and made no charge against them during his lifetime. After his death a general creditor of the father sought, through a court of equity, to charge the property of the children with their support. The relief was denied by the court.

Where a father, guardian of his children, has given a deed of trust for the benefit of credwhich had been confided to his control. If, we repeat, the will had clothed him with the exercise of a mere power, and that power had been exercised in accordance with its terms, the court would be slow to reopen the transaction and restate the account, for to do so would be to multiply opportunities for fraud and imposition upon innocent creditors. But in the case before us the trustee was not clothed with a mere discretionary power. He received the property impressed with a trust for the support of his wife and children. Its income seems to have been applied during all these years in strict conformity with his duty as prescribed by his father's will, and where is the wrong and injustice of which his beneficiaries can now be heard to complain?

This house and lot which is the subject of the trust was, at the date of the testator's death, rented for the sum of $900 a year. By reason of the improvements which have been placed upon it under the circumstances which have been detailed, a contract for its rental was entered into before its erection at the sum of $1,750 per year. Its yearly value had been increased more than 90 per cent.

The conduct of the trustee in this case was well calculated to beguile and mislead those who dealt with him. Had he settled his accounts, and charged himself with the accumulation of rents from the trust property, all who extended credit to him would have done so with their eyes open; but there was nothing to disclose the true condition of his affairs, and much to lull them into a false security. He not only stated no account, but, for all that appears, he kept none. He commingled what he received from the trust with his own money, and drew upon it as a common fund.

A trustee cannot, of course, by such conduct, prejudice the trust; but the question here is whether he shall defeat his creditors, not for the protection of the trust from loss, but its augmentation by the process of capitalizing the rents derived from it. Equity enjoins upon us the duty of being just before we are generous. As we have seen, if the trustees have a discretion as to itors, the trustee may not, in a settlement of the guardian's accounts, charge the children with the amount expended for their education, the father having been of sufficient ability to provide for such education. Walker v. Crowder, 37 N. C. (2 Ed. Eq.) 478.

Where land was conveyed to a father as trustee for his children "for the sole support, use, benefit, and behoof" of the children, with power to the trustee "to use the rents, issues, and profits in educating and supporting said children," it was held that this was not a gift of the rents, etc., to the father in consideration of such support, but merely a grant of power, and that neither the trustee nor his creditors or grantees had any beneficial interest therein. Neal v. Bleckley, 51 S. C. 506, 29 S. E. 249.

Where a parent held the property under a will of a grandparent of the children, it having been given to the parent to be used for the support of the children, the creditors of the parent cannot obtain a lien thereon. Spicer v. Spicer, 21 Ga. 200.

Where a widowed mother maintains her children without making a charge against them her creditors cannot compel the amount of her expenditures to be charged against their estate to the exoneration of her property. Hanford v. Prouty, 133 Ill. 339, 24 N. E. 565.

V. Summary.

The father, and in some jurisdictions the mother, is under obligation to support the child whether the child has a separate property or not. The court, however, may authorize or sanction the use of the child's separate estate for the support or education of the child where the parent is unable from his own means to provide for such support or education in conformity with the child's estate and position in life, or where it appears that the instrument creating the child's estate was intended, either to provide for the child's support without regard to the parent's ability, or to vest the property in the parent in aid of, or to provide him means for, the support of the child, irrespective of the parent's income derived from other sources. The earlier distinction between contract and bounty has come to be regarded as of less importance as a guide to construction, and it is now looked upon as a question of 57 L. R. A.

intention to be determined from the language of the instrument, whether marriage settlement, gift, or will. Where trustees have been vested with discretion as to the application of the trust fund to the support of the children, the court will, where the welfare of the children requires it, control the fund in opposition to the will of the trustees, but where the father is able to support the children, the court will not, on the father's application, interfere with the discretion of trustees. In its anxiety for the welfare of infants, the court will, if possible, spell out from the terms of the instrument creating the trust an intention that the infants shall profit thereby, and, where the father is unable to support them, will authorize the use of income for that purpose when there is no express direction therefor, and even, in some cases, where there is a direction to accumulate income. Where infant legatees comprise a class, all or some of whom must absolutely take the fund, all having a common interest and an equal chance of survivorship, the income may be applied to the support of the infants if the father is of insufficient ability; but, except as the rule has been modified by statute in certain jurisdictions, this cannot be done where there is a gift over, or the children are not all the persons among whom the fund is eventually to be distributed. The extent of the allowance by the court from the infant's funds will be measured by the welfare of the infant. A trustee who makes an allowance without a previous order of the court will do so at his peril; but the courts are liberal in giving subsequent sanction to that which would have merited previous authority. What is intended as a gratuity cannot afterward be changed into a debt. Where the infant is the absolute owner of the fund, the court may authorize breaking into the principal for support if need be. Creditors of a parent must stand in his shoes. Where a parent has supported children from his own income his creditors cannot require repayment for their benefit from the children's estate; nor where the parent was authorized to use the income from the children's estate for their support and has so used it, will he be permitted to reverse the situation and return an equivalent to the trust fund to the detriment of his creditors.

the application of the fund to the support of the children, the court will not, at the father's instance, compel them to exercise it, he being of ability. Nor will the court interfere with their discretion if they see fit to exercise it. 2 Perry, Tr. § 612. So, by parity of reasoning, where the trustee has exercised the discretion and supported the children, the father will not be permitted to restore to the trust fund what had been rightfully appropriated in order that he may augment the trust fund and evade the payment of his honest debts, for that would be to make the rights of men depend, not upon law, but the whim, the caprice, the preference, or the interest of the individual.

If the will is to be construed as not clothing the trustee with a mere discretion, but as creating an express trust for the support of the wife and children,—which we think is the true construction,—then the case is still stronger for appellant, for then it must be so applied irrespective of their father's ability to support and educate them. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. supra. Either view is conclusive of the case, for, if such be the law where there is a discretionary power or an express trust in cases in which the father is not the trustee, the union of the two relations in one person can have no influence upon the result.

The case of Norris v. Jones, 93 Va. 176, 24 S. E. 911, seems to be relied upon by appellees. An insolvent son had made a gift to his mother, and a creditor, whose debt arose prior to the gift, brought a suit to hold the mother liable for its payment, and subject it to the payment of his debt; but it appearing that prior to the institution of the suit the mother lent the son an amount larger than the gift, that there was no actual fraud, and that the mother had no knowledge of the insolvency of the son, the court held that there was no liability upon her. It could not have been otherwise. There was no actual fraud. There had been a restoration to the son's estate by the mother of what she had received. The ability of the son to meet his obligations had not been diminished, and the creditor in no respect prejudiced by the transaction.

We are of opinion that to sanction what was done in this case would be to permit a trustee to change his course of conduct in the light of subsequent events and of his altered financial condition, and to permit him to simulate a debt to the estate under his control in order that it might be augmented for the benefit of his wife and children at the expense of existing creditors.

The decree of the Circuit Court must be reversed.

J. W. GORDON, Plff. in Err.,
v.
COMMONWEALTH of Virginia.

(.....Va.....)

1. Although a check is so irregular in form that the bank would be justified in refusing payment of it, yet it may be the subject of forgery as to its effect as a receipt, after it has passed through the hands of several indorsers, and has been paid by the bank and returned to the hands of the drawer.
2. To add to a canceled check the words, "in full of account to date," with intent to alter its effect as a receipt, constitutes forgery.
3. The averment of extrinsic circumstances to give efficiency to an instrument so as to make it the subject of forgery is not necessary in an indictment for that offense, where it is sufficient to enable the court to perceive judicially that it might be made the vehicle of fraud and prejudice as charged.
4. That one who forges a receipt in full on a payment on account has in fact paid his indebtedness in full, will not prevent his liability to indictment for the forgery.
5. The addition to a check of the words, "in full of account to date," may constitute a forgery if made at any time after the check is delivered to the payee.
6. A verdict cannot be impeached by the affidavit of a juror that he was induced to assent to a verdict of guilty on the understanding that the jury would recommend the pardon of accused.

(June 12, 1902.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Augusta County to review a judgment convicting defendant of forgery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Curry, J. J. L. Bumgardner, R. Bumgardner, and Hulst Glenn, for plaintiff in error:

The indictment in this case is found under § 3737 of the Code of Virginia, and that statute expressly provides that the paper purporting to be forged must be to the prejudice of another's right.

Terry v. Com. 87 Va. 673, 13 S. E. 104.

If, at the date of the check, petitioner owed Hughes only $10, and Hughes took the check and got the money on it, and, after the check had been returned to petitioner, petitioner wrote on the check, "in full of account to date," that, then, would not be capable of prejudicing the rights of Hughes or of anybody else.

NOTE.—As to what may be the subject of forgery, see also note to People v. Munroe (Cal.) 24 L. R. A. 33; also, in this series, State v. Evans (Mont.) 28 L. R. A. 127; Thomas v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 46 L. R. A. 454; and White v. Wagar (Ill.) 50 L. R. A. 61.

As to forgery by making or altering mere memorandum, see note to State v. Hendry (Ind.) 54 L. R. A. 794.

The bank is directed to do an impossible thing,—to pay to a nonexistent, impossible, and unascertainable thing. There is no payee mentioned, and no certain sum of money is directed to be paid.

2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1566; Oarberry v. State, 11 Ohio St. 410.

It is an indispensable element of the crime of forgery that the forged paper be such as, if genuine, would injure another, and it must appear from the indictment that it is legally of such a character.

A writing affirmatively invalid on its face cannot be the subject of forgery, because it has no legal tendency to effect a fraud.

An instrument which is void, or without legal efficacy on the face of it, or which is not shown, by proper averments of extrinsic facts, to be capable of affecting the rights of another, cannot be the subject of forgery.

The paper in the indictment is a mere nullity for any purpose, and it cannot be made good by any possible averments; but if it is not a mere nullity, it is certainly not a vehicle conveying any meaning, and to give it meaning it would certainly be necessary in the indictment to explain the meaning of the words in the check by innuendoes, or by the averment of extrinsic facts, and this is not done; and it is confidently believed that the indictment cannot be sustained.

The fact that the order was accepted in no way gave the instrument validity. The defect of the paper in this case is "open and palpable," so that no one could be deceived by it without the grossest neglect.

Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 478.

If the check was in full payment of all that Gordon owed Hughes, then it would be impossible for Hughes to be prejudiced in his rights, or injured in any way, shape, or form.

Wharton, Crim. Law, § 740; Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 546, ¶ 4.

Mr. William A. Anderson, Attorney General, for defendant in error:

There may be forgery of a writing which is of questionable validity, and which, if genuine, would not be effectual to its purpose, if the paper is such that it may be used to the prejudice of another's right.

Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 478; Perkins v. Com. 7 Gratt. 651, 56 Am. Dec. 123; Terry v. Com. 87 Va. 674, 13 S. E. 104; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 533.

Under the circumstances of this case, this check, thus falsely and fraudulently made a receipt in full of $10, was to the prejudice of the rights of Hughes, or might so operate; which is all that is required to constitute this element of its criminality.

Snell v. State, 2 Humph. 349; Williams v. State, 61 Ala. 39; 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, §§ 691, 692; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, 8th ed. § 546, cl. 5.

Whittle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the October term, 1901, of the county court of Augusta county, the grand jury returned an indictment against J. W. Gordon for forgery, under § 3737 of the Code.

There were two counts in the indictment. The first count charged that on July 6, 1901, J. W. Gordon, having in his possession a certain order for the payment of money, commonly called a "check," purporting to be the order or check of the said J. W. Gordon upon the Farmers' & Merchants'

Bank of Staunton, for the payment of $10, which was of the following purport and effect:

Staunton, Va., October 17, 1899.
Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Staunton:
Pay to the order of.....Ten.....
W. E. Hughes.....Dollars
$10.00

J. W. Gordon.

—Indorsed: "W. E. Hughes." "Pay to the order of Cashier, Nat'l Valley Bank. H. Hutchinson & Co." "Nat'l Valley Bank, Staunton, Va. Paid Oct. 31;" and with the following words on the face thereof: "Paid Oct. 31, 1899. Farmers' and Merchants' Bank, Staunton, Va.;" and with a 2-cent United States internal revenue stamp duly canceled thereto; and that the said J. W. Gordon, on the said 6th day of July, 1901, at the said county, feloniously did forge on the face of said order or check a writing in the following words, that is to say, "in full of account to date," with intention to defraud, and to the prejudice of the rights of others, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth of Virginia. The second count charged that J. W. Gordon uttered and attempted to employ as true the forged writing aforesaid, with intent to defraud.

There was a demurrer and motion to quash the indictment, both of which the court overruled, and thereupon the accused pleaded "not guilty." At the trial he was found guilty by the jury, and his term of imprisonment in the penitentiary was fixed at two years.

After the verdict of the jury was rendered, the prisoner moved the court to arrest the judgment, and also to set aside the verdict, as contrary to the law and the evidence, which motions were likewise overruled, and judgment was rendered in accordance with the verdict. During the progress of the trial a number of exceptions were taken by the accused to rulings of the court.

The case having been carried to the circuit court of Augusta county, and the judgment of the county court there affirmed, it was brought here upon a writ of error awarded by one of the judges of this court. The assignments of error will be considered in the order in which they were presented at bar.

The objection to the indictment raised by the demurrer and motions to quash and in arrest of judgment is that the instrument alleged to have been forged was invalid and meaningless, or, if in fact valid, that its validity depended upon extraneous circumstances to give it efficacy, which were necessary to be averred, and that, even if the words "in full of account to date" were written by the accused on the face of the paper after it had been paid and returned to him, it was not a forgery, in contemplation of the statute, because the words were written upon a void instrument, and could not, therefore, have operated to the prejudice of

The authorities sustain the principle invoked, but it is conceived that the case in judgment does not come within its influence. It must be conceded that, as a check, the paper in question was irregular,—possibly so irregular that the bank would have been justified in refusing payment. But the gravamen of the charge is not the forgery of the check, as such, but, with its indorsements, as a receipt. After it had been construed and treated by the parties as a valid check for $10, drawn by J. W. Gordon, payable to the order of W. E. Hughes, indorsed by Hughes in blank, indorsed by H. Hutchinson & Co. to the cashier of the Valley National Bank, indorsed and stamped "Paid" by the Valley National Bank, and stamped on its face "Paid" by the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, upon which it was drawn, and had been delivered to the drawer, J. W. Gordon (and this is the legal import of the paper, with its indorsements, etc., as set out in the indictment), however irregular it may have been in its inception, according to business usage and custom and common understanding, it constituted a valid voucher from Hughes to Gordon for $10, which the former, by his indorsement and conduct, was estopped to deny. That being the legal import of the paper with its indorsements, the addition of the words "in full of account to date," alleged to have been fraudulently written upon the face of it by the accused after the paper came to his possession, had the effect of converting a genuine receipt from Hughes to the accused for $10 into a spurious receipt "in full of account to date," and necessarily injured to the prejudice of Hughes's rights. The writing, with the indorsements set out in the indictment, was sufficient to enable the court to perceive judicially that it might be made the vehicle of fraud and prejudice, as charged, and hence the averment of extrinsic circumstances was unnecessary. Henry v. State, 35 Ohio St. 128; Snell v. State, 2 Humph. 347; Rea v. Martin, 7 Car. & P. 549.

Forgery at common law is defined by Blackstone as the fraudulent making or altering of a writing to the prejudice of another's rights. 4 Bl. Com. 247. And that definition is substantially embodied in § 3737 of the Code.

Bishop's definition, which has been adopted by this court in the case of Terry v. Com. 87 Va. 673, 13 S. E. 104, is: "Forgery is the fraudulent making of a false writing, which, if genuine, would be apparently of legal efficacy." Bishop, Crim. Law, 3d ed. § 95.

The doctrine may be stated generally that an instrument is one of legal efficacy, within the rules relating to forgery, where by any possibility it may operate to the injury of another. People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509; Williams v. State, 61 Ala. 33; Com. v. Linton, 2 Va. Cas. 476; People v. Munroe, 100 Cal. 664, 24 L. R. A. 33, 35 Pac.

In Rollins v. State, 22 Tex. App. 548, 58 Am. Rep. 659, 3 S. W. 759, it was held that the following writing was the subject of forgery: "Apolas, Halsal, Please let Mr. G. B. Rowlands, have 4 $ 00 d. in goods and oblige. Charge to me, Jack E. 3 ler." This was held to be an order on Apolas & Halsal for $4 in goods, and that extrinsic proof was admissible to show whose signature it was.

So, in Hobbs v. State, 75 Ala. 1, a writing: "Please send me word how long you will give Stephen to pay for the bed, and if you will allow him time enough to pay for it let him have a cheap bureau, as cheap as possible, and I will see that you will get so, and oblige, much a week. J. W. Hall, Huntsville. Just write it off the whole thing and send it to me,"—was held to be an instrument of apparent legal efficacy, and not so obscure as to be unintelligible without reference to extrinsic facts, and therefore a subject of forgery.

In Hendricks v. State, 26 Tex. App. 176, 9 S. W. 555, 557, it was held that a written communication as follows: "Mr. Gladstone, please let Bare Have the sume of $5. in Grosses, and charge the same to Dr. F. T. Cook,"—was an order for merchandise or goods or property of some kind, and was the subject of forgery; no averment of extrinsic facts being necessary to show that such was its character.

And it has been held that a bank note in which a blank is left in the body of the note, where the number of dollars should appear,—the denomination appearing elsewhere in the bill,—is a note of that denomination, and may be a subject of forgery. State v. Dourden, 13 N. C. (2 Dev. L.) 445. And so, also, though the word "pounds" is omitted in the body of the note, when the amount of the note, with the sign "£" is placed in the margin. Res v. Elliott, 2 East, P. C. 951, 1 Leach, C. L. 175.

It is immaterial, therefore, whether the paper in question was or was not a valid negotiable instrument. It is only necessary, according to the foregoing definitions and authorities, that it was a writing of such apparent legal efficacy that the forgery of it might have been used to the prejudice of another's rights. That, with the indorsement upon it at the time of the alleged fraudulent alteration, it was such a writing, there can be no question.

It follows from these views that there was no error in the action of the trial court in overruling the demurrer to the indictment, and the motions to quash and in arrest of judgment.

At the trial, over the objection of the prisoner, the court gave the following instruction to the jury:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the accused altered the check after it had been paid in the bank, with intent to defraud, or that the accused altered said check after it had been paid in bank, and, after said alteration, uttered or attempted to employ as a true receipt said altered check, then they must find the accused guilty; and this is true whether at the date of said check the accused actually owed the payee of said check, W. E. Hughes, or not."

The objection to this instruction is based on the theory that, if at the time of the alteration of the check the accused was not indebted to Hughes, the alteration could not have been to the prejudice of his rights, and was therefore not a forgery, in contemplation of the statute. It is believed that this contention is not sustained either by reason or authority. It would be, indeed, a dangerous doctrine to make the guilt or innocence of a person, who undertakes to manufacture defensive evidence in his own behalf, dependent upon the ultimate result of a settlement of accounts between the parties, rather than upon his fraudulent and wrongful conduct in fabricating false and forged evidence to sustain his side of the controversy. Let the result be what it may, Hughes had a right to have the litigation pending between himself and the accused decided according to the law and the evidence; and the fraudulent conversion of a check for $10, drawn by Gordon in his favor, into a receipt in full, necessarily deprived him of that right, and operated to his prejudice,—at least, in that it increased the burden of proof which rested upon him.

The essence of the crime in this case consisted in the false making or alteration of the receipt in question, with fraudulent intent, and to the prejudice of another's rights. The false making of the receipt by the accused, to maintain his contention with Hughes, fulfilled all these conditions; and the crime was complete, irrespective of the standing of accounts, or merits of the controversy between the parties. It was not essential that the accused should be indebted to Hughes, or that Hughes was defrauded by his act, or that the accused reaped the fruits of his crime. His status was not affected by the justness or unjustness of Hughes's demand, or whether the receipt was or was not allowed. It is not permissible for one to forge an acquittance to defeat even an unjust demand. The accused had no right to manufacture evidence, and, if he had no such right, his conduct in doing so was prejudicial to the person against whom the testimony was fabricated. Hughes may have been honest in the belief that Gordon was indebted to him, and yet mistaken. He had a right to submit his claim to the arbitrament of the courts, and, when the accused undertook to defeat the result by false evidence, he was guilty of a crime which operated to the prejudice of Hughes.

A gave his clerk, B, a blank check, and directed him to fill it up with an amount of a bill and expenses (for which A had to provide, and which amount B was to ascertain), and get the check cashed, and pay the amount to W, and take up the bill. The bill was for £156 9s. 9d. The expenses were about 10s. B filled up the check with the sum of £250, had it cashed, and kept the whole amount, alleging that it was due to him for salary. It was held that B was guilty of forgery, and that this was so even if B bona fide believed that the £250 were due him from A, or even if it were really due to him. Reg. v. Wilson, 2 Car. & K. 527.

"In an indictment for forging a receipt, it is not necessary that it should be averred that the person charged with the offense is indebted to the individual against whom the receipt is forged, in order to show that the latter stands in a situation to be defrauded by the former." Wharton, Crim. Law, 4th and Revised ed. § 1482; Snell v. State, 2 Humph. 349; Com. v. Ladd, 15 Mass. 526; Williams v. State, 61 Ala. 39; 1 Wharton, Crim. Law, §§ 691, 692; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, 8th ed. § 546, cl. 5; Flower v. Shaw, 2 Car. & K. 703; Claiborne v. State, 51 Ark. 88, 9 S. W. 851; State v. Kimball, 50 Me. 409; Bush v. State, 77 Ala. 83.

The court also gave five instructions, at the instance of the accused, which liberally and fairly expounded the law as to the presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, and the quantum of evidence necessary to warrant a conviction.

The accused asked for eight other instructions, all of which were refused. The first of these instructions was to the effect that the presumption of the innocence of the accused should be considered as evidence in his favor. In a certain sense, presumptions are evidence, and text writers so declare of presumptions of innocence. 1 Greenl. Ev. Lewis's ed. § 34. But the accused was only interested in having the jury informed of the existence and effect of the presumption, and his rights in that respect were amply guarded by the instructions given.

Instructions 2, 4, 5, and 8, in the order in which they were presented, in one form or another, embody the theory that, unless the accused owed Hughes at the date of the alteration of the check, he was not guilty of the forgery charged. But that, as has been remarked in connection with the instruction given at the instance of the commonwealth, is not the criterion of the guilt or innocence of the accused.

The third instruction told the jury that it devolved on the commonwealth to show, beyond a reasonable doubt: First, that the check was altered by the accused after it had been paid and delivered to him; second, that the alteration was made by the accused with intent to defraud; and, third, that the alleged alteration of the check was or may have been to the prejudice or injury of the rights of the prosecutor or someone else. Conceding the soundness of the second and third propositions, the first condemns the instruction. The accused might have been guilty of forgery although the check had never been paid or delivered to him. Indeed, if the entire writing—check, indorsements, stamps, and alleged forged words—had been all made by the accused, and had never passed out of his possession, the offense might still have been consummated. But in any event the time fixed for the alteration should have been after the check was delivered to Hughes, rather than after it had been paid and delivered to the accused.

The remaining instructions, 6 and 7, are liable to the same objections as the third. With respect to the instructions generally, it may be affirmed that those given by the court clearly and correctly expound the law applicable to the case made by the evidence, and that those refused were properly rejected, for the reasons set forth in connection with them, respectively.

Nor was there any error in the ruling of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict for the alleged misconduct of the jury. That motion was based upon the affidavit of a member of the jury to the effect that affiant and another juror were induced to consent to a verdict of guilty with the understanding that the jury would recommend the pardon of the accused. It is sufficient to say of this assignment that public policy forbids that the precincts of the jury room should be invaded and verdicts impeached in that manner. Bull v. Com. 14 Gratt. 613; Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 469; Stepoe v. Flood, 31 Gratt. 323; Moses v. Cromwell, 78 Va. 671.

The remaining exception is to the action of the court in overruling the motion of the prisoner to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant him a new trial because the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence. The rigorous rules which by the provisions of the statute must be applied to the consideration of this motion are well understood. Acts 1889-90, p. 36. But if the limitations thereby imposed were less stringent, this court would not be warranted in setting aside the verdict. The evidence is voluminous, and a detailed discussion of it would serve no good purpose. The subject might be dismissed with the observation that the charge against the accused is sustained by the direct testimony of Hughes, supported by many of the circumstances of the case. This, coupled with the evidence of the bad character of the prisoner, and the fact that the theory of the defense is practically broken down and destroyed by the inconsistent and irreconcilable statements of the accused himself, demonstrates that the verdict of the jury was right. Upon the trial of a civil warrant between the parties, the accused testified that he met Hughes in front of Hoge & Hutchinson's store, in Staunton; that Hughes told him he was hard up and needed money badly, and asked him to pay his account; that thereupon, he wrote the check in question, which Hughes accepted and delivered to Hoge & Hutchinson. He was thoroughly committed to that view, and suggested none other in connection with the making of the check. On the trial of this prosecution an entirely different theory was propounded. His new version of the matter may be given in his own language. "Mr. Hughes came up there, and I was not at home. He came back the second time, and he saw a man by the name of Hunter working in the mill at the end of the orchard, and he told him he wanted me to send him some money; that he needed it very badly. Mr. Hunter told me that Mr. Hughes said I owed him $10. That night I fixed up the check, and intended to send it by Mr. Hunter, but he was going to pack apples early next morning, so soon I asked my wife to take it down. She was going along to bring the buckboard back. So the next morning I was out talking to them, just before they started, and I said, 'I will go back and make this a receipt in full, and if he does not accept it, bring it back to me.' That he sent the check by his wife, and she delivered it to Hughes. In this manner, he undertook to account for the alleged difference in appearance of the ink with which the words "in full of account to date" were written and the other writing on the check. Some of the witnesses testified that the ink in the "in full of account to date" looked fresher, and was of a different shade. A lapse of memory could not have accounted for the discrepancy between these clearly defined and detailed statements. Upon the trial of the civil warrant, accused did not pretend that the transaction had faded from his memory, but, on the contrary, declared that he remembered the time, place, and circumstances of giving the check, including the conversation between Hughes and himself which led up to it. His attempted explanation tends still further to show that he was not telling the truth. He pretended to have confounded the check in controversy with a check for $1.50, dated October 19, 1899, about which he says he had the conversation with Hughes, and delivered it to him in front of Hoge & Hutchinson's store. But when asked to explain why he gave Hughes that check, if, as he maintained, he had the day before settled with him in full with the $10 check, he replied that his wife might have bought other goods. It is not surprising that the jury refused to give credence to such an unreasonable story, emanating as it did from a discredited source.

There is no error in the judgment complained of, and it must be affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

J. M. GARDNER, Plff. in Err.,
v.

A. G. RHODES.

(114 Ga. 929.)

*A landlord is not liable for injury received by a person from falling on ice which had been allowed by the tenants to accumulate and remain on a sidewalk abutting the rented premises. This is true, though the ice resulted from water which had flowed from the landlord's property through a ditch placed there for the purpose of carrying off the refuse water across the sidewalk; the ice not being on the sidewalk when the tenants entered into possession, although the ditch was on the property at that time, and put there for the purpose above indicated.

Mr. Burton Smith for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Dorsey, Brewster, & Howell, for defendant in error:

A landlord who has leased premises to a tenant is not liable for a nuisance maintained upon the premises by the tenant during the lease.

The duty of a city to exercise reasonable care to keep its sidewalks in a safe condition does not extend to the removal of ice which constitutes no other defect than slipperiness, there being no such accumulation of ice as to constitute an obstruction to travel, and no ridges or inequalities of such height, or lying at such inclination or angle, as would be likely to trip passengers or cause them to fall.

Henkes v. Minneapolis, 42 Minn. 530, 44 N. W. 1026.

Where a city ordinance requires the citizens to keep their sidewalks free from ice, no action lies in favor of an individual against a citizen for an injury occasioned by his breach of that duty.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Gardner sued Rhodes for damages. At the trial a nonsuit was granted, and this is the error assigned in the bill of exceptions. The substance of the allegations of the petition is as follows: The defendant is the owner of certain real estate in the city of Atlanta, abutting on a sidewalk. On January 31, 1900, petitioner was injured by falling upon ice which had formed on the sidewalk in front of the defendant's property. The presence of this ice at this place was due to the following conditions: There is a ditch or drain located on the defendant's property, and running across the same to the sidewalk. This ditch had been there for many years, and was there when the defendant rented the property to certain washerwomen, who were in possession at the time the petitioner was injured. Near the head of the ditch there were two water-closets and two hydrants, from which hydrants the washerwomen draw water. They pour the refuse water upon the ground, and it runs into the ditch and across the sidewalk. The ditch was made to receive, and necessarily does receive, and for many years has received, the water from the running or overflow of the hydrants, and from the refuse water of the washerwomen, and from any defect, clogging, or overflow of the water-closets. The property of the defendant is higher than the sidewalk, and the water flowing into the ditch discharges across the sidewalk. On the day the plaintiff was injured, and for many days previous thereto, water discharged upon the sidewalk in the manner above indicated had become frozen. The ice so formed was uneven on its surface, rendering the sidewalk dangerous to pedestrians. On these facts, the plaintiff charges that the effect of making the ditch was to create a nuisance, by the continuous discharge of water across the sidewalk, and by the freezing of such water on the sidewalk, and also that the defendant negligently maintained the ditch, and negligently permitted water to run across the sidewalk, and negligently permitted ice to remain on the sidewalk. It is alleged that plaintiff was free from fault, and different items of damage are set out, which are alleged to have resulted from specified injuries. The petition further charged that the maintenance of the ditch, and the consequent overflow of water upon the sidewalk, was a violation of a city ordinance of Atlanta, which provided that "any person who shall throw or discharge from any lot or building any water or fluid substance so as to affect injuriously any street, lane, alley, way, or sidewalk in said city shall on conviction" be fined, etc. The defendant answered, admitting that he owned the property; that a ditch or drain as described in the petition was located on the property when the same was rented to certain tenants, who were in possession at the date of the plaintiff's alleged injury. The defendant also admitted the presence of the water-closets and hydrants at the head of the ditch, that the tenants pour refuse water upon the ground, that this water runs into the ditch and across the sidewalk, and that the ditch was made for the purpose of receiving this water. He denied that he had damaged the plaintiff; denied that the ditch, and the discharge of water therefrom onto the sidewalk, and its freezing thereon, constituted a nuisance; and denied that he had negligently maintained the ditch, and negligently permitted the water to flow therefrom onto the sidewalk and freeze. The above summary of the petition and answer shows that the only material questions about which the parties were at issue were as to whether the ditch, and the flow of water therefrom, and the formation of ice upon the sidewalk, constituted a nuisance, and whether, if so, the defendant could be chargeable with negligence for maintaining the same.

We think it can be conceded, for the purposes of this case, that the formation of the ice on the sidewalk, and the overflow of water from the ditch, and even the ditch itself, all taken together, amounted to a nuisance which was being maintained on the defendant's premises and the abutting sidewalk. This nuisance was, however, the result of the acts of the defendant's tenants, who were in exclusive possession of the premises; and under such circumstances the landlord cannot be held liable in damages for injuries resulting to a person from a nuisance maintained by a tenant. It will be noticed that the city ordinance set out in the plaintiff's petition does not purport to make a landlord liable for the maintenance of a nuisance on or abutting his property, and it seems to be clear that the ordinance refers only to those who actually originate and maintain the nuisance. So far as appears from the record, there is no ordinance of the city making it the duty of a landlord to remove from a sidewalk abutting his property an obstruction which has been placed there by the tenant. Nor is such a duty imposed by the law of the state. It is true that in this state the landlord is bound to keep the premises in repair (Civil Code, § 3123), and that a landlord will be liable under some circumstances to third persons for injuries resulting from his failure to repair (Id. § 3118). The section last cited also provides that "the landlord having fully parted with his possession and right of possession, is not responsible to third persons for damages resulting from the negligent or illegal use of the premises by the tenant." See also Ocean S. S. Co. v. Hamilton, 112 Ga. 901, 38 S. E. 204, and cases cited. The present petition, however, is based solely on the theory that the landlord is liable for injuries resulting from a nuisance. In the case of White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204 (2), the case of Vason v. Augusta, 38 Ga. 542, is cited for the proposition that a landlord is "not liable for a nuisance maintained upon the premises by the tenant during the lease." In the case last referred to it was held: "A landlord who has leased premises to a tenant is not liable for a nuisance maintained upon the premises by the tenant during the lease. If the nuisance existed upon the premises when the lease was made, the landlord is liable. But if the tenant continues the nuisance after he obtains exclusive possession and control, he alone is liable for its continuance." The nuisance which the plaintiff alleged was not the ditch, or the overflow alone, or the ditch and the overflow, but a combination of the ditch, the overflow, and the ice on the sidewalk. So far as appears from the evidence, the ditch itself was not a nuisance, nor was it a nuisance per se to allow water to flow across a sidewalk; but the nuisance consisted in the formation of ice on the sidewalk, making it dangerous for pedestrians to walk along the sidewalk at that point. There was no danger to pedestrians, nor, so far as appears, any inconvenience, resulting either from the ditch or the flowing water. But the gravamen of the complaint is the fact that ice which resulted from the presence of water on the sidewalk was allowed, after its formation, to remain on the sidewalk. In Center v. Davis, 39 Ga. 210, two judges (Brown, Ch. J., dissenting) held that the principle laid down in the Vason Case, 38 Ga. 542, was applicable only in case of a public nuisance. The Code provides that a public nuisance gives no right of action to any individual, unless such a nuisance causes special damage, in which the public do not participate, when an action will lie for such special damage, and that a private nuisance gives a right of action to the person injured. Civil Code, §§ 3858-3860. But whatever may be the character of the nuisance, the action must, of course, be brought against the person who creates or the one who maintains the same. Even in case of injury from a private nuisance the landlord will not be liable, where the tenant had exclusive possession of the premises, and where the nuisance was created by the tenant. Freidenburg v. Jones, 63 Ga. 612, 66 Ga. 505, 42 Am. Rep. 86; Edgar v. Walker, 106 Ga. 454, 32 S. E. 582. (2) This is manifestly the sound rule, for, as was said in White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204: "The use of the tenements really belongs to the tenant during the lease. They are his property to use for the term for which they are rented, and the landlord has no right to enter upon them, except by permission of the tenant, during the term for which they are rented." The case of Center v. Davis, 39 Ga. 210, 217, above referred to, in so far as it lays down the rule that a landlord will be liable for injuries resulting from a private nuisance which was maintained by his tenants, and with the creation of which he had no connection, has not been followed; and, being a decision by two judges, it is to be treated, at least to the extent above referred to, as having been overruled by the later cases. An obstruction on a sidewalk caused by allowing ice to remain thereon for such a time and in such a way as to render the same unsafe for travel is a public nuisance. See, in this connection, 1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 248. The Code provides that if "a public nuisance causes special damage to an individual, in which the public do not participate, such special damage gives a right of action." Civil Code, § 3859. A right of action against whom? Against the person creating or maintaining the same; and, if it is upon a sidewalk in a city, then against the city, if it suffered it to remain after the authorities knew, or should have known, of its existence, or against the individual creating it, or possibly against both. But certainly not against a landlord who, before the nuisance was created, had parted with the possession of the property, and who was not connected in any way with the maintenance of the nuisance. So that, whether we treat the nuisance alleged in the present case as a private or as a public nuisance, no liability arises, under the facts proved, against the landlord. It is true, the landlord knew the ditch was being used to carry water from the property across the sidewalk. But this in itself was not shown to be a nuisance. The injury to the plaintiff was not caused by the presence of the ditch alone, even if it be conceded that the landlord was directly responsible for the presence of the ditch. The injury was the result of a combination of circumstances, consisting of the presence of the ditch, the use of the same by the tenants when the weather was so unusually cold that water upon the ground would form into ice, the flowing of the water upon the sidewalk at such a time, the formation of the ice thereon, and allowing the same to remain upon the sidewalk after it had formed. The connection of the landlord with the matter terminates altogether at the point where the ditch is made upon the premises, and as he was in no way responsible for the acts of his tenants in using the ditch at a time when its use would probably result in the formation of ice upon the sidewalk, and as there is nothing appearing in the record which made it his duty to remove from the sidewalk the obstruction thus caused, it seems to be clear that nothing done by the landlord directly contributed to the injury which the plaintiff sustained. Certainly, under the circumstances, the mere presence of the ditch upon his property was not the proximate cause of the injury. There was no error in granting a nonsuit.

Judgment affirmed.

PHENIX INSURANCE COMPANY of Hartford, Plff. in Err.,
v.

E. A. SCHWARTZ.

(.....Ga.....)

- *1. A clause in a policy of fire insurance, requiring the assured to keep the books and inventories of his business "securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building [in which the stock insured is located] is not actually open for business, or, falling in this," to "keep such books and inventories in some place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the . . . building," does not apply to a suspension of business caused by such an emergency as a fire raging in the vicinity and threatening the consumption of the building, the same not being actually shut up, and business operations being interrupted because of the threatened danger. Under such circumstances, the clause in question does require the insured to exercise reasonable diligence to preserve the books and inventories.
2. Defects in a motion for a new trial, caused by the failure to properly assign error upon the rulings of which complaint is made, cannot be cured by setting out in the bill of exceptions the various grounds of the motion, and specifically assigning error upon the overruling of each ground.
3. Under the ruling of this court in Phenix Ins. Co. v. Hart, 112 Ga. 765, 38 S. E. 87, § 2140 of the Civil Code, which authorizes the plaintiff in an action upon a policy of insurance to recover, under certain conditions, damages and attorneys' fees, is unconstitutional.

ERROR to the City Court of Richmond County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. P. Carroll, for plaintiff in error:

If the store was not actually open for business when the fire occurred, and the inventories and books were not placed in an iron safe, there was a violation of the promissory warranty upon the part of the assured, and the policy would therefore be void.

Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. v. Stubbs, 98 Ga. 754, 27 S. E. 180; Southern F. Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 622, 52 L. R. A. 70, 36 S. E. 821.

If it appears that plaintiff lost her books and inventories from culpable negligence, and therefore could not produce them for inspection, she cannot recover, because she violated her promissory warranty, for she agreed therein to produce them for inspection by the insurer, and, being a condition precedent, it must be complied with in order to recover on the policy.

Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 36 C. C. A. 265, 94 Fed. 314; Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Jeary, 60 Neb. 338, 51 L. R. A. 702, 83 N. W. 78.

Messrs. J. R. Lamar and C. H. Cohen for defendant in error.

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A policy of insurance, issued by the Phoenix Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, to Mrs. E. A. Schwartz, upon her stock of goods and merchandise, contained, among others, the following provisions: "The following covenant and warranty is hereby made a part of this policy: 1st. The assured will take a complete itemized inventory of stock on hand at least once in each calendar year; and, unless such inventory has been taken within twelve calendar months prior to the date of this policy, one shall be taken in detail within thirty days of the issuance of this policy, or this policy shall be null and void from such date. . . . 2d. The assured shall keep a set of books, which shall clearly and plainly present a complete record of business transacted, including all purchases, sales, and shipments, both for cash and credit, from date of inventory, as provided for in the first section of this clause, and during the continuance of this policy. 3d. The assured will keep such books and inventory, and also the last and preceding inventories, if such have been taken, securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy is not actually open for business, or, failing in this, the assured shall keep such books and inventories in some place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the aforesaid building. In the event of failure to present such set of books and inventories for the inspection of this company, this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon." Mrs. Schwartz's store was consumed by a fire which originated during business hours in another store on the same block. Her books and inventory were destroyed by the fire. They were not in the safe, but had been tied up in a bundle in anticipation of the possibility that the fire might spread to that store, and placed near the door, so that they might be removed in case of danger. The company refused to pay the policy, on the ground of the failure of the assured to produce her books of account and inventories in accordance with the terms of the contract of insurance, and upon the further ground of noncompliance with the "iron-safe" clause of the policy, the provisions of which we have quoted. Mrs. Schwartz thereupon brought suit for the amount of the policy, together with damages and attorneys' fees. The defendant demurred to so much of the petition as sought to recover damages and attorneys' fees.

*Headnotes by FISH, J.

NOTE.—On the question of condition in fire policy as to keeping, producing, and preserving books or papers, including cases as to iron-safe clause in policy, see, in this series, Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Jeary (Neb.) 51 L. R. A. 698, and note; also Southern F. Ins. Co. v. Knight (Ga.) 52 L. R. A. 70, 36 S. E. 821.

This demurrer was overruled, and the case proceeded to trial, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, including $625 damages for bad faith on the part of the defendant company in refusing to pay the policy, and $500 as attorneys' fees, whereupon the defendant made a motion for a new trial, which the court refused. To the overruling of its demurrer, and to the refusal of the court to grant a new trial, the insurance company excepted.

1. The proper determination of the issues involved in the case before us depends largely upon the construction to be placed upon what is known as the "iron-safe" clause in the policy of insurance. It seems clear from the record that the plaintiff below had in her store at the time of the fire an iron safe, which was open, and into which the books and other records of the business could easily have been placed; that upon the approach of the fire, however, they were not placed in the safe, but were tied in a bundle and put conveniently at hand, so that they might be removed from the building in the event that the conflagration, which was then some distance away, should seem to threaten the safety of the store; that the fire spread much more rapidly than was expected, with the result that a wall of the building in which the plaintiff's store was located fell in, destroying her entire stock of merchandise; and that the books and inventory were not removed, but were destroyed with the building. It was the contention of counsel for the insurance company, as disclosed by their brief and the written requests for instructions to the jury, that upon the approach of the fire the plaintiff's store was no longer "open for business," within the meaning of the iron-safe clause of the policy; that it thereupon became the duty of the plaintiff to promptly place the books (which up to that time had been in use) in the safe; and that her failure to do this, resulting in her inability to produce the books and inventory for the inspection of the company, was a bar to her right to recover on the policy. We cannot, however, concede that this is a fair construction of the iron-safe clause. It is plain that on all ordinary occasions when her store was not open for business, such, for instance, as Sundays, holidays, and after the store had closed at night, the plaintiff was required by the clause in question to do one of two things: She must either have kept the books and inventories in her safe at the store, or else have removed them to some place where they would not be exposed to danger from fire. The clear intent of the clause is to guard against the possible destruction of these records during the absence from the store of those whose duty it was to look after them, and to that end it was provided that if the books were to be left in the store at night, and on other occasions when business was not being transacted, they must be kept in an iron safe, which, presumably, was the most secure place for them in the store. But we see no warrant for the construction that this clause was intended to apply to occasions of actual impending danger from fire, nor are we aware of any rule for determining just when, under circumstances such as are disclosed by the record now under consideration, a store ceases to be "open for business." The fire took place during business hours, and it does not appear that the premises were ever actually closed. It was a time of great and sudden emergency, and, as a matter of fact, it is conceivable that the books might have been in greater danger from destruction, under the circumstances, in the iron safe than if removed to some place outside the store. Applied to the peculiar circumstances of the present case, we think that a fair interpretation of the iron-safe clause would be as follows: The insured was required to preserve, and, in case of fire, to produce, her books of account and inventories; the preservation of them being solely for the purpose of enabling her to produce them when required. On all ordinary occasions when the store was not open for business, certain hard and fast rules were laid down to insure their preservation. In cases of sudden emergency, the insured must exercise all reasonable diligence to effect the main end of the iron-safe clause, viz., to put the books in a place of safety, so that they could be produced for the inspection of the company's agents after the fire. Whether such diligence required the placing of the books in the iron safe, or their removal from the building, and whether, in the present case, the plaintiff used such diligence, were questions of fact, to be determined by the jury. See Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 2 Ind. Terr. 67, 46 S. W. 414; East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 647, 25 S. W. 720.

2. Certain grounds of the motion for a new trial complain of portions of the judge's charge, and of various rulings upon the admission of evidence, but do not point out in what the alleged error consisted. Apparently, counsel for the plaintiff in error attempted to cure this defect in the motion by incorporating these grounds in the bill of exceptions, and there specifically assigning error on each; but under the ruling of this court in Hill v. State, 112 Ga. 32, 37 S. E. 441 (2), and the cases there cited, these assignments of error cannot now be considered.

3. Under the ruling of this court in the case of Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Hart, 112 Ga. 705, 38 S. E. 67, it is clear that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to so much of the plaintiff's petition as sought to recover damages and attorneys' fees under § 2140 of the Civil Code. We accordingly reverse the judgment of the court below. Upon another hearing it should be tried upon the line indicated in the first division of this opinion.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except Little and Lewis, JJ., absent on account of sickness.

Elizabeth K. BIGBY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

J. T. WARNOCK.

(.....Ga.....)

- *1. A conveyance of property, with intention to delay or defraud creditors, and such intention known to the party taking, is void as to them, though made in payment of a debt, which in amount approximates the value of the property so conveyed.
2. Where in such a case a wife is the fraudulent grantee of her husband, and in order to procure a loan to herself, conveys the property, as security, to one ignorant of the fraud, she is personally liable to a judgment creditor of her husband, as to whom the conveyance to her is void, for the amount of the loan, or a sufficiency thereof to satisfy such judgment.
3. In an action brought by the judgment creditor of the husband against the wife in such a case, she cannot, to reduce a recovery, plead a debt due her by her husband. Moreover, it is immaterial what she did with the borrowed money, provided she did not apply it to her husband's debts.
4. An assignment of error upon the refusal of the court to allow a witness to answer a specified question propounded by the party calling him is not properly made unless it states what evidence was thus sought to be elicited, and that the court was informed thereof at the time of the ruling.
5. There was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict. The rulings announced cover all of the material points in the case. In none of the grounds of the motion for new trial not therein dealt with does any error of material consequence appear.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of judgments which had been obtained against John S. Bigby. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dorsey, Brewster, & Howell, B. H. Hill & C. D. Hill, and Smith, Hammond, & Smith, for plaintiff in error:

The vendee purchasing property from his debtor in payment of a bona fide debt does not occupy the same relation to § 2695, ¶ 2, as the vendee who volunteers to purchase from a debtor his property and pay him money therefor.

Ga. Code, § 2697.

A conveyance by a debtor of his own property in discharge of a debt, though taken by the grantee with the knowledge that it is intended to hinder, delay, or defeat other creditors, is good as against the latter, unless the grantee takes more than the amount of his debt, either for himself, or for the debtor, or others.

Where the laws permit a debtor to prefer one creditor to another: (1) If the debt which is the consideration of the conveyance by the debtor to the creditor is bona fide; (2) the value of the property conveyed is approximately not greater than the amount due on the debt; (3) no benefit is reserved to the debtor; (4) no benefit is to accrue to the creditor beyond the payment of his debt; (5) if there is no injury to other creditors beyond the mere payment of the preferred debt,—then the conveyance is valid, independent of the intention of the debtor making it, or the knowledge of such intention on the part of the creditor accepting the conveyance.

If the rule shall prevail as enunciated by the court, it is easy for the husband to absorb the wife's property to himself.

We cannot believe such a rule is correct in this state.

The contention of the complainant was that the defendants were guilty of an elaborate scheme of fraud, and every fact evidencing such fraud was admissible.

The evidence in this case shows that the defendants were guilty of evasiveness and generalities. Generalities indicate fraud.

Harris v. Collins, 75 Ga. 97.

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

J. T. Warnock brought an equitable petition against John S. Bigby and his wife, Elizabeth K. Bigby, and the British American Mortgage Company, Limited, herein-after referred to as the "Mortgage Company." The petition alleged, in substance, that on July 8, 1896, petitioner recovered a judgment against John S. Bigby for $9,515.56, principal, interest, and costs, and on September 10th of the same year he recovered another judgment against him for $617.85, principal, interest, and costs; that the executions issued on these judgments were returned with entries of nulla bona; that John S. Bigby claimed to be insolvent; that prior to 1896 he had large means, consisting of realty, and bank, railroad, and other stocks, etc.; that in 1891 he was made president of the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company, of Columbus, Georgia, and continued in the control of the affairs of that company until June 13, 1896, when it was placed in the hands of receivers; that while president of that company he became indorser for large amounts on its obligations, and that after he discovered that the company would fail he began to hide and dispose of his property for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and preventing his creditors from collecting their debts; that in pursuance of such purpose, and without any consideration, he transferred to his wife, Elizabeth K., large amounts of stock in two national banks in Newnan, and in the West View Cemetery Company, and the West View Floral Company, and that she knew at the time of the transfers that they were made for such fraudulent purpose; that on May 4, 1896, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding petitioner and other creditors (Mrs. Bigby knowing of such purpose at the time), Mr. Bigby conveyed to her, by a deed, a certain described house and lot, situated on Washington street, in the city of Atlanta; that though the deed stated the consideration to be $18,700, and though Mrs. Bigby claimed that the conveyance was made in payment of debts due to her by her husband, as a matter of fact there was no consideration for the conveyance, and it was executed for the fraudulent purpose above stated; that on July 15, 1896, Mrs. Bigby, for the purpose of aiding her husband in hindering, delaying, and defrauding petitioner and other creditors of her husband, conveyed by deed the Washington street property to the mortgage company, to secure a loan to her of $15,000; and that she had no property except that which had been given to her by her husband. The petitioner prayed that the transfers of stocks and the conveyance of the Washington street property be decreed to be void, that the equity of redemption in the Washington street property be decreed to be subject to petitioner's judgments, and that Mrs. Bigby be decreed to be liable, as trustee ex maleficio, for any sum realized by her upon the security deed given to the mortgage company. The mortgage company was not served, and made no appearance. Bigby and his wife denied specifically all allegations of fraud made in the petition, and set up that the transfers of stock and the conveyance of the Washington street property were executed in good faith, and with no intention to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of Mr. Bigby; that the consideration of such transfers and conveyance was an indebtedness due her by him, and three notes given by him to her, in payment of which he conveyed to her the Washington street house and lot specified,—one dated January 4, 1893, due one day after date, for $10,500 (being for 100 shares of stock in the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, which he had given to her in 1883, and which she sold to him at the time the note was given); one dated July 12, 1893, due on demand, for $3,200, for money borrowed by him from her; and one dated May 3, 1895, payable on demand, for $5,000, the consideration being money loaned him by her, which she had received from the first National Bank of Newnan on stock he had given her in January, 1895. Bigby died pending the suit, and his wife, as executrix of his will, was made a party defendant. On the trial a verdict was rendered finding the conveyance of the Washington street property to be void; that petitioner recover of Mrs. Bigby $9,503.71 "on account of the proceeds of the mortgage made by her;" and "in favor of defendant as to the claim on account of stocks." A motion for a new trial was made by Mrs. Bigby on numerous grounds, which being overruled, she excepted.

1. One of the controlling questions presented in this case for determination is whether, under our law, a conveyance of property made by a debtor with intention to delay or defraud his creditors (such intention known to the party taking) is void as to other creditors, when made in payment of a debt which in amount is approximately the value of the property conveyed. Whatever may be the rulings of other courts on this question, it is well established by the former decisions of this court that a conveyance made under such circumstances is void as to creditors. In Phintzy v. Clark, 62 Ga. 626, Mr. Justice Bleckley said: "A fraudulent conveyance cannot stand against creditors, whether made to secure a debt or not. The conveyance must be pure; it must be made bona fide, and with no purpose known to or suspected by the creditor to hamper and entangle the property as against other creditors, for the sake of hindering or delaying them. If made partly to secure a debt, and partly to hinder, delay, or in any way defraud other creditors, and the creditor taking the deed has knowledge of this latter intention, or grounds for reasonable suspicion, no title will pass as against the other creditors." A like ruling was made in Palmour v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 91, 10 S. E. 500. In Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 188, 28 S. E. 97, a conveyance by a husband to his wife was attacked by his creditors as being void, because made to delay and defraud them. The wife contended that she was a creditor of her husband, and had paid him full value for the land he conveyed to her. The case was tried before his honor Judge J. H. Lumpkin, who also presided upon the trial of the case now in hand. His charges upon the question of fraudulent conveyances were practically the same in both cases. In passing upon exceptions to his charge in the former case, this court said: "There was no error on the trial of such a case, while the court was submitting to the jury the question as to whether or not a given deed from the defendant in execution to his wife, she being one of the defendants to the petition, was made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud the husband's creditors, in charging, in substance, that if the husband made the deed with such intent, and this was known to the wife, it was void as to the creditors, 'even though it may appear that she had paid a valuable consideration;' nor in charging that if, in accepting such a deed, she did so with the intention and purpose of delaying and defrauding such creditors, the deed would be void, 'although it may have been based upon a valuable consideration.'" The doctrine was again recognized in Monroe Mercantile Co. v. Arnold, 108 Ga. 449, 34 S. E. 176, where Mr. Justice Lewis said: "... Where the sole purpose of a debtor is to secure his creditors, and there is no intent to either defraud or delay others, such preference of a particular creditor will be upheld, although the natural result of it may be to delay other creditors. Were the doctrine otherwise, it would be almost impracticable for a debtor to exercise the privilege of preference given him by law, for he can in good faith secure a creditor by making to him a conveyance of all his property, yet the natural result of that would be necessary to delay, if not prevent, the collection of debts due to others. But whenever the purpose of a conveyance is to bring about such delay, then the law itself is violated, and the contract by which his property is transferred becomes tainted with a legal fraud." The validity of the conveyance is to be determined, not by its consideration or effect, but by the intention with which it is made and accepted. There is nothing ruled in Dodd v. Bond, 88 Ga. 355, 14 S. E. 581, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, which is in conflict with the decisions from which we have quoted. The point adjudicated in that case was that "a creditor who gives credit to a mother on the faith of property to which she has the legal title, but which in equity belongs to her children, acquires no lien upon the property by a judgment rendered against her after she has conveyed it to a trustee for their benefit, although she may have been actuated in making the conveyance by an intent and purpose to defeat such creditor, and such intent and purpose may have been known to the trustee when the conveyance was made. The property being equitably that of the children, and the creditor having acquired no lien upon it before his debtor parted with the legal title, he cannot subject it to a sale under his judgment." It is true that in delivering the opinion in that case the present Chief Justice remarked that "there is authority to the effect that a conveyance by a debtor of his own property in discharge of a debt, though taken by the grantee with the knowledge that it is intended to hinder, delay, or defeat other creditors, is good, as against the latter, unless the grantee takes more than the amount of his debt, either for himself or for the debtor or others." He further said, however: "Whatever may be the true view of the law where a debtor conveys his own property to a creditor, we are satisfied that where one conveys property not his own, which he wrongfully holds, to the rightful owner, the law does not require the latter to yield his rights and decline taking it because the person who has withheld it wrongfully may, in returning it, intend thereby to keep his own creditors from getting it. One who takes merely what is his own is not punished for considerations which may operate upon the mind of the party who gives it up. In this case the wrongful holder of property was performing a legal and moral duty,—was doing that which, in the eyes of the law, ought to have been done, in placing the property where it belonged. We hold, therefore, that the conveyance is good as against these creditors, and that they cannot subject the property to sale under their judgments." It is obvious that the ruling made in that case is not helpful to the plaintiff in error.

2. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "If you find, under the evidence, and under the law as I have given you in charge, that it [the deed to the Washington street property] was void as against this creditor, and should be so declared, then I charge you whatever amount Mrs. Bigby received by placing a mortgage on the land would be, as a sequence of such finding, a receipt of money from land which she was not entitled to as against this creditor, and therefore she would be liable to account to him for such money so received, to the extent of his judgment." One of the exceptions to this charge was, in substance, that even if Mrs. Bigby was the fraudulent grantee of her husband, and she disposed of the property to an innocent mortgagee, the plaintiff was not entitled to a personal judgment against her which would bind her separate estate. It is a well-established doctrine that a judgment creditor has the right, in equity, to a personal or money judgment against a fraudulent grantee of his debtor, where the grantee has so disposed of the property as to place it beyond the reach of the judgment. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 341; Wait, Fraud. Conv. §§ 177 et seq.; Bump, Fraud. Conv. § 623; and numerous cases cited by the authors. The reason upon which the rule is founded is well stated in Ferguson v. Hillman, 55 Wis. 181, 12 N. W. 389, as follows: "The property in the hands of the fraudulent purchaser is held by him in trust for the creditors of his fraudulent vendor, and when the property is converted into money the money is impressed with the same trust. The original conveyance being void as to creditors, no title as to them ever passed to the grantee; and, if he sells it and receives the money, he must hold the money for the benefit of the creditors. In equity, such money in the hands of the fraudulent grantee is held for the benefit of the creditors." To same effect, see Blair v. Smith, 114 Ind. 118, 15 N. E. 817, and Smith v. Sands, 17 Neb. 498, 23 N. W. 356. Of course, the recovery against the fraudulent grantee will be limited to the amount of the creditor's judgment against his debtor, and cannot exceed the proceeds of the property or its value.

Does this rule apply where a wife is the fraudulent grantee of her husband? The Supreme Court of the United States, in Phipps v. Sedgwick, 95 U. S. 3, 24 L. ed. 591, which was on appeal from New York, held that it did not. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The statutes of the different states have gone very far, in this country, to modify the peculiar relations of husband and wife, as they existed at common law, in reference to their property. But they have not, except, perhaps, in Louisiana, gone so far as to recognize the civil law rule of perfect independence in dealing with each other. While the statutes of New York have recognized certain rights of the wife to deal with and contract in reference to her separate property, they fall far short of establishing the principle that out of that separate property she can be made liable for money or property received at her husband's hands, which in equity ought to have gone to pay his debts. . . . Such a proposition would be a very unjust one to the wife still under the dominion, control, and personal influence of the husband." This case was followed in United States Trust Co. v. Sedgwick, 97 U. S. 304, 24 L. ed. 954, and Huntington v. Saunders, 120 U. S. 78, 30 L. ed. 580, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358, and these were approved in Clark v. Beecher, 154 U. S. 631, appx., and 24 L. ed. 705, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1184. Mr. Wait, in his work on Fraudulent Conveyances, 3d ed. § 180, says: "These Supreme Court cases certainly accomplish an unfortunate result, and probably will not be universally accepted, if, indeed, the principles they embody are not superseded in some states by the removal of the disabilities incident to coverture. In Post v. Stiger, 29 N. J. Eq. 558, it appeared that property had been conveyed to a wife in fraud of the husband's creditors. The wife set up as a defense the fact that she had disposed of it. The court said that she must answer for its value. An attempt was made to show that she had subsequently lost by bad bargains all the property that she had acquired by the conveyance. The proofs did not seem to sustain this view, but the court remarked that, even if it had been so proved, this would not relieve her from liability, and, continuing, said: 'She held the property as trustee of her husband's creditors, and dealt with it at her peril. A fraudulent grantee cannot repel the claims of the creditors of the grantor by simply saying: "I have lost, by imprudent bargains or collusive foreclosures, the property I attempted to conceal, and therefore I am answerable for nothing." It may be urged that this case is a dictum on the points cited. This is probably a legitimate criticism, for the court practically found that the wife still had the property; yet as an expression of opinion of a highly intelligent court, pointing, as we claim, in the right direction, we regard the dictum as worthy of adoption as an absolute authority." In Coale v. Moline Plow Co. 134 Ill. 350, 25 N. E. 1016, it was held: "Where a wife to whom her husband has fraudulently conveyed land mortgages it to a bona fide mortgagee, and, when the conveyance is attacked by the husband's creditors, claims to own the land, and avows the execution of the mortgage, she will be personally liable to the creditors for the money obtained on the mortgage, though it went to the husband." In Jones v. Davenport, 44 N. J. Eq. 33, 13 Atl. 652, it was held: "Where a husband shortly before his death transferred to his wife, who was afterwards his executrix, certain shares of bank stock for an alleged consideration,—$2,500 less than she realized several months afterwards,—the wife is personally liable to his creditors for the sum which she received from the sale. In Blair v. Smith, 114 Ind. 118, 15 N. E. 817, it was held: "Where a husband, to defraud his creditors, gives money to his wife, who yields no consideration, and who accepts the money with knowledge of his fraudulent purpose, she is chargeable as a trustee, and may be compelled to account as such at the suit of the husband's creditors." It is true that in these cases the point seems not to have been raised that the wife was not personally liable, because she was presumed to have acted under the influence and control of her husband; but, if any such presumption existed in law, surely it would have been noticed by the learned judges who rendered these decisions. In Phelps v. Smith, 116 Ind. 387, 17 N. E. 602, 19 N. E. 156, where the ruling in Blair v. Smith, 114 Ind. 118, 15 N. E. 817, was approved, Elliott, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The decision in Phipps v. Sedgwick, 95 U. S. 3, 24 L. ed. 591, if conceded to be otherwise relevant, is not in point, because the court placed its judgment upon the disability created by coverture, saying that 'such a proposition would be a very unjust one to the wife still under the dominion, control, and personal influence of the husband.' Manifestly this rule cannot apply in jurisdictions where a married woman possesses nearly all the rights of a feme sole, and where 'ability is the rule, and disability the exception.'" Under our law, a married woman, in dealing with her separate estate, stands upon the same footing as a man or a feme sole, with these restrictions only: She cannot bind it by any contract of suretyship, nor by any assumption of the debts of her husband, nor sell it to a creditor in payment of her husband's debts, nor sell it to her husband without an order of the superior court. Civil Code, §§ 2488, 2490. As said by Chief Justice Jackson in Howard v. Simpkins, 70 Ga. 322: "... The law in regard to a married woman, and all her rights and disabilities, has undergone a complete revolution in this state since the act of 1866, which, in effect, and as to all her property, makes her a feme sole, almost in every respect as if she never had been married, so far as property is concerned." Barring the exceptions above indicated, she may contract as if she were a feme sole, and she is certainly not under the dominion, control, and personal influence of the husband to the extent she was at common law. There the wife was not responsible, except as to certain offenses, for acts done in her husband's presence, for the reason that she was supposed to act under his coercion. Under our statute, however, there is no such presumption, but in order for the wife to stand excused for the commission of any offense, however small, on the ground of the presence of her husband, "it must appear that she was in fact coerced, or that he used violent threats, command, or some equivalent means of coercion calculated to overpower her will and render her a passive instrument rather than a voluntary agent of crime." Bell v. State, 92 Ga. 49, 18 S. E. 186. In Vaughn v. Miller, 76 Ga. 712, it was held that if a wife, by consent and arrangement with her husband, assist him to procure goods from another for the purpose of enabling her husband to pay a debt she holds against him, which she cannot otherwise collect, or which she is doubtful about collecting, she is guilty of such a fraud as will make her liable to the person from whom the goods are procured, whether the credit for the goods be extended to her or to the husband.

It is further argued by counsel for plaintiff in error that: "It is the policy of our laws to protect [the wife's] separate estate against the influence of her husband, and . . . that the rule laid down by the court in his charge opens the gate to a method to subject the wife's separate estate to the obligations of the husband. If the rule shall prevail as enunciated by the court, it is easy for the husband to absorb the wife's property to himself." And the following illustration is given: "A man has a wife possessed of a large separate estate. He has a large estate. He wants money. The law presumes that the wife is subject to the husband's influence. He conveys to her, in fraud of his creditors, property of large value. He has her to mortgage it for its full value. He takes the money and appropriates it to his own uses. Creditors attack the conveyance. It is found, as in this case, fraudulent; and, as the property given her by her husband is mortgaged for its full value, a judgment against her for the amount realized from the mortgage is had. It sweeps away her entire separate estate. The law has been circumvented. The separate estate has been appropriated to the payment of her husband's debts, in spite of the statute enacted to protect it." Even granting, for the sake of the argument, that the wife's separate estate would be subject in the hypothetical case suggested by counsel, it is very improbable that a husband would ever resort to such a scheme for the purpose of defrauding his wife. When he undertakes to devise means for the purpose of fraudulently protecting his own property against the just demands of his creditors, he is not likely to use methods the purpose of which is to subject his wife's separate estate to the payment of his debts; but he will, in all probability, adopt some plan by which his property may be put beyond the reach of his creditors, and yet so placed that he and his wife may still enjoy both the benefits arising from its use, and the use of her property also. If the law were, as counsel for the plaintiff in error insists it is, that a personal judgment cannot be obtained against a wife who is the fraudulent grantee of her husband, a wide door, indeed, would be open for fraud. All that an insolvent husband who desired to defraud his creditors would then have to do would be to conspire with his wife, convey all his property to her, have her sell or mortgage the same to an innocent party, and conceal the proceeds. She would then be enabled to enjoy the fruits of her own wrong, while her separate estate, however large it might be, would be free from liability.

3. Another contention of the plaintiff in error was that no personal judgment should be rendered against her, because the evidence showed that she borrowed $10,000 from a bank, for which she gave her note, with her husband as surety; that she loaned this money to the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company, and took its note, with her husband as indorser thereon; that, of the money she loaned it, the company paid $5,000 in satisfaction of a note held by Warnock against it, upon which her husband was indorser; that she paid her note to the bank with part of the money she borrowed from the mortgage company, and for which the security deed was given; and that she had recovered a judgment against her husband, as indorser on the note given her by the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company, for a sum larger than the amount she had received from the mortgage company. She therefore claimed that, as her judgment against her husband was larger than the amount which she had obtained by encumbering the realty which her husband conveyed to her, she was not liable to the plaintiff in the case, and, further, that she was not liable because she had, in effect, appropriated $10,000 of the money she received from the mortgage company to the payment of her husband's debts. We do not think these contentions sound. As already seen, if Bigby fraudulently conveyed the house and lot to his wife for the purpose of defeating his creditors, and she participated in the fraud, she was liable as a trustee ex maleficio to Warnock, to the amount of his judgments, for the money she procured on the property by conveying it to the mortgage company, which took without notice of the fraud. If she was such a fraudulent grantee, and had really paid a part of the consideration for the property transferred to her by her husband in cash, she could not even set up against the plaintiff's recovery the amount of money which she thus paid. For the rule is that "the loss of the amount paid by the fraudulent grantee is the penalty which the law inflicts for the fraudulent transaction. To refund to the grantee the amount he has paid would be to remove all danger of loss, and destroy the salutary restraint which the law has built up against such transactions." 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 345. It seems that the spirit of this rule would preclude a fraudulent grantee from setting up a debt which the grantor owes him, to reduce the amount of the recovery against him by the grantor's creditor. But be this as it may, it is certainly true that the conveyance from Bigby to his wife was valid as between them, though made to defeat his creditors, and accepted by her with knowledge of the fraudulent purpose. Flannery v. Coleman, 112 Ga. 648, 37 S. E. 878. After such conveyance, the title to the property was in her as to all the world, except her husband's creditors; and it follows that she in like manner held the money she borrowed on the property from the mortgage company. This being true, this money, which as to the plaintiff, Warnock, she held as trustee, and which was subject to the debt he held against her husband, should not be applied to the payment of a debt she held against him, because, as between her and him, it was not his money, but hers, and it would be an anomaly for her to collect a debt she held against her husband out of her own property. Nor could the use made by Mrs. Bigby of the money she received by encumbering the property, if she was such a fraudulent grantee, affect the recovery against her, provided such money was not applied to the payment of her husband's debts. Mason v. Pierron, 69 Wis. 585, 34 N. W. 921. See 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 347. The portion of the money Mrs. Bigby received from the mortgage company which she paid to the bank was in satisfaction of her own debt, for which she had given her individual note, with her husband as surety. She, and not her husband, was the primary debtor on this note, and she got the benefit of the payment. That the Eagle & Phenix Manufacturing Company, to which she loaned the money she borrowed from the bank, had used part of it in paying a note which Warnock, the plaintiff below, held against it, and upon which Bigby was indorser, is wholly immaterial, as such payment was in liquidation of a debt for which it was primarily liable, and not Bigby. It is clear, therefore, that the $10,000 paid to the bank by Mrs. Bigby was not a payment to any creditor of her husband. Our conclusion upon this subject is that, while recognizing the great weight which should be accorded to the decisions of the highest judicial tribunal in the land, yet the reasons given by the court in Phipps v. Sedgwick, 95 U. S. 3, 24 L. ed. 591, for holding that, where property is conveyed by a husband to his wife in fraud of his creditors, a personal judgment for its value cannot be taken against her, do not apply in this state, where married women are practically free from the disabilities imposed upon them at common law.

4. In one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, complaint was made of the refusal of the court, upon objection made by counsel for defendant in error, to allow a witness to answer a question propounded by counsel for plaintiff in error. The motion set forth what the answer to the question would have been, but it does not appear that the court was informed at the time the ruling excepted to was made what answer was expected to the question. The exact point here presented was decided in Southern Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hudson, 113 Ga. 438, 38 S. E. 964. In discussing a ground of a motion for a new trial similar to the one now under consideration, Mr. Justice Little, speaking for the court, said: "Under repeated rulings of this court, the ground cannot be considered, because the material inquiry is, Did the court err in excluding the answer to that question from the jury? And there having been no statement made on the trial as to what his answer would have been, the judge, of course, did not pass on the materiality of the proposed testimony; and, because he did not, we cannot overrule him. . . . He was entitled, at least, to have known, in substance, what the answer to the question would have been." There was therefore no merit in this assignment of error, as made in the motion for a new trial.

5. Counsel for plaintiff in error earnestly contended that the verdict was without evidence to support it; that the plaintiff below sought discovery from Mr. and Mrs. Bigby, and they both answered, denying that the conveyance from him to her of the Washington street property was made with any intent to hinder, delay, or defraud plaintiff or any other creditor, but asserted that the conveyance was made in good faith for the purpose of paying bona fide debts due her by him, which were set out in detail; and that their answers were not overcome by two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances. After a very thorough examination and consideration of the evidence in the record, we have concluded that it was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the conveyance of the Washington street house and lot was made by the grantor for the purpose of delaying or defrauding his creditors, and that the grantee knew of such purpose at the time, or had reasonable grounds of suspicion of that fact.

The contentions of the plaintiff below were (1) that the conveyance was voluntary, without valuable consideration, and made by an insolvent debtor; (2) that it was made with intention to delay or defraud creditors, and such intention was known to the grantee. The interrogatories propounded to Mr. and Mrs. Bigby in the plaintiff's petition were manifestly confined to questions relating to the first of these contentions. They were both interrogated as to the value of their respective estates during the years 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896. They were asked of what their estates consisted during those years; what had become of the property; if any of it had been transferred, to whom, when, how, and for what consideration, and what was done with the proceeds received from it. The only interrogatories propounded specifically to Mr. Bigby in reference to the Washington street property were as follows: "Did your wife pay you any consideration when you transferred the Washington street house and lot to her? If so, what was the consideration? If it was in money, what did you do with the money, where did she get it, and from whom did she get it? If it was an indebtedness from you to her, state when and how it originated, and in what shape it was when you transferred said house and lot to her? If she loaned you the money, state when she loaned it to you, and where she got it?" The only interrogatories propounded to Mrs. Bigby as 57 L. R. A.

to such property were practically the same. The petition expressly stated that discovery from the defendants was waived, except as to the specific questions therein propounded. Granting that the answers responsive to the interrogatories would, after the defendants were sworn and examined as witnesses in their own behalf, have to be overcome by the testimony of two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances, this was not true as to answers which were not so responsive, and as to subjects in relation to which discovery had been waived. We will mention some of the circumstances in evidence from which, in our opinion, the jury could have found that the conveyance of the Washington street property was made to delay or defraud the creditors of the grantor, and that the grantee took with knowledge of the fraudulent purpose, or grounds for reasonable suspicion: The parties to it were husband and wife, and the familiar rule that transactions between them are to be closely scanned, and their bona fides clearly established, was applicable. The grantor was insolvent at the time, and the suits upon which defendant in error obtained judgments against him were then pending. The conveyance was executed May 4th, recorded May 28th, and the property conveyed by the grantee to the mortgage company on July 15th thereafter. The three notes of the grantor held by the grantee, the payment of which they claimed to have been the consideration for the conveyance, were dated, respectively, July 4, 1893, July 12th of the same year, and May 3, 1895,—two of them payable on demand; the other, one day after date; and the grantee never made any request for payment of either the interest or principal until within about two months before defendant in error obtained judgment against the grantor, when the grantee then demanded payment. The consideration stated in the conveyance was $18,700, the sum total of the principal of the three notes. The grantor testified: "The consideration that was specified in the deed was purely an arbitrary one,—one that we thought would control in giving in taxes." "I transferred this house on May 4, 1896, to pay her this note, and dividends and other debts that I owed her. The fair valuation of the house and lot at that time was probably $16,000 or $17,000." The grantee, in her application to the mortgage company for the loan, valued the property at $30,000, and there was evidence that it was worth $25,000.

The rulings made cover all the material points in the case. In none of the grounds of the motion for a new trial not dealt with does any error of material consequence appear.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except Lewis, J., absent on account of sickness.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

INDIANA NATURAL & ILLUMINATING GAS COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

STATE of Indiana ex rel. James A. BALL.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A natural gas company having authority to lay its mains in a public street and supply gas to consumers, charging a flat rate by the month or a certain meter rate per 1,000 feet, cannot enforce the latter rate against a single consumer if it makes an unjust discrimination against him.
2. To entitle a consumer to an order requiring a gas company having authority to charge flat or meter rates to supply him at the flat rate the same as all other consumers are supplied, he must show that the enforcement of the meter rate against him will be an unjust discrimination.

(March 11, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County in favor of relator in a proceeding to compel defendant to supply it with gas at a flat, rather than at a meter, rate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. M. Ralston and F. Winter for appellant.

Mr. Ira M. Sharpe for appellee.

Gillett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee commenced this action in the court below to compel the appellant, by mandate, to supply the home of appellee's relator with natural gas service on the basis of what is known as a "flat rate," as distinguished from a meter rate. Issues were framed, and, pursuant to request, the court below, after hearing the evidence, prepared and filed special findings of fact, together with its conclusions of law thereon. It is not necessary to discuss the correctness of the rulings of the trial court on the pleadings, as the same matters arise upon the special findings of fact and conclusions of law. The material facts in the case, as found by the court below, are these: That the appellant is a corporation; that on the 19th day of November, 1891, the board of trustees of the town of Thorntown duly passed and adopted an ordinance prescribing the terms upon which corporations incorporated for such purposes might lay and maintain pipes in the streets and alleys of said town for use in supplying said town and its inhabitants with natural gas for heating and illuminating purposes; that it was provided in said ordinance that any corporation accepting such grant should charge certain annual and monthly prices for the service furnished, but that it should have the right, if it provided a meter, to require "any consumer" to pay for the gas used by him at a rate not exceeding 20 cents per 1,000 cubic feet of gas supplied; that said ordinance was accepted by a corporation known as the People's Natural Gas Company, and that the appellant afterward, and on the 15th day of May, 1893, became its successor, and by virtue of the authority of said ordinance laid mains in the streets and alleys of said town, and entered upon and continued the business of supplying natural gas to said town and its inhabitants for heating and illuminating purposes; that it laid one of its mains in the street upon which the relator's lot abuts, and in front of the house thereon situated; that appellant connected the gas pipes in relator's house with said main, and from that time until the 5th day of January, 1900, supplied his house with natural gas for heating and illuminating purposes on the basis of the flat rate provided for in said ordinance; that on said day appellant's agent requested the relator to enter into a new and written contract, in consideration that appellant would not require him to thereafter pay for the gas he consumed by meter measurement, by which proposed contract, if signed by him, he would have agreed to pay a flat rate largely in excess of the ordinance requirement, and also have agreed to other conditions not provided for in said ordinance; that said relator refused so to do, and tendered payment of the amount that would be due from him for a certain time in the future on the basis of the flat rate that the ordinance provided for; that this tender was refused by appellant, and it shut off the flow of gas from relator's premises, and appellant's said agent informed him that he would be required to enter into said new proposed contract before it would furnish gas to him; that said relator afterwards, and on the same day renewed his tender, and demanded that the gas be furnished his said house; that the appellant refused so to do, but said agent immediately informed re-lator that appellant would supply his house with said gas through a meter, and furnish and connect the meter at its own cost, if he would agree to pay for the gas consumed by meter measurement, at the rate of 20 cents per 1,000 cubic feet; that this offer was refused by relator; and that the gas was not furnished him. The court further found that at that time no other customer in said town was required to pay for gas on a meter basis, but that all others were supplied on the basis of the flat rates provided for in said ordinance.

When appellant laid its mains in the streets of Thorntown, and began to exercise the right to sell to the inhabitants of said town a commodity under circumstances calculated to give it more or less of a natural monopoly, since it would be impracticable for its inhabitants generally to supply said commodity each for himself, the undertaking of said company became impressed with a public character; and it became its duty, while it continued to exercise its franchise, to serve the inhabitants of the municipality without invidious discrimination. Portland Natural Gas & Oil Co. v. State ex rel. Keen, 135 Ind. 54, 21 L. R. A. 639, 34 N. E. 818; Westfield Gas & Mill. Co. v. Mendenhall, 142 Ind. 538, 41 N. E. 1033; Coy v. Indianapolis Gas Co. 146 Ind. 655, 36 L. R. Albina Light & Water Co.* 21 Or. 411, 14 L. R. A. 424, 28 Pac. 244; 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1129; 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 835d.

The relator was not bound to take gas upon any other terms than those prescribed in the ordinance. Westfield Gas & Mill. Co. v. Mendenhall, 142 Ind. 538, 41 N. E. 1033. We are not, however, required to attach consequences to the action of appellant in turning off the gas. It is to be remembered that this action is to procure a peremptory mandamus,—a remedy comparable to a proceeding on the equity side of the court for specific performance; and, as mandamus looks to the future, we turn our attention to the question whether the relator was entitled to receive gas thereafter upon the basis of a flat rate. Appellant had an option, under the ordinance, to furnish gas on the basis of a flat rate or on the basis of a meter rate; but, in view of the fact that appellant had not seen fit to require its other patrons in said town to pay on the basis of a meter measurement, the 57 L. R. A. question arises whether relator is compelled to have his liability so determined. While it is true that the ordinance of the town of Thorntown purports to authorize any natural gas company accepting the ordinance to charge 20 cents per 1,000 cubic feet for gas to "any consumer," yet we are of the opinion that such authorization will not allow the appellant to impose a burdensome discrimination upon relator. We base this ruling, not upon the statute which authorizes the granting of such franchises, but upon the fundamental law. We refer to the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. While it is probably true that the "privileges and immunities" clause of that amendment will not protect a citizen of a state against hostile legislation by his own state (Duncan v. Missouri, 162 U. S. 377; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed., 489 and note) yet in the subsequent portion of the amendment we find language used of a more comprehensive character. The words to which we refer are "nor shall any state . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The constitutional prohibition we are considering is but a crystallization of a principle that all who regard justice recognize as fundamental. The authority of municipalities to grant franchises, and the authority of private corporations to be such, and to thereby become such artificial entities that they may receive such grants, have their origin in the laws of the state; and municipalities lack the power to authorize arbitrary and burdensome discriminations as between their inhabitants in the conduct of a business that is public in its character, and private corporations lack the authority to receive such grants, because the general assembly that may be said to be the parent of both classes of corporations, had no such power to transmit. The Supreme Court of the United States has spoken in no uncertain terms upon this general subject. Thus, in Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 346, 25 L. ed. 676, 679, the court said: "We have said the prohibitions of the 14th Amendment are addressed to the states. They are: 'No state shall make or enforce a law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States . . . nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.' They have reference to actions of the political body denominated a state, by whatever instruments or in whatever modes that action may be taken. A state acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the state, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a state government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and, as he acts in the name and for the state, and is clothed with the state's power, his act is that of the state. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the state has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade it. The constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons, and, to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights, power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a state, but upon the persons who are the agents of the state in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured." To the same effect, see Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 38 L. ed. 896, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1108; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Taylor, 86 Fed. 168. An even more specific application of this general doctrine to the case before us is found in Elliott, Roads & Streets, 2d ed. § 430. It is there said: "It is not in the power of a state to enact any statute which operates to deny to citizens the equal protection of the laws. What the state cannot do directly it cannot authorize any of its instrumentalities to do. The inhibition contained in the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution extends to acts of state municipalities assuming to act under a state statute."

There can be no doubt that appellee's relator is entitled to insist that such ordinance did not warrant an unjust discrimination against him. While the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution does not protect individuals against the acts of third persons not acting under authority of the state, yet we deem it clear that appellant, having engaged in a business of a public character by governmental authority, was bound to afford appellee's relator the right to use gas without fixing terms for the privilege that were substantially more burdensome than it exacted of its patrons generally in the town of Thorntown. It was competent for appellant to require all of its patrons in said town to pay for the gas they respectively burned on a meter basis, as provided in the ordinance; but, if such meter rate was substantially higher than the flat rate, then appellant could not exact payment on the former basis from relator alone. It is clear, however, that it is not enough for relator to show that he is required to pay for gas in a manner different from that in which others pay, in a case where the ordinance purports to authorize the company so to require. An unlawful discrimination must be in some measure unjust and oppressive. It is difficult to accumulate a large number of authorities upon this subject. There are many cases in which recognition is given, arguendo, to the doctrine we assert, but they generally refer to these elements in too general terms to make their citation entirely apposite. The most direct authority that we have been able to find is that of Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Closser, 126 Ind. 348, 354, 9 L. R. A. 764, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 387, 26 N. E. 159, 161, where Elliott, J., in the course of a carefully written opinion, speaking on behalf of this court, said: "In the case upon which we are commenting, a recovery was adjudged on the ground that the difference in the rate charged shippers of large quantities of goods and that charged shippers of small quantities was so gross as to be against public policy. We have no such question here. So far as concerns the question of the right to discriminate between shippers, we concur with the general doctrine of the case cited, for we have no doubt that an unjust, unfair, or oppressive discrimination is prohibited by the soundest considerations of public policy; but, as we have already suggested, we do not believe that from the sole fact that there is a discrimination a conclusion can be inferred which invalidates the special contract between the carrier and the shipper, for, to warrant such a conclusion without defying principle, another element must be added to the premises, and that element is this: The discrimination is unjust or oppressive." We are not judicially advised, and the special findings of fact do not show, that under the terms fixed by the ordinance the use of natural gas on a meter basis would cost more than the flat rate. On the contrary, it seems to us that the inference is, since the optional provision as to the method of charging was agreed to by the town trustees, whose duty it was to represent the citizens of the town, that the rates are approximately equal. If they are unequal, we have no doubt that the fact would be susceptible of proof. Scientific observation must have been such that it can be determined with approximate accuracy what number of cubic feet of gas would flow through a particular meter per hour, under a given pressure.

For the reason shown in this opinion, the special findings of fact did not authorize the conclusions of law drawn by the trial court. We have concluded, however, as a matter of justice, not to order said court to restate its conclusions of law, but to reverse the judgment, with directions to the said court to grant a new trial, and to grant leave to the parties to amend their respective pleadings, if they apply for leave so to do.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant a new trial, and to otherwise proceed in conformity to this opinion.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

C. M. ROBERTS, Appt.,

v.

J. W. PARKER, Sheriff.

(.....Iowa.....)

A bicycle used by a painter, paper hanger, and billposter to earn a livelihood is within the provisions of a statute exempting from execution the team of a laborer who is the head of a family, and the wagon or other vehicle by the use of which he habitually earns his living, although the bicycle was not known when the statute was enacted.

(Ladd, Ch. J., and Waterman, J., dissent.)

(May 31, 1902.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Floyd County in favor of defendant in a replevin suit to recover possession of a bicycle upon which defendant had levied an execution. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert Eggert, for appellant:

That a bicycle is classed as a vehicle is now universally conceded.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 16.

That a painter, paper hanger, and billposter is a laborer, is self-evident.

In case a laborer habitually earns his living by the use of a vehicle,—say, for instance, a delivery wagon,—without the help of a “beast of burden and the necessary tackle,” this delivery wagon should be exempt.

Williams v. Poor, 65 Iowa, 410, 21 N. W. 753; State v. Myers, 10 Iowa, 448; State v. Brandt, 41 Iowa, 593; Boyles v. McMurry, 55 Ill. 236.

Mr. J. W. Brown, for appellee:

No vehicle whatever is exempt unless it is exempted in connection with the beast of burden and proper harness or tackle.

State v. Smith, 46 Iowa, 673; Ellsworth v. Sayre, 67 Iowa, 449, 25 N. W. 699.

To add any other vehicle than the one pointed out by the statute would be to add a new class, and this court cannot add a new class to this statute.

When it was passed, there was not a bicycle in the state, and not until it had existed twenty-five years or more were bicycles recognized.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 15.

Ladd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The assignments of error attached to the abstract were totally insufficient, but subsequently an amendment thereto was filed, specifically pointing out the errors alleged. As these had been clearly indicated in the appellant's argument, and fully met in the appellee's brief, no prejudice could have resulted from the delay. For this reason the motion to dismiss must be overruled.

2. Is a bicycle, habitually used by a painter, paper hanger, and billposter to earn a livelihood, he being the head of a family, exempt from execution? Section 4008 of the Code, in so far as applicable, reads: “If the debtor is . . . the head of a family he may hold exempt from execution, . . . if a physician, public officer, farmer, teamster, or other laborer, a team consisting of not more than two horses or mules, or two yoke of cattle, and the wagon or other vehicle, with the proper harness or tackle by the use of which he habitually earns his living, otherwise one horse.” That plaintiff was a laborer within the meaning of this section is not questioned. As certainly the bicycle is a vehicle. The decisions so holding are too numerous for citation. But is it a vehicle such as was contemplated by the legislature in enacting the statute? It is well settled that statutes of exemption should receive a liberal construction, such as shall aid, in so far as may be, in carrying out the beneficent object of the legislation (Davis v. Humphrey, 22 Iowa, 137; Consolidated Tank-Line Co. v. Hunt, 83 Iowa, 6, 12 L. R. A. 476, 48 N. W. 1057); and they are to be construed in favor of those claiming their benefits (Bevan v. Hayden, 13 Iowa, 122; Kaiser v. Scaton, 62 Iowa, 463, 17 N. W. 664). Because of the liberal construction usually given a statute of this character, the majority of the court hold that a bicycle is included in the term “other vehicle,” as found in the section quoted. While it was not in use, or even known, in the state at the time of such enactment, they are of opinion that the law should keep pace with progress and improvement in the industrial arts, and that the bicycle should be adjudged exempt to a laborer who is the head of a family, and habitually uses it to earn a living. On the other hand, the writer, with whom concurs Mr. Justice

Waterman, while conceding the force of these suggestions, reaches a different conclusion. Precisely what may be claimed as exempt is enumerated in the statute, and nothing is to be added. Tyler v. Coulthard, 95 Iowa, 705, 64 N. W. 681. Especially a new class ought not to be added. The wagon is mentioned in connection with the animals enumerated, and all with relation to the harness or tackle. Why was this done? For the reason, as it seems to us, that all were essential and ordinarily used in making up an outfit for the purposes of transportation. Certainly, a wagon would be of no benefit in earning a living without one or more animals, and these could hardly be made use of without a harness or tackle of some kind. A working outfit was intended. For what purpose? By the use of which to earn a living. If right in this, then it seems that the "other vehicle" contemplated must have been one of like character; that is, one which may be used in connection with some of the animals enumerated and the harness or tackle. See 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 278. If this be not true, anything within the definition of "vehicle" may be exempt, such as an electric car or automobile, regardless of the value of either. To so hold would, as it seems to us, do violence to the spirit, as well as the letter, of the statute, in which the horse is recognized as the means of transportation, in the absence of the outfit referred to. Under the contention of appellant, both a bicycle and a horse, without the other of the property mentioned, could be held as exempt. See Smith v. Horton, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 28, 46 S. W. 401; Shadewald v. Phillips, 72 Minn. 520, 75 N. W. 717. In the opinion of the majority of the court, however, the plaintiff should have been awarded judgment for the return of his bicycle as exempt from execution.

Reversed.

MISSOURI, KANSAS, & TEXAS RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err., v.

S. SIMONSON et al.

*1. The provision of chapter 100, Laws 1893, which makes the specification of weights in bills of lading issued by railroad companies for hay, grain, etc., shipped over their lines conclusive evidence of the correctness of such weights, is unconstitutional because denying to the companies due process of law, and because wrongfully depriving the courts of the judicial power to determine the weight and sufficiency of evidence.

2. The statute cited is a measure in exercise of the police power of the state, and does not assume to regulate commerce between the states. It is not, therefore, repugnant to the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and, being a police regulation, the provision contained in it, allowing an attorney's fee for the successful prosecution of a case within its terms, is constitutional.

Dexter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action against the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company to recover for a shortage of hay shipped over its line. Judgment went against it, to reverse which it has prosecuted error to this court.

The action was brought under chapter 100, Laws 1893. The statute requires railroad companies to provide track scales for weighing car-load lots of hay, grain, etc., and to issue duplicate bills of lading for the shipment. It makes the companies responsible for the full amount of such shipment, less one fourth of 1 per cent of its weight, and it concludes its 6th section with the following provision: "And in any action hereafter brought against any railroad company, for or on account of any failure or neglect to deliver any such grain, seed, or hay to the consignee, or his heirs or assigns, either duplicate of such bill of lading shall be conclusive proof of the amount of such grain, seed, or hay so received by such railway company." In defense to the action the railway company offered a deposition which tended to prove that the full amount of hay receipted for in the bills of lading had not been in fact received by it. This deposition was rejected, and its rejection constitutes the principal claim of error. A majority of the court are of the opinion that it was wrongly rejected so far as the question now to be noticed is concerned, and we are all of the opinion that it was wrongly rejected so far as another question, presently to be noticed, is concerned. The argument against its admission is based on the statutory provision above quoted, which makes the bill of lading, in the cases stated, conclusive evidence of the amount received. Is it in the power of the legislature to thus create a conclusive presumption in a matter of private contract? We are constrained to believe that it is not. Every suitor is entitled to his day in court, and to have his case determined on such evidence as legal policy will allow. It is doubtless competent for the legislature to prescribe many of the rules of evidence. The subjects of the competency of witnesses, the order of trial, the burden of proof, the effect of public records, the certification of copies of official documents, the prima facie character of certain evidence, and other like matters which pertain to the practice rather than the right of proving causes, are lawfully within the sphere of legislative regulation; but it is not within the power of the legislature to exclude from the courts that which proves the truth of a case, nor, on the other hand, to compel them to receive that which is false in character. A bill of lading contains two parts,—one, a receipt for the goods; the other, a contract for their carriage. As to the latter, it, as other written engagements, may not be contradicted by parol, but as to the former it stands on the same footing as other kinds of receipts. It may be shown to be incorrect. It may be shown to have been written by mistake or induced by fraud. Hutchinson, Carr. 2d ed. § 122. From time immemorial the mutual mistake of both parties to an instrument or the fraud of one of them has been admitted as a valid defense to the action. The allowance of such defense is a part of the substantive justice of all actions on contracts. It inheres in the very right of such cases, and it cannot be denied by the legislature under the guise of a rule of evidence. In Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 453, it is said: "But there are fixed bounds to the power of the legislature over this subject which cannot be exceeded. As to what shall be evidence, and which party shall assume the burden of proof in civil cases, its authority is practically unrestricted, so long as its regulations are impartial and uniform; but it has no power to establish rules which, under pretense of regulating the presentation of evidence, go so far as altogether to preclude a party from exhibiting his rights. Except in those cases which fall within the familiar doctrine of estoppel at the common law, or other cases resting upon the like reasons, it would not, we apprehend, be in the power of the legislature to declare that a particular item of evidence should preclude a party from establishing his rights in opposition to it. In judicial investigations the law of the land requires an opportunity for a trial; and there can be trial if only one party is suffered to produce his proofs. The most formal conveyance may be a fraud or a forgery; public officers may connive with rogues to rob the citizen of his property; witnesses may testify or officers certify falsely, and records may be collusively manufactured for dishonest purposes; and that legislation which would preclude the fraud or wrong being shown, and deprive the party wronged of all remedy, has no justification in the principles of natural justice or of constitutional law." In Arkansas a statute was enacted which, according to a certain theory of construction, imposed upon railroad companies an absolute liability to pay for stock killed by their trains, and withdrew from the jury all considerations of negligence of the owner of the stock or due care on the part of the company. The court held that such theory of construction could not be applied, notwithstanding the language of the act lent some countenance to it, because, as was said: "It is not within the province of the legislature to divest rights by prescribing to the courts what should be conclusive evidence. . . . 'The legislature may declare what shall be received as evidence, but it cannot make that conclusively true which may be shown to be false,—at all events, if such facts are necessary to show that the substantial rights of property are to be affected, and he is made to lose his property.'" Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Payne, 33 Ark. 816, 34 Am. Rep. 55. In Minnesota a statute was enacted which made the fact that a person performed labor or furnished material in the erection of a house on another's land conclusive evidence that the labor was performed or the material furnished with the owner's consent, unless the latter had by suit in the courts enjoined the act as a trespass. Of this act the court said: "A man cannot be thus deprived of his property without his consent. The legislature may doubtless establish rules of evidence; but to enact a law making evidence conclusive which is not so necessarily in and of itself, and thus preclude a party from showing the truth, would be nothing short of confiscation of property, and a destruction of vested rights, without due process of law." Meyer v. Berlandi, 39 Minn. 438, 1 L. R. A. 777, 40 N. W. 513. An act of Congress in 1862, in relation to enlistments in the military service of the United States, provided that "the oath of enlistment taken by the recruit shall be conclusive as to his age." In an action of habeas corpus brought by the parent or guardian of a minor recruit it was held that the statute was not binding on the petitioner as establishing a conclusive presumption of age, for the reason that the declaration as to age was a "judicial act," a matter for judicial inquiry, from entering on which the courts could not be precluded. Wantlan v. White, 19 Ind. 470. The legislature of Minnesota enacted a statute providing that the schedule of rates for the transportation of property over the railroads of that state, made and published by the board of railroad and warehouse commissioners, should be final and conclusive as to what were equal and reasonable charges. The Supreme Court of the United States held the act void. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 462, 702. A statute of this state assuming to authorize counties to pay bounties for the killing of gophers was held unconstitutional for the reason that the subject had not been expressed in its title. Later, a statute was enacted, probably intended to be curative of the authority exercised under the former one, but which was so worded as to validate the mere ministerial act of issuing the warrants in payment of the bounty only, and not the original authority to issue them. The warrants so issued were declared "hereby legalized and hereby made county charges and payable out of the general fund of the county." This so-called "curative act" was held to be in the nature of a legislative judgment against the county in favor of the holders of the warrants, an endeavor to preclude investigation into the rightfulness of their issuance, and therefore a usurpation of the judicial function to try and determine causes, and consequently void. Felix v. Wallace County, 62 Kan. 832, 62 Pac. 667. The theory on which all these cases proceed is that an act of the legislature which undertakes to make a particular fact or matter in evidence involving the substantive right of the case conclusive upon the parties, and which precludes inquiry into the meritorious issues of the controversy, is an invasion of the judicial province and a denial of due process of law. The legislature may regulate the form and the manner of use of the instruments of evidence,—the media of proof,—but it cannot preclude a party wholly from making his proof. A statute which declares what shall be taken as conclusive evidence of a fact is one which, of course, precludes investigation into the fact, and itself determines the matter in advance of all judicial inquiry. If such statutes can be upheld, there is then little use for courts, and small room indeed for the exercise of their functions.

It will be observed that the statute in question by its terms shuts out all proof as to the occurrence of fraud or mistake in the making of the bill of lading. Admitting, however, that of necessity there must be read into the act an exception against fraud, why should there not be an exception in favor of mistake as well, for, if the bill of lading was executed by the mutual mistake of both parties, it does not evidence the contract of either one. In order to constitute a contract, the minds of the parties thereto must have met. If by reason of mutual mistake no such concurrence has been had, it follows that no contract has been entered into, notwithstanding the fact that written evidence of one may have been executed. Therefore, to give effect to the act in question, we must say that the legislature has the power to force contracts upon parties by making indisputable that which in reality is only evidence of their contract. It is hard to see where this would end were its entrance admitted. Of course, the contracts of parties are binding on them. It does not require an act of the legislature to make them so. It is the function of the court, and not of the legislature, to determine when contracts exist, and what they are. To shut out proof that what purports to be a contract is not really such, by reason of the mutual mistake of the parties thereto, is in effect to require the performance of an act which was never agreed on between them; or, in other words, it is to allow the legislature to make for parties a contract which they never made for themselves. It is claimed that this sort of legislation is defensible and proper under the law of estoppel, and that, where the parties have entered into the seeming contract, they may be prohibited by the terms of their act from denying its effect as written. The trouble, however, lies in the application of the rule of estoppel, and in the assumption that the bill of lading speaks the contract of the parties. Whether it does is the very question at issue,—the very question on which the plaintiff in error sought to offer evidence. If the writing was not the expression of the contract of the parties to it by reason of mutual mistake or fraud, then how could either be estopped by it? Estoppel is only predicated of contracts which parties have really made. We do not intend to rule that there are no classes of acts or contracts that may not be made conclusive upon the parties thereto by the legislature, but we do intend to hold that it is incompetent for the legislature to make that conclusive of the fact and character of a contract which does not in reality express a contract because of fraud or mistake that may inhere therein.

There was error, also, for another reason, in rejecting the deposition. The evidence offered was to the effect that the cars in which the hay was shipped were sealed at the loading point, and that the seals were found unbroken at the point of destination. Had this evidence been admitted, it would have tended to prove that whatever hay the company received it safely transported, and, inasmuch as the plaintiffs claimed that the company received the amount receipted for in the bills of lading, the evidence therefore tended to prove that the same amount was transported and delivered. For this reason the deposition should have been admitted, and therefore its rejection was error.

The claim is made that the statute heretofore discussed is in violation of the interstate commerce clause of the Federal Constitution. This claim is untenable. It does not regulate rates, nor levy taxes, nor impose restrictions of any kind on commerce between the states. It is a police regulation designed to promote accuracy in dealings between shippers and carriers by compelling the latter to furnish facilities for ascertaining the weight of products offered for shipment. A statute in Texas imposed a penalty on railroad companies for refusing to deliver freight on demand of the consignee and tender of the charges. It was contended that as to shipments originating in other states the act was a regulation of interstate commerce, and could not have effect. The contention was overruled. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dwyer, 75 Tex. 572, 7 L. R. A. 478, 12 S. W. 1001. A statute of Iowa required railroad companies to post their schedules of transportation rates in their station houses, and affixed penalties to the nonperformance of the duty. The act, although applying to interstate as well as local rates, was held not to be a regulation of interstate commerce. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. ed. 710. The principle on which these cases rest—vis., that such enactments were police regulations—likewise underlies the statute in question.

The statute allows an attorney's fee for the successful prosecution of a case under its provisions. The reason for this is the negligence of the carrier in failing to safely transport and deliver the goods committed to its charge. The case in that respect comes fully within the principle of Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 58 Kan. 447, 49 Pac. 602, Affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609. See also British America Assur. Co. v. Bradford, 60 Kan. 82, 55 Pac. 335.

For error in rejecting the deposition for the reasons above given, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

Johnston, Cunningham, Greene, and Pollock, JJ., concur.

Dexter, Ch. J., and Smith and Ellis, JJ., dissent as to the first paragraph of the syllabus and corresponding portion of the opinion.

Dexter, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent from the judgment of the majority of the court that the legislature may not give to the receipt contained in a bill of lading issued by a common carrier a conclusive effect as evidence of the weight of the thing receipted for, and am authorized to say that Justices Smith and Ellis likewise dissent. A proposition in denial of the legislative power in the case stated is incomprehensible to me. There is not a case in the books which in principle or in similarity of facts affords ground for the majority opinion. The instances in which the exercise of the power in question has been attempted are not numerous. Nearly all of them were cases in which the legislature sought to give tax deeds a conclusive effect to establish the substantive rightfulness of tax-sale proceedings. This class of cases was not adverted to by the majority because of the obvious fact that in such cases the act from which it was sought to derive a conclusive effect was clearly the act of an adversary party, and the effort was to find those in which the legislature had exceeded its authority by undertaking to found a presumption of conclusiveness upon the act of the party himself. This could not be done. There are no such cases; that is, there are no cases in denial of the legislative right to found an estoppel upon the contract act of a party, and that—and it alone—is the case in hand. There are, however, decisions of a different character, which my associates have mistakenly regarded as authority for their holding. For instance, in one of them, as cited in the majority opinion, it appeared that the legislature had declared a conclusive presumption of negligence from the killing of live stock (Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Payne, 33 Ark. 816, 34 Am. Rep. 55); in another it declared a conclusive presumption of assent to a trespass from a failure to apply to the courts to enjoin it (Meyer v. Berlandi, 39 Minn. 438, 1 L. R. A. 777, 40 N. W. 513), in another it declared an officially published schedule of railway rates conclusive evidence of their reasonableness (Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. R. A. 970, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 209, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 702); and in another it sought to make a minor's declaration as to his age conclusive on his legal guardians (Wanlan v. White, 19 Ind. 470). It must be observed that, in the cases of the tax deeds and the schedule of railway rates and the minor's enlistment oath, the legislature sought to bind interested parties by the adversary action of others, not by any action of their own; and, in the cases of the imputed negligence and the imputed assent to the trespass, sought to bind them by accidental circumstances involving them in no manner of contractual relation. Manifestly, all such cases are to be governed by a principle different from that to be applied when it is sought to found the presumption on the conventional act or agreement of the party himself. I may well object to a law which from the hostile act of another seeks to raise against me a conclusive presumption, and I may well object to a law which seeks to found an estoppel against me upon some undesigned and easily explicable circumstance; but I can have no objection to a law which merely seeks to give to my own deliberate business engagement a conclusive and irrevocable effect.

Judge Cooley notes the distinction between the two classes of cases in the very quotation made from him in the majority opinion. In discussing the subject of the power of the legislature over the rules of evidence, he says: "Except in those cases which fall within the familiar doctrine of estoppel at the common law, or other cases resting upon the like reasons, it would not, we apprehend, be in the power of the legislature to declare that a particular item of evidence should preclude a party from establishing his rights in opposition to it." The legislature, therefore, in this case, has rested its enactment on the very exception noted by Judge Cooley, viz., estoppel or like reasons. The general doctrine upon which the exceptional class of cases rests was stated in another form by this court in the case of Re County-Seat of Linn County, 15 Kan. 500. A question in that case was as to the conclusiveness as evidence of the number of votes cast at a county-seat election to prove the total number of electors in the county. The Constitution (art. 9, § 1) declares that "no county seat shall be changed without the consent of a majority of the electors of the county." The statute regulating county-seat elections enacted that the place receiving the majority of the votes cast at the election should become the county seat. In view of the fact that the total of the votes cast at a county-seat election might not be equal to the whole number of electors of the county, the question as to what should be regarded as controlling evidence of the total number arose. It was held that the act providing for the change of county seats on a majority of the votes cast at the election declared a conclusive presumption as to the total electorate, and was a competent exercise of legislative power. The court said: "While a legislature may not, by the mere machinery of rules of evidence, override and set at naught the restrictions of the Constitution, or arbitrarily make conclusive evidence of a fact anything which in the nature of things has no connection with that fact nor reasonably tend to prove it, yet it may make that which, according to the ordinary rules of human experience, reasonably tends to prove a fact, conclusive evidence of it." The case of Felix v. Wallace County, 62 Kan. 832, 62 Pac. 667, is more nearly in support of the majority decision than any other case to be found. There is, however, a radical difference between that case and this one. In that case the legislature undertook to validate a particular specified class of instruments, contract in form, but which were wholly without binding force or legal existence. It undertook by legislative fiat to create a debt altogether and entirely out of that which possessed the mere semblance of a contract, but which lacked all the elements of an obligation. The act under discussion in this case undertook no such legally impossible thing. It did not undertake to create a debt. It did not undertake to make a contract between the parties. It only declared that the contract which they themselves had made should be conclusively presumed to express the obligation into which they had entered.

So far as decisions are concerned, the only one sufficiently close in point of fact to bear directly on the question is opposed to the theory of limitation on the legislative power in the special class of cases mentioned. It declares, I think, the correct principle, and is entirely applicable to the present controversy. It is Orient Ins. Co.

v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. ed. 552, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281. A statute of Missouri declared that "in all suits brought upon policies of insurance against loss or damage by fire, hereafter issued or renewed, the defendant shall not be permitted to deny that the property insured thereby was worth at the time of the issuing of the policy the full amount insured therein on said property; and in case of total loss of the property insured, the measure of damage shall be the amount for which the same was insured," etc. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 5897. This provision, it will be observed, is the ordinary "valued policy" law of this and other states. In the case cited the objections to the statute were the same as those urged against the one now under consideration. The court stated them as follows: "The specific objections which, it is claimed, bring the statute within the prohibition of the Constitution, in the last analysis, may be reduced to the following: That the statute takes away a fundamental right, and precludes a judicial inquiry of liability on policies of fire insurance by a conclusive presumption of fact." Replying to this, the court, among other things, said: "It [the statute] makes no contract for the parties. In this it permits absolute freedom. It leaves them to fix the valuation of the property upon such prudence and inquiry as they choose. It only ascribes estoppel after this is done,—estoppel, it must be observed, to the acts of the parties, and only to their acts in open and honest dealing. Its presumptions cannot be urged against fraud. . . . The cases cited by plaintiff in error which hold that the legislature may give the effect of prima facie proof to certain acts, but not conclusive proof, do not apply. They were not of contract, nor gave effect to contracts. It is one thing to attribute effect to the convention of parties, entered into under the admonition of the law, and another thing to give to circumstances, maybe accidental, conclusive presumption and proof to establish and force a result against property or liberty." The above decision was rendered on error to the supreme court of Missouri, which had made a similar holding (Daggs v. Orient Ins. Co. 136 Mo. 382, 35 L. R. A. 227, 38 S. W. 85), and I think it well declares and elucidates the proposition that it is within the power of the legislature to give to the written declaration of a party, made as a basis for mutual engagement between himself and another, a conclusive and irrevocable character.

An objection to the statute is the generality of its terms. It does not state any exception, and it is said that fraud and mistake constitute necessary exceptions which it is beyond the power of the legislature to exclude. This objection does not seem to me to possess weight. As to fraud, I think it may be said that statutes, however general their language, are never to be so construed or enforced as to deny relief to one who, without fault on his part, has been entrapped into a seeming submission to their terms. "When statutes are made, there are some things which are exempted and fore-prized out of the provisions thereof, by the law of reason, though not expressly mentioned. Thus, things for necessity's sake, or to prevent a failure of justice, are excepted out of statutes." Dwarrris, Stat. rule 5, p. 123. To the same effect, and with citation to instances, is Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 258; and in Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. ed. 552, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, it was expressly held that a conclusive presumption of fact, declared by statute, as in this case, could not be enforced as against a claim of fraud. As to mistake, the legislature has done no more than the courts themselves have done in like cases without the aid of statutes,—has declared a rule of estoppel by deed. It is true, the courts have not elevated a mere receipt to the grade of an estoppel, but they have often held other like written engagements and declarations of the existence of facts to be such. This has been especially true when one of the contracting parties has done or paid something as a consideration or equivalent for the engagement or declaration. This case, for aught we know, may be one falling within the rule, because here the shipper may have paid freight money on the basis of weight specified in the bill of lading. But admitting, as should be done, that the courts have not advanced the doctrine of estoppel to cover such class of cases, ought it to be said that the legislature is constitutionally powerless to do so,—that is, powerless to make that conclusive evidence which the courts themselves hold to be presumptive evidence; powerless for the sole reason that some instances of meritorious defense on the ground of mistake will be shut out? If we were required to search for reasons for the enactment in question we would not have to go far. The reason is to be found in the character of railways as common carriers. The relations existing between the public and the carriers make the regulation of the latter in many particulars not merely advisable, but highly important. It cannot be said, therefore, that a statute forbidding the carrier to dispute in court a written admission made by it as a basis of contract liability is an unwarranted exercise of legislative power. It must be borne in mind that the business of a common carrier is one which is "clothed with a public interest." That was pithily remarked by Sir Matthew Hale nearly 400 years ago. It was quoted by the Supreme Court of the United States in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, and made the basis of the decision in that case and in many subsequent ones decided by that and other courts.

Now, premitting the question as to the power of the legislature to found a conclusive presumption upon the admissions of private individuals, it cannot be doubted, in my judgment, that it possesses the power to declare that a receipt for goods, given by a transportation company in the conduct of its public business as a common carrier, shall be conclusively deemed and held to express the measure of the liability incurred. In denying that the legislature possesses such power I think my associates have grievously erred.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

George W. HULL.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Mental suffering may be considered in assessing the damages against a carrier for breach of its contract to transport a corpse.
2. The question as to the negligence of a carrier in failing to forward a corpse by a certain train is for the jury.
3. The sum of $1,640 is excessive damages for failure to forward a corpse by a certain train, whereby its interment was delayed from afternoon until the next morning, where its condition did not render speedy interment necessary, and the person complaining was treated with proper courtesy.
4. The pleadings should not be referred to by counsel in his closing argument to the jury for the purpose of claiming a change in the theory of defense, if they have not been given in evidence on the trial.
5. Counsel in arguing to the jury must not state facts of his personal experience, which are not in evidence, and are calculated to prejudice the jury.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Webster County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for failure to promptly transport a corpse. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mcscrs. Yeaman & Yeaman, for appellant:

There can be no property in a human corpse.

Keyes v. Konkel, 119 Mich. 550, 44 L. R. A. 242, 78 N. W. 649.

There can be no recovery for mental anguish alone, disconnected from pecuniary loss, physical injury, wilful neglect, or insult.

A different rule originated in Texas in So Relle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 55 Tex. 308, 40 Am. Rep. 805, where damages were awarded for failure to deliver a social telegram. The courts of that state have since found it necessary to restrict the rule.

See Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 564, 46 Am. Rep. 278; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper, 71 Tex. 507, 1 L. R. A. 728, 9 S. W. 598; Rowell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 75 Tex. 26, 12 S. W. 534.

This court has followed the So Relle Case, but has confined the rule to that particular class of cases (social telegrams), and, like the Texas court, has found it necessary to restrict its application.

The damages are grossly excessive, and more than this court has approved of in any "social telegram" case,—the only other sort of case in which damages for mental suffering alone have been given.

Hobson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The wife of appellee, G. W. Hull, died at Ashville, North Carolina, on May 26, 1900. He lived at Slaughtersville, Kentucky, and started home with the corpse of his wife. He bought tickets to Nashville for himself, child, and the corpse. About sunup, as he was approaching Nashville, he saw the conductor, and had him telegraph to the ticket agent at Nashville to have the tickets ready for him. He did this for fear of want of time between the arrival of his train and the departure of the train for Slaughtersville. When he got to Nashville he went immediately with his little girl to the ticket office, and told the agent he wanted two whole tickets and a half ticket to Slaughtersville. The agent said to him to get back in line, and wait until his turn came. He said, "Didn't you get a telegram to have these tickets ready?" The agent answered, "Yes; but I knew you had plenty of time, and didn't get them ready." Hull then took his place in the line, and after a while got up to the window and received his tickets. He then said, "One of these tickets is for a corpse." The agent answered, "I know it, and have it already marked." Hull then asked, "What must I do with the corpse ticket?" The agent said, "Take that and show it to the baggage master in the baggage room." Hull went immediately to the baggage room, and handed the baggage master the corpse ticket, telling him he had a ticket for a corpse. The baggage master punched it and handed it back to him. Hull then said, "Now, who must I give it to?" He said, "Keep it and give it to the conductor on the train. That is all you have to do. You need not be uneasy. Everything will be all right." The corpse was then between the baggage-room door and the gate, setting on a truck between the door and the fence on the platform. Hull got on the train, and sat there some minutes. Presently he saw his trunk pass to the baggage car, and, not seeing the corpse go by, went out to the conductor, who was standing beside the train, showed him his tickets, and told him he had a ticket for a corpse, and wanted to be sure that everything was all right. He wanted to know who to give the ticket to. The conductor said: "That is all right. Whenever you get a ticket like that, that is all you have got to do. I will take that ticket up on the train." Hull replied: "I am uneasy. I am afraid everything isn't all right. I have seen my trunk pass along, but I haven't seen the corpse." Then the conductor halloed to the porter, and asked if there was a corpse on the train. The porter said, "No." The conductor ran into the baggage room to see about it. He was gone probably two minutes, and when he came out the train started immediately. He came into the coach where Hull was, and told him that his wife's remains had been sent off on the Northwestern. Hull said: "How did this happen? This is an awful thing." He said: "I don't know. It is a terrible blunder. It is an inexcusable mistake." Hull asked what he was going to do about it, and he said that he would telegraph to the superintendent, and get the box brought back and sent up on another train. At Earlington he brought Hull a telegram, stating that he had found the corpse; had secured it on some other road; that it would be sent up on the first passenger train; and for him to extend to Hull any courtesies he could. Hull reached Nashville at 6:40 A. M. The train for Slaughtersville left at 7:10 A. M. The conductor was still looking for the corpse, when he was ordered by the station master to pull out, as it was then two minutes past leaving time. The box containing the corpse had tacked upon it a card reading: "Mrs. G. W. Hull, Slaughtersville, Kentucky." Hull had telegraphed to Slaughtersville that he would come on the morning train, and have the burial that evening. The train was due at Slaughtersville at noon. They got everything in readiness for the funeral, and, when the train arrived without the corpse, the relatives who had come to the station returned home, and those who had come to the church for the funeral, 3 miles in the country, were sent home. Some time after midnight the corpse reached Slaughtersville, and it was buried the next day. It rained the next morning, and a great many did not come. Quite a concourse had assembled the day before. Hull had been nursing his sick wife six months. His vitality was much exhausted, and he was in a weakened condition, so that it was only by a strong effort of the will that he was able to be on his feet. He seemed a good deal confused, looked like he was almost broken down, and was terribly worried over his trip, and the way he had been disappointed. He filed this suit to recover damages of the railroad company, and proved on the trial substantially the above facts. The proof for the company was to the effect that when the corpse reached Nashville it was placed on a truck by the side of the train, and remained there until after the Slaughtersville train left. After this it was taken to the baggage room of the road over which it had come, and later in the day, when the mistake was found out, was taken over to the baggage room of appellant. The baggage master and the conductor denied the statements of Hull given above, and testified that the corpse was not in charge of appellant's agents until after the train for Slaughter'sville had left. Their testimony is confirmed by a number of employees about the station. Hull's version of the transaction is confirmed by his little girl, by the punched marks in the corpse ticket, and some other circumstances. The jury to whom the case was submitted returned a verdict in favor of Hull for $1,640, and the defendant appeals.

The court instructed the jury that if, after Hull purchased the tickets, the box containing the corpse was placed in charge of the defendant in reasonable time for shipment on the train, and defendant agreed to ship it on that train, and negligently failed to do so, or if defendant had a reasonable time after receiving the corpse to ship it on the morning train by the exercise of proper diligence, and for the lack of such diligence it was not so shipped, and its arrival at Slaughter'sville was delayed on account thereof, they should find for the plaintiff such an amount in damages as would reasonably compensate him for the trouble, inconvenience, and cost caused by the delay, and they might also allow a reasonable amount for any mental anguish the plaintiff suffered by reason of the delay. But if he failed to inform the agents of the defendant as to the whereabouts of the corpse, or failed to notify them to put the same on the morning train for Slaughter'sville, the jury should find for the defendant, unless the defendant's baggage agent assured him when he punched his ticket that defendant would look after putting the corpse on the train. The jury were also told to find for the defendant if, after receiving the box, its agents did not have a reasonable time, by the exercise of proper diligence, to put it on the train and ship it to Slaughter'sville, and that they could in no event award anything to the plaintiff on account of the delay, inconvenience, or distress suffered by those who attended at the depot or graveyard, or who were prevented from attending the burial by the delay in the arrival of the corpse.

It is earnestly insisted for appellant that there is no property in a corpse (Keyes v. Konkell, 119 Mich. 550, 44 L. R. A. 242, 78 N. W. 649), and that mental suffering cannot be recovered for in a case of this character. In Hale v. Bonner, 82 Tex. 33, 14 L. R. A. 336, 17 S. W. 605, which was a suit for damages for delay in the shipment of a corpse, the court said: "We are unable to distinguish, in principle, this case from those in which recoveries against telegraph companies have been allowed for failure to deliver with promptness messages announcing the death or mortal illness of near relatives. Such cases are exceptional. As a rule, mental suffering is not an element of the damages which are recoverable for breach of a contract, or in an action for tort, founded upon a right growing out of a contract. Ordinarily the object in sending a telegraphic message announcing the death or sickness of a relative is to afford the person to be benefited the solace that may result from being present during the last illness of the relative, or attending his obsequies, as the case may be. The direct result of the failure to perform the duty of delivering the message being to deprive the person addressed of this solace, and to cause distress of mind, it is not unreasonable that he should have his compensation therefor." This case was followed in Wells, F. & Co.'s Express v. Fuller, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 610, 35 S. W. 824. The right to recover for mental anguish for failure to deliver a telegram in the class of cases referred to was upheld in Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265, 13 S. W. 880, and after reconsideration this case was adhered to in a number of recent cases. In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Vancleave, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 53, 54 S. W. 827, the court said: "It is probably in accordance with the views of a majority of the state courts that mental anguish and injured feelings alone, and unaccompanied with physical injury, do not furnish ground for recovery. But in this state the rule has been announced otherwise. . . . And so, likewise, a recovery in this class of cases can be had under the decisions in the states of Texas, Alabama, Indiana, Iowa, North Carolina, and Tennessee. It may be admitted that there are difficulties in the way of an exact measurement of such damages, but it does not seem to us that this is a sufficient reason why a negligent public carrier should escape with merely nominal damages. The same difficulty of accurately measuring such damages arises in cases of slander, breach of marriage contract, and in cases where mental suffering is accompanied with physical pain. If, as argued, the law does not deal generally with the feelings and emotions, it may be answered that here the parties themselves have contracted with respect to those very things, or at least have contracted with respect to those things which naturally affect the feelings and emotions." No sound distinction can be maintained between the Telegraph Cases and this case. They rest upon the principle that damages naturally resulting from a wrongful act, and fairly within the reasonable contemplation of the parties, may be recovered. The logic of appellant's position, if followed, would lead to the conclusion that if it had lost this corpse, however negligently, no action could be maintained, at least for any substantial recovery. For if there is no property in a corpse, and there can be no recovery for mental suffering for the failure to carry and deliver it at the proper time, then for a very great wrong there would be practically no remedy. The tenderest feelings of the human heart cluster about the remains of the dead. The duty of Christian burial is one which loving hands perform as a privilege. An indignity or wrong to a corpse is resented more quickly than a wrong to the living, and, if mental suffering may be recovered for in the one case, it is hard to see why it may not be recovered for in the other. The damages for the loss of a corpse and those for the delay in delivering it differ only in degree. In actions for breach of a marriage contract, damages for mental suffering are allowed because these are the natural result of the defendant's wrong, and in no other way can proper compensation for it be had. The same rule must apply in actions for negligence in carrying a corpse, if the carrier is to be held to proper responsibility in this class of cases. We therefore conclude that there was no error in the instructions of the court.

The question of negligence was for the jury, and, while the evidence was very conflicting, we do not feel at liberty to disturb the verdict on the ground that it is against the evidence.

It is earnestly insisted that the damages are excessive, and that the plaintiff's counsel was guilty of misconduct in his closing argument to the jury. The plaintiff was treated with proper courtesy. There was only a delay in the interment of his wife's body from one afternoon until the next morning. The corpse remained at the baggage room from the time his train left until that evening, when it was put on the next train, and taken safely to Slaughter'sville. There is no intimation that the condition of the corpse rendered a speedy interment necessary. Appellant was not treated with indifference, but the conductor seems to have done all that he could; and, on all the evidence, it is hard to escape the conviction that the damages awarded are palpably excessive, and given under the influence of passion or prejudice. In making the closing argument to the jury, the attorney for the plaintiff commenced reading from the defendant's answer in the case, informing the jury that the defendant had entirely changed its theory of defense since it had taken its depositions, and that the plaintiff was not prepared to meet fully its present theory. On the objection of the defendant that this was a matter for the court alone, the court requested the attorney to desist from this course. Thereupon he proceeded with his speech by beginning to state the substance of the answer, and, on the objection of the defendant, the court again required him to desist. He then said the issues had been changed by the defendant. On the objection of the defendant, the court directed him to confine his discussion to the facts of the case, and the law as embodied in the instructions of the court, whereupon he said to the jury: "We have nothing in our pleadings that we wish to conceal from the jury. We do not have to ask the court to conceal our pleadings for us." All this was objected to, and the court refused to exclude it. It was improper. If it was desired to get before the jury the statements in the pleadings of the defendant, these pleadings should have been given in evidence on the trial, so that the defendant might have an opportunity to explain any inconsistency. When this was not done, they should not have been referred to in the concluding argument, which should have been confined to the evidence heard before the jury, and the law of the case as given in the instructions of the court. The attorney also said, in his concluding argument, this: "Time is precious with railroad companies sometimes. Mr. Hull telephoned me to meet him in Slaughter'sville to come here. I started there, and found that the Texas train was an hour late, and I was told that they had stopped the train at Louisville to load a negro minstrel show. I do not know this. I was told this. Stopped that train, wasted precious time, loading Ward & Howes' or some other negro minstrel show. That train carried the mail, too. That shows how railroads do. They are exceedingly accommodating when there is any money in sight. They will hold a train an hour for a negro minstrel show, but it could not hold its train three minutes to get a corpse on the train. There was no money in that." Again he said: "I am told that when a railroad company gets into trouble they get all their witnesses together to take their affidavits. I am no railroad lawyer. I do not know this, but railroad lawyers tell me that they just have to do this to hold their witnesses to the mark,—to keep them from forgetting. Mr. Fisher and Mr. Summerhays doubtless gave their affidavits when this matter came up." Again he said: "If I had been at fault in this case, it was in asking so little damages. Mr. Hull and I visited Nashville to take depositions in the case. We were in the magnificent depot of defendant at Nashville (defendant's counsel suggested that defendant owned no depot in Nashville, to which he said that it is true he referred to the Central Station), which is more magnificent than Solomon's Temple. The ticket office there cost more than this courthouse, I reckon; and the doors of that station, more than plaintiff asked for his damages in this case, I imagine." All this the defendant objected to, and moved the court to exclude it from the jury, which was refused. It was improper for the attorney to go outside of the evidence heard by the jury, and the law of the case as given by the court. It was especially improper for him to state facts of his personal experience which had not been testified to, and were calculated to prejudice the jury against the defendant, or to swell the amount of the verdict. Considering the size of the verdict, in connection with the argument of the counsel, we are clearly of opinion that a new trial should be granted.

It is certified in the bill of exceptions that it contains all of the evidence heard on the trial. This is conclusive, as the record is presented, that the bill contains all the evidence heard by the jury, although, from the grounds for new trial, it appears, complaint was made as to the reading of certain depositions, which are not incorporated in the bill of exceptions.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with directions to grant appellant a new trial.

(.....Ky.....)

The legislature cannot fix the salaries of firemen employed by municipalities, although there is no limitation on such power in the Constitution, since that is a matter of local government never delegated to the legislature.

(May 28, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fayette County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover salary alleged to be due plaintiff as a fireman. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. S. Bronston for appellant.

Messrs. Kinkead & Miller, for appellee:

It is now universally admitted to be the province, and indeed the duty, of the courts, in a proper case, to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional; at the same time it is nevertheless uniformly held to be a duty so delicate in its nature that it is "only to be entered upon with reluctance and hesitation."

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 193.

Where the fundamental law has not limited, either in terms or by necessary implication, the general powers conferred upon the legislature, we cannot declare a limitation, under the notion of having discovered something in the spirit of the Constitution upon a subject which is not even mentioned in that instrument.

Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 202-204; People ex rel. Smith v. Fisher, 24 Wend. 220; Oochran v. Van Surlay, 20 Wend. 381, 32 Am. Dec. 570; Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 145, 19 N. E. 224; Griswold v. Hepburn, 2 Duv. 24.

When a state law is attacked it is presumably valid in any case, and this presumption is a conclusive one, unless in the Constitution of the United States, or of the state, we are able to discover that it is prohibited.

Sill v. Corning, 15 N. Y. 303; Adams v. Hoice, 14 Mass. 340, 7 Am. Dec. 218.

Municipal corporations are mere creatures of the state, exercising governmental functions at its will, and within the limitations prescribed thereby. The state may withdraw these local powers of government at pleasure, and may, through its legislature or other appointed channels, govern the local territory as it governs the state at large. It may enlarge or contract its powers or destroy its existence.

The maxim that local concerns shall be managed in the local districts, which shall choose their own administrative and police officers, and establish for themselves police regulations, is subject to such exceptions as the legislative power of the state shall see fit to make, and when made, it must be presumed that the public interest, convenience, and protection are subserved thereby.

Du Relle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By the 4th section of an act amending the act for the government of cities of the second class, approved March 15, 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 15), it was provided: "The said fire department shall consist of one chief, whose salary shall not be less than $150 per month; the engineer's salary shall be $80 per month; the electrician's salary shall be $70 per month, and the ordinary fireman's salary shall be $65 per month." The appellee, Thompson, brought suit against the appellant, the city of Lexington, a city of the second class, alleging that he was a resident of that city, and employed by it as an ordinary fireman, having been appointed by the board of police and fire commissioners; that prior to the passage of the act his salary as fireman was $50 per month, and by that act was increased to $65 per month; that he continued to serve as ordinary fireman up to July 22, 1901, when he resigned; that from time to time he made demand upon the city for the increase of salary provided for by the act at the rate of $15 per month, which was refused. His prayer was for judgment for the difference between the salary paid him and that fixed by the act during the period from March 15, 1900, to July 22, 1901, aggregating $243.75. A demurrer to the petition was filed and overruled. The city stood by its demurrer, and judgment was rendered against it. The ground of the demurrer is that the act is violative of the right of local self-government by the city in a matter over which the municipality has exclusive control in its private or corporate capacity, and that the act is therefore void.

For appellee it is contended that the act does not violate any provision of the Constitution of the state, and therefore cannot be declared void because it is, or is supposed to be, in violation of the spirit which may be supposed to pervade that instrument. Mr. Cooley is quoted in support of this proposition: "If the courts are not at liberty to declare statutes void because of their

apparent injustice or impolicy, neither can they do so because they appear to the minds of the judges to violate fundamental principles of republican government, unless it shall be found that those principles are placed beyond legislative encroachment by the Constitution. The principles of republican government are not a set of inflexible rules, vital and active in the Constitution, though unexpressed, . . . nor are the courts at liberty to declare an act void because, in their opinion, it is opposed to a spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution, but not expressed in words." Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. pp. 202-204. Numerous other authorities are cited in support of the doctrine thus laid down, and among them the opinion of Chief Justice Robertson in Griswold v. Hepburn, 2 Duv. 24, where, after discussing the difference between the Federal Constitution as a grant of power and the state Constitution as a written limitation upon the powers of the legislative organ of the people, it is said: "But the same reason being inapplicable to state legislation of doubtful compatibility with a state Constitution, proper deference to the legislative department should preponderate in favor of the constitutionality of its acts, and require the judicial department to recognize them as laws, unless it shall be clearly satisfied that they are not. Whenever a jurist inquires whether a state statute is consistent with the state Constitution, he looks into that Constitution, not for a grant, but only for some limitation of the powers inherent in the people's legislative organ so far as not forbidden by their organic law." These general principles may be freely conceded. It is also urged that, as said by the Supreme Court in United States v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 17 Wall. 329, 21 L. ed. 600, a municipal corporation is not only a representative of the state, "but is a portion of its governmental power. It is one of its creatures, made for a specific purpose, to exercise within a limited sphere the powers of the state. The state may withdraw these local powers of government at pleasure, and may, through its legislature or other appointed channels, govern the local territory as it governs the state at large. It may enlarge or contract its powers or destroy its existence." These general statements of the legislative power over municipal affairs are always to be read in the light of the state of fact to which they are applied by the courts who give them utterance. Unless so read, they are apt, at times, to be misleading. In fact, the very authorities which thus state the general rule state also the limitations to be placed upon it. Speaking of the limitation upon legislative power, Judge Cooley says: "It does not follow, however, that in every case the courts, before they can set aside a law as invalid, must be able to find in the Constitution some specific inhibition which has been disregarded, or some express command which has been disobeyed. Prohibitions are only important where they are in the nature of exceptions to the general grant or power; and, if the authority to do an act has not been granted by the sovereign to its representative, it cannot be necessary to prohibit its being done." Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 203. So, Von Holst, Const. Law, 271, after stating the general rule that the legislative power of the state legislatures is unlimited so far as no limits are set to it by the Federal or state Constitution, proceeds: "This does not mean, however, that these restrictions must always be expressed in explicit words. As it is generally admitted that the factors of the Federal government have 'certain implied powers,' so it has never been disputed that the state legislatures are subject to 'implied restrictions;' that is, restrictions which must be deduced from certain provisions of the Federal or state Constitutions, or that arise from the political nature of the Union, from the genius of American public institutions." And in Meechem on Public Officers, § 123, it is said: "Indeed, this right of local self-government, as it has been briefly termed, is held to be an established feature and incident of our political system, and it is not within the power of the legislature of a state to permanently fill by appointment the local offices established by law for purely local purposes." See also Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 77. Said Mr. Edward Bates, in his argument in Hamilton v. St. Louis County Ct. (15 Mo. 13, cited with approval in Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 49), a constitution is "not the beginning of a community, nor the origin of private rights. It is not the fountain of laws, nor the incipient state of government. It is not the cause, but consequence, of personal and political freedom. It grants no rights to the people, but is the creature of their power, the instrument of their convenience, designed for their protection in the enjoyment of the rights and powers which they possessed before the Constitution was made. It is but the framework of the political government, and necessarily based upon the pre-existing condition of laws, rights, habits, and modes of thought. . . . A written constitution is, in every instance, a limitation upon the powers of government in the hands of agents." And Mr. Webster said: "Written constitutions sanctify and confirm great principles, but the latter are prior in existence to the former." A municipality is a state agency for governmental purposes. It exercises political governmental powers delegated by the state. As to such powers, and as to the duties which attach to their exercise in the administration of justice and the preservation of the public peace, it is imperium in imperio; a part of the governmental machinery of the commonwealth. Therefore its charter and legislative acts regulating the use of state property held by it do not constitute contracts within the meaning of the constitutional provision. Its political powers are not vested rights as against the state. As well said by Mr. McQuillin in a recent article upon the subject (34 Am. Law Rev. p. 506): "It is thus manifest that in matters of public concern, such as relate to the performance of functions by the city as the agent of the state, the legislature is not limited to conferring a discretionary power, but may exercise compulsory authority where the local officers or agencies neglect or refuse to discharge their public duty in providing for the public needs of the locality, or in voting or levying the proper taxes for public purposes. As to duties which the people in the several localities owe to the state at large, they cannot be allowed a discretionary authority to perform them or not, as they may choose, for such an authority would be wholly inconsistent with anything like regular and uniform government of the state."

The conceded legislative control over the exercise of these governmental functions has furnished the subject of numerous adjudications. What constitutional limitations, either express or implied, existed upon the exercise of this legislative control it is not necessary, nor is it our purpose, in this case to determine. But a municipal corporation is not merely a public agency of the state. Its governmental functions are not all the functions which it possesses or exercises. It is, in part, a corporation possessed of private franchises and rights, which it may exercise for its private, corporate advantage, for the benefit of the community, as distinct from the state government. It may hold and manage property, not for the benefit of the state, but to supply local needs and conveniences; and in respect thereto it acts as a private corporation, and in that capacity may sue and be sued. "With respect to its private or proprietary rights and interests," it is entitled to the protection of the Constitution, like other corporations. New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks Co. 142 U. S. 79, 35 L. ed. 943, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 142. Assuming that as to the governmental functions of a municipality the contention of appellee is true to its broadest extent, and that what the legislature gives to the municipality by its act of incorporation it may alter or destroy at pleasure, it does not at all follow that the rights and privileges of the local community, which become vested in the corporate entity created by the legislature for the benefit of the community, are likewise subject to the legislative control. The legislature cannot take away from the community rights or property which existed or were acquired without the aid of legislation. A municipality has a dual character. In its character as a state agency it exercises governmental, political, public, and administrative powers and duties. In its capacity as a private corporation it exercises rights and powers inherent in the people of the community, which have never been surrendered to any department of the government, and which are property rights within the protection of the Constitution. From the earliest courts to recognize this dual capacity of municipalities are those of Kentucky. The question arose 57 L. R. A.

upon a claim by the city of Louisville to exemption from state taxation. In that case (Louisville v. Com. 1 Duv. 297, 85 Am. Dec. 624) this court, through Judge Robertson, said: "But a municipal corporation, like a state, a county, or the city of Louisville, is much more than a person. While nominally a person, it is vitally a political power; and each, in its prescribed sphere, is imperium in imperio. All are constituent elements of one total sovereignty. The city of Louisville, to the extent of the jurisdiction delegated to it by its charter, is but an effluence from the sovereignty of Kentucky, governs for Kentucky, and its authorized legislation and local administration of law are legislation and administration by Kentucky through the agency of that municipality. The tax law of Kentucky constructively applies to persons only, and not at all to political bodies exercising in different degrees the sovereignty of the state. . . . And if, notwithstanding the specified exceptions, the public property of the state and counties is exempt, the same reason exempts the public property of Louisville used for carrying on its municipal government. But, so far as any of its property may be used, not for that purpose, but only for the convenience or profit of its citizens individually or collectively, this it owns and uses as a private corporation, and, like the property of all such corporations not expressly exempted, it is a legal subject of assessment for taxation. The more precise and distinctive test for classification is this: Whatever property, such as court house, prison, and the like, which became necessary or useful to the administration of the municipal government, and is devoted to that use, is exempt from state taxation; but whatever is not so used, but is owned and used by Louisville in its social or commercial capacity as a private corporation, and for its own profit, such as vacant lots, market-houses, fire engines, and the like, is subject to taxation." Mr. Dillon thus states the distinction: "The administration of justice, the preservation of the public peace, and the like, although confided to local agencies, are essential matters of public concern; while the enforcement of municipal by-laws proper, the establishment of gas works, of water works, the construction of sewers, and the like, are matters which pertain to the municipality as distinguished from the state at large." Mun. Corp. § 58. The Massachusetts court, recognizing the waterworks, markets, hospitals, cemeteries, libraries, and the system of parks of Boston as established "for the benefit of the public," declares them to be "held more like the property of a private corporation," and therefore protected from legislative interference. Mt Hope Cemetery v. Boston, 158 Mass. 519, 33 N. E. 695. And again, in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 12a (4th ed. § 15) it is said: "In many of its more important aspects a modern American city is not so much a miniature state as it is a business corporation; its business being wisely to administer the local affairs, and economically to expend the revenues of the incorporated community. As we learn this lesson, and apply business methods to the scheme of municipal government and to the conduct of municipal affairs, we are on the right road to better and more satisfactory results." In Nebraska the legislature passed an act establishing a board of police and fire commissioners, to be appointed by the governor, to whom there was given all powers and duties connected with the appointment, removal, and discipline of the members of the police and fire departments. It was there held (State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Moores, 55 Neb. 480, 41 L. R. A. 624, 76 N. W. 175, overruling a former decision) that the act was void. Said the court: "It is true that the state Constitution is not a grant of legislative power, and the lawmaking body may legislate upon any subject not inhibited by the fundamental law; but it by no means follows from this that the legislature is free to pass laws upon any subject unless in express terms prohibited by the Constitution. The inhibition on the power of the legislature may be by implication as well as by expression. Laws may be and have been declared invalid, although not repugnant to any express restriction contained in the fundamental law." To the same effect, see Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y. 459, 34 L. R. A. 408, 45 N. E. 15. The same conclusion was reached as to a similar law of Indiana in the cases of State ex rel. Jameson v. Denny, 118 Ind. 382, 4 L. R. A. 79, 21 N. E. 252; Evansville v. State ex rel. Blend, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93, 21 N. E. 267; and State ex rel. Holt v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, 21 N. E. 274. In the case first named the court said: "The construction of sewers in a city, the supply of gas, water, fire protection, and many other matters that might be mentioned, are matters in which the local community alone is concerned, and in which the state has no special interest; . . . and they are matters over which the people affected thereby have the exclusive control, and it cannot, in our opinion, be taken away from them by the legislature." In Western Sav. Fund. Soc. v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 183, 72 Am. Dec. 730, Chief Justice Lewis, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The supply of gaslight is no more a duty of sovereignty than the supply of water. Both these objects may be accomplished through the agency of individuals or private corporations, and in very many instances they are accomplished by these means. If this power is granted to a borough or a city, it is a special private franchise, made as well for the private emolument and advantage of the city as for the public good. The whole investment is the private property of the city, as much so as the lands and houses belonging to it. Blending the two powers in one grant does not destroy the clear and well-settled distinction, and the process of separation is not rendered impossible by the confusion. In separating them, regard must be had to the object of the legislature in conferring them. If granted for public purposes exclusively, they belong to the corporate body in its public, political, or municipal character. But if the grant was for purposes of private advantage and emolument, though the public may derive a common benefit therefrom, the corporation quoad hoc is to be regarded as a private company. It stands on the same footing as would any individual or body of persons upon whom the like special franchises have been conferred."

The distinction between the two capacities in which a municipality may act is nowhere better stated than in the two great opinions of Judge Cooley in People ex rel. Le Roy v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103, and People ex rel. Park Comrs. v. Detroit, 28 Mich. 228, 15 Am. Rep. 202. In the former case the question was as to the power of the legislature to appoint permanent officers for the full term, whose duties were purely municipal, and arose over an act which created and appointed a board of public works. In the opinion by Judge Cooley it was said: "In the case before us the officers in question involve the custody, care, management, and control of the pavements, sewers, waterworks, and public buildings of the city, and the duties are purely local. The state at large may have an indirect interest in an intelligent, honest, upright, and prompt discharge of them; but this is on commercial and neighborhood grounds, rather than political, and is not much greater or more direct than if the state line excluded the city. Conceding to the state the authority to shape the municipal organizations at its will, it would not follow that a similar power of control might be exercised by the state as regards the property which the corporation has acquired, or the rights in the nature of property which have been conferred upon it. There are cases which assert such power, but they are opposed to what seem to me the best authorities, as well as the soundest reason. The municipality, as an agent of government, is one thing; the corporation, as an owner of property, is in some particulars to be regarded in a very different light. . . . Constitutional freedom certainly does not consist in exemption from governmental interference in the citizen's private affairs; in his being unmolested in his family, suffered to buy, sell, and enjoy property, and, generally, to seek happiness in his own way. All this might be permitted by the most arbitrary ruler, even though he allowed his subjects no degree of political liberty. The government of an oligarchy may be as just, as regardful of private rights, and as little burdensome as any other; but if it were sought to establish such a government over our cities by law, it would hardly do to call upon a protesting people to show where in the Constitution, the power to establish it was prohibited. It would be necessary, on the other hand, to point out to them where and by what unguarded words the power had been conferred. Some things are too plain to be written. . . . The state may mold local institutions according to its views of policy or expediency; but local government is a matter of absolute right, and the state cannot take it away. It would be the boldest mockery to speak of a city as possessing municipal liberty where the state not only shaped its government, but, at discretion, sent in its own agents to administer it; or to call that system one of constitutional freedom under which it should be equally inadmissible to allow the people full control in their local affairs or no control at all." In the later case of People ex rel. Park Comrs. v. Detroit, the question was more nearly similar to that presented in the case at bar. It was the question of the legislative power to compel local improvements, which is practically the same question as here presented, viz., the legislative power to compel expenditure for a local purpose. The question, as stated in the opinion, was whether there rested upon the judiciary the duty, "by the compulsory process of this court, to coerce the city of Detroit into entering into contracts involving a debt for a very large sum for an object purely of local concern, which the legislative body of the city has refused to make." Said the court, through Judge Cooley: "In People ex rel. Le Roy v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 9 Am. Rep. 103, we considered at some length the proposition which asserts the amplitude of legislative control over municipal corporations, and we there conceded that, when confined, as it should be, to such corporations as agencies of the state in its government, the proposition is entirely sound. In all matters of general concern there is no local right to act independently of the state; and the local authorities cannot be permitted to determine for themselves whether they will contribute through taxation to the support of the state government, or assist, when called upon, to suppress insurrections, or aid in the enforcement of the police laws. Upon all such subjects the state may exercise compulsory authority, and may enforce the performance of local duties, either by employing local officers for the purpose, or through agents or officers of its own appointment. . . . But we also endeavored to show in People ex rel. Le Roy v. Hurlbut that, though municipal authorities are made use of in state government, and as such are under complete state control, they are not created exclusively for that purpose, but have other objects and purposes peculiarly local, and in which the state at large, except in conferring the power and regulating its exercise, is legally no more concerned than it is in the individual and private concerns of its several citizens. Indeed, it would be easy to show that it is not from the standpoint of state interest, but from that of local interest, that the necessity of incorporating cities and villages most distinctly appears. State duties of a local nature can, for the most part, be very well performed through the employment of the usual township and county organizations; so that if the state alone, in its corporate capacity, were to be regarded, the conferring of special corporate powers on cities and villages might very well be dispensed with. . . . The twofold character of these corporations, as organizations on the one hand for state purposes, and on the other for the benefit of the individual corporators, has invariably been recognized by this court wherever there has been occasion to refer to it. We also referred, in People ex rel. Le Roy v. Hurlbut, to several decisions in the Federal Supreme Court and elsewhere to show that municipal corporations considered as communities endowed with peculiar functions for the benefit of their own citizens, have always been recognized as possessing powers and capacities and as being entitled to exemptions distinct from those which they possess or can claim as conveniences in state government. If the authorities are examined, it will be found that these powers and capacities, and the interests which are acquired under them, are usually spoken of as private, in contradistinction to those in which the state is concerned, and which are called public, thus putting these corporations, as regards all such powers, capacities, and interests, substantially on the footing of private corporations. . . . But it cannot be contended that authority in the legislature to determine what shall be the extent of capacity in a city to acquire and hold property is equivalent to or contains within itself the authority to deprive the city of property actually acquired by legislative permission. As to the property it thus holds for its own private purposes, a city is to be regarded as a constituent in state government, and is entitled to the like protection in its property rights as any natural person who is also a constituent. The right of the state, as regards such property, is a right of regulation, and, though broader than exists in the case of individuals, is not a right of appropriation. The constitutional principle that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law applies to artificial persons as well as natural, and to municipal corporations in their private capacity, as well as to corporations for manufacturing and commercial purposes. And when a local convenience or need is to be supplied in which the people of the state at large, or any portion thereof outside the city limits, are not concerned, the state can no more, by process of taxation, take from the individual citizens the money to purchase it, than they could, if it had been procured, appropriate it to state use. To this extent the corporate right appears to us to be a clear and undoubted exception to the general power of control which is vested in the state.

It may be admitted that the line which distinguishes those matters with respect to which cities, as state agencies, exercise governmental functions from those as to which it acts in its private, corporate capacity, representing the people of the community, is not always well-defined. It may well be that, in cases in which it is difficult to ascertain to which class a right, a power, or a function should be assigned, the courts would hesitate to annul an attempted exercise of legislative power. But in cases in which the proper classification can be ascertained the courts should not, and do not, hesitate to act. Upon a question of this kind it is to be expected that under the varying provisions of various state constitutions, and with the different procedures and customs which obtained in the various states at and before the date of the adoption of those constitutions, there should be conflict in the authorities. For example, in some of the cases we have cited the systems devised for police and fire protection seem to have both been regarded as purely municipal and local, and therefore exempt from legislative interference. The better opinion as to police system seems to be that, inasmuch as the state is charged primarily with the preservation of public peace and the protection of life and property in the cities as well as in the rural districts, the city police is, in large measure at least, a part of the state constabulary, and its members perform the functions of state officials in the exercise of delegated state sovereignty. Therefore, in so far as the police systems of our cities form a part of the state government, they are subject to legislative control. And this control has been distinctly recognized by this court in Newmeyer v. Krakel, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 190, 62 S. W. 518. But between the police systems of municipalities and the fire departments there seems to be a manifest distinction, though many of the courts—as in Indiana, Nebraska, and California—have recognized the officers of both departments as purely municipal and local. The act in question does not undertake to deprive the local authorities of the power of appointment or selection of the fire commissioners, but only to regulate and fix the salaries of the officers and employees. It seems conceded that the establishment of fire departments by municipalities is a voluntary act of self-protection; that the municipality, on grounds of public policy, is not responsible for negligence of its fire department; and that the property of the fire department is held by the municipalities in their capacity of private corporations. We do not undertake to say that the state is devoid of power to take measures for the protection of the property of its citizens from fire. The question before us is whether the rate of payment of the employees of such a system, devised for the benefit of the local community, of no special interest or advantage to the state, except in so far as it is advantageous and beneficial to the community, is municipal or governmental in its nature. If the rate of pay to be fixed for such employees is governmental, then, also, is the variety of fire engines to be used, the size and breed of the horses which pull them, the number of fire plugs or cisterns to be established, and the personnel of the force. If the legislature can arbitrarily fix the rate of payment for such services at $65 per month, it can fix it at any other sum which it deems reasonable; and if fixing the pay of firemen is a governmental function because firemen render service in the preservation of the property of citizens of the commonwealth, then it is also a governmental function to fix absolutely the per diem of the street sweepers and the monthly wages of the janitors in the city hall. We do not think such legislative interference in a matter in which no one but the firemen and the taxpayers of the city can possibly be interested could have been in contemplation of the framers of our Constitution, or of the voters who sanctioned its adoption. If such a power is governmental, it is governmental also to fix the wages of every employee of every city, of whatever class. There were cities and towns before the Constitution was adopted. At the date of its adoption they were managing their own little local affairs. They were employing and paying the members of their fire departments, as in times gone by they had managed their own volunteer fire departments. The makers of the organic law—the voters whose ballots operated to enact it—voted for it with these facts before them, and they limited the time which might be devoted to legislation to sixty days in each two years. Is it conceivable that they expected or intended to permit the legislature to take charge of the petty salaries of every hamlet in the state? As said by Judge Olds in State ex rel. Holt v. Dewey, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, 21 N. E. 282: "Is it fair to presume that the people of the state, in the adoption of the Constitution, did not intend to surrender the right of self-government in so far as to allow the legislature to even take charge of the fire department of every town and city of the state, and to appoint officers to take charge of and manage the affairs of such department, and limit the legislative body to sixty-one days in every two years? We do not believe that such was the intention of the people at that time, nor do we believe that such is their understanding of the power of the legislature at the present time; nor is there any word or sentence in the Constitution granting such power." As said by Judge Cooley, "Some things are too plain to be written." The state has no interest in the property within a city or town, except such indirect interest as it has in the property of all its citizens. Since the organization of the state government, towns and cities have universally exercised the exclusive right of self-government in the control and repair of streets, alleys, and sidewalks, in the construction of sewers and waterworks, and the organization and control of fire departments. They have been held liable for damages resulting by reason of defects in sidewalks, streets, and sewers. All property within its corporate limits is liable for the payment of debts created by the municipality in providing these necessities to the municipality, and in which the people other than those residing within the particular town or city are in no way directly interested. We do not think the legislature can fix the salaries of firemen, any more than it can fix the pay of street sweepers, the drivers of ash carts; or fix the price per square yard which the citizen shall pay for an improvement of the public ways.

The doctrine stated in McDonald v. Louisville, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 271, 68 S. W. 413, are in full accord with the views here expressed.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer to the petition, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

KENTUCKY & INDIANA BRIDGE COMPANY'S RECEIVERS, Appts.,

v.

Anna MONTGOMERY.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A peremptory instruction for defendant cannot be given in an action against a railroad company operating a portion of its railroad bridge as a toll bridge, to recover for injuries to a traveler on the latter by negligently frightening his horse, where the evidence shows that while the horse was on the bridge it met a train having an engine at each end, and that those in charge of the second engine, although knowing the horse was frightened, took no steps to prevent an accident, but permitted the engine to throw out an unusual quantity of smoke, steam, and cinders, which caused the horse to become unmanageable and injure the plaintiff.
2. A railroad company operating a portion of its railroad bridge as a toll bridge for travelers with horses must keep a lookout for the purpose of discovering whether or not teams on the bridge have become so frightened by trains also on it as to be unmanageable and dangerous; and if so, so far as is reasonable, it must shut off steam and avoid unnecessary noise.
3. A traveler attempting to use a portion of a railroad bridge fitted for teams is charged with notice that the railroad company, in operating its trains over the bridge, has the right to make all usual and reasonable noises incident thereto, and must act for his own safety with reference to such right.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Humphrey, Burnett, & Humphrey for appellants.

Mr. J. W. S. Clements for appellee.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants operate a railway and toll highway bridge across the Ohio river connecting the cities of Louisville and New Albany. A board fence 7 feet high separates the railway track from that part of the bridge used by footmen and wagons. On January 16, 1898, appellee and a companion occupying her buggy, paid the toll for passage across the bridge from Louisville. They met a heavy freight train, with a locomotive at each end. Appellee's horse took fright at the noise of the train, and she claims, after that fact and her peril had been discovered by those in charge of the second locomotive, they took no steps to stop its noise, but continued it, the locomotive throwing out smoke and steam, as well as hot cinders, which lit on the horse's back, causing it to run away, demolishing the buggy and harness, and seriously injuring appellee. In this suit for damages the jury awarded her a verdict for $800. The matters urged as error by appellants are: First, that the court should have given the jury a peremptory instruction at the close of plaintiff's case, or at the close of all the evidence, for a nonsuit; second, that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence; and, third, that certain instructions offered by appellants, but rejected by the court, should have been given, while those given did not correctly present the law of the case.

On the first point, if the evidence on behalf of plaintiff was such altogether as, full credit being given to it by the jury, would have warranted a verdict for the plaintiff, the peremptory instruction for a nonsuit should have been refused. Appellee and her companion each testified that the horse became frightened at the first locomotive, and showed plainly its nervousness, but was not beyond her control; that the train was of about twenty-two cars; that before they came up with the second locomotive the fireman and engineer were both on the side of the engine next to the driveway in use by plaintiff, and they saw her, and saw that her horse was frightened and trying to run, but that, instead of stopping or attempting to reduce the noise of the locomotive, which was, as they testified, throwing out an unusual quantity of steam, smoke, and sparks or cinders, and making a great deal of noise, these trainmen merely stood and laughed at her predicament; that the sparks or hot cinders from the locomotive fell on her horse's back and burned it,—from all of which it ran away, causing her serious injury. A trainman who was on top of the cars, and about 100 feet in front of the second locomotive, testified for plaintiff that he saw the horse was frightened; that the locomotive was making considerable noise, which was not stopped till after the horse ran away. Other witnesses testified that the horse, when caught, a few minutes afterwards, showed a number of burned places on its back, described as such as might have been caused by sparks or hot cinders being dropped on it; that the horse was not wild, and had been frequently driven across that bridge before the accident. Appellee's physicians and others testified that her injuries were serious. She was unconscious for a time, suffering from a severe and dangerous wound on the back of the head; one leg broken or dislocated; wrist sprained and dislocated, and severely sprained and injured in the back and side; besides some minor wounds. Septic poisoning followed in a few days, from which appellee was unconscious for eight days or longer. She was confined for about three months by these injuries, and at the time of the trial—about three years after the injuries—continued to suffer from them, and her physician testified that it was probable that the injury to her head would prove to be a permanent one. If the jury believed this evidence, appellee was entitled to a verdict under the law governing her rights and appellants' duties and liabilities in the premises. The peremptory instruction was properly refused.

2. The engineers and firemen in charge of the two locomotives testified that their respective engines were in good order, spark arresters being provided of approved pattern, which were in good condition; that the engines were not making more noise than customary and necessary in their operation. Those in charge of the second locomotive denied that they saw any symptoms of fright in the horse, or that they laughed at plaintiff's situation, but that, seeing the buggy coming, with the two women in it, they shut off steam before the horse came up, and that the horse did not start to run till after it had passed them. They denied that sparks or cinders were being emitted by their engine. Thus there was a pretty well-defined issue of fact presented by this testimony. But it was shown that appellee was running a house of prostitution; that her companion on this occasion was a visitor, who was there probably for immoral purposes; that others of her witnesses were shown to be frequent visitors at her house, or employed there; that the trainmen who testified for appellee told an improbable tale in some particulars,—in fact, excepting appellee's physicians, about all of her witnesses were supposed to be discredited, either by their manner of testifying or their character as evidenced by their employments, or lack of them. This much, however, seems to be undoubtedly true: The women were passengers on the bridge, having paid the requisite toll. They were driving a horse that had frequently been driven over the same bridge, presumably meeting the ordinary conditions found there. That on this occasion the horse took fright after meeting the train, became unmanageable, ran away, and injured the occupants of the buggy. There was undeniably a cause for this. Both sides agreed that meeting the first locomotive was not the sole cause of the runaway. Something somewhat unusual must have happened after that to have occasioned it. The women's story, as corroborated by the brakeman, is not an improbable one. It was necessary for the jury to believe one side or the other. They had before them facts, including certainly as much of the characters of plaintiff's witnesses as was proper to be shown in the manner done in this case. We cannot say that the jury gave improper weight to appellee's evidence. The conclusion of the jury on this point was certainly within the legitimate scope of the privileges of their office. We conclude that the verdict of the jury was not contrary to the evidence.

3. The court instructed the jury as to appellant's duty that in operating its train upon the bridge appellant was required to exercise the highest degree of care usually exercised by prudently managed corporations of the same character to prevent injury to passengers on foot or in vehicles that may be using the bridge the same time that a train is passing; that a failure to exercise that degree of care in the management of the train was actionable negligence. The court further said: "I will further say to you that if you believe from the evidence that in the operation of this particular train which is said to have caused the injury complained of no more noise was made than is usually incident to the operation of such trains, then the defendant cannot be said to be guilty of negligence in the operation of that train. But if you shall believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's horse became frightened, and those in charge of the train saw that it was frightened, then it became their duty to take such steps as were within their power to prevent the accident which is claimed to have resulted from the fright of the horse, and if they, after seeing the fright of the horse and peril of the lady, failed to take such steps as were at hand by which they could have prevented the noise and the consequent injury, if they could have so prevented it, then it was negligence upon the part of the defendant's agents in not so doing, if they did fail to do it." It is complained by appellants that the court should not have exacted from the bridge company a higher or different degree of care than was required of the traveler appellee. The opinion in case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 857, 53 S. W. 269, is relied on. That case recognizes a principle which we believe to be sound, and in no wise in conflict with the one applied by the trial court in this case. In the Smith Case the traveler was upon a highway running parallel to the railroad. His horse took fright at the train. The court told the jury that, if the employees in charge of the engine could have known by the use of ordinary care that the continued whistling would cause plaintiff to lose control of his team, a recovery for plaintiff would be authorized for injuries caused by the act. This court held that the continued whistling after those in charge of the engine saw that plaintiff's horses were frightened was negligence. "But," it was added, "there is no rule of law that would require employees in charge of an engine to discover the condition of a team or persons on a highway running parallel with the railroad. Lamb v. Old Colony R. Co. 140 Mass. 79, 54 Am. Rep. 449, 2 N. E. 932. While it is not their duty to discover such things, yet, if the employees do see the apparent danger, it then becomes the duty of such employees to use care to avert the injury. As to persons not on the railroad, the obligation to observe care begins when the danger is discovered." Another line of cases is relied on also by appellants to the effect that those using a railway highway crossing are bound to use the same degree of care to protect themselves from injury as the railway company is required to use to keep from injuring the traveler. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Goetz, 79 Ky. 449, 42 Am. Rep. 227; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. McClurg, 8 C. C. A. 322, 19 U. S. App. 346, 59 Fed. 862; and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cummins, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 681, 63 S. W. 594. In all those cases the traveler was using the highway crossing. No amount of reasonable care on the part of those operating the railroad train would likely prevent injury to the traveler unless he too exercised the same care in using the crossing. Carelessness on his part in attempting to use the crossing at the time a train was passing would inevitably lead to his injury. The traveler upon the bridge in this case was the bridge company's passenger. As such she was entitled to that degree of care that looks out for her presence with a view to preventing her injury. This duty, in part growing out of the reasonable probability of frightening teams under the conditions existing, would seem to call for something more than a mere negative responsibility. The instruction given by the court really told the jury that the bridge company was required to use the highest degree of ordinary care,—not the greatest possible care. Ordinary care has no grades known to the law. This instruction, when reduced to analysis, was that the bridge company was required to observe ordinary care. The emphatic form used by the court, while improper, does not seem to have misled the jury, or prejudiced appellants' rights. As to appellee's contributory negligence the court told the jury: "Contributory negligence means the failure of a person to exercise the degree of care usually exercised by ordinarily careful and prudent persons under the same or similar circumstances to protect themselves from injury, and by reason of which failure they help to cause or bring about the injury complained of." In other words, the jury were told that it was the bridge company's duty to observe the best care usually observed by ordinarily prudent bridge operators under similar circumstances to avoid the injury, and that it was the duty of the traveler to use that degree of care usually exercised by ordinarily careful persons similarly situated to protect themselves from injury. There is no material difference between the degrees of care required to be observed. In this case there was no pretense of showing by the evidence that appellee was guilty of any contributory negligence. An instruction on that point might well have been refused. It is not seriously argued that too high a degree of care was required of the bridge company; simply that too low a degree was placed for the appellee. As she was shown not to have been guilty of any negligence, it is not material whether the instruction as to the care required of her was literally correct, so long as she has no reason to complain of it.

It is further complained by appellants that the instructions made it the duty of appellants to look out for teams, and that a failure to see them, when it might have been done by the exercise of proper care, was equivalent to seeing them when frightened, and then failing to use due precaution to stop the noises causing the trouble, so far as was possible. This is said to be in conflict with Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 857, 53 S. W. 269. We do not place such construction on the instructions given, but rather the contrary. We are of opinion, though, that a different rule might be applied in a case like the one in hand than in one where the traveler is upon a parallel highway to the railway. The bridge company should maintain a reasonable lookout for the safety of its passengers on its bridge, from whatever cause connected with the company's acts or those of its servants. The court, in the instruction quoted, properly recognized that it was the right of the defendant to make such noise as was usual and incident to the movement and operation of its engines at the time and place and in the work in which it was engaged. No one is responsible for injuries resulting from unavoidable accidents while engaged in a lawful business. So a passenger using the highway part of the bridge does so with a knowledge that the company, in operating its railway trains over the bridge, has necessarily the right to make all usual and reasonable noises incident thereto, whether occasioned by the escape of steam, rattling of cars, or other causes, and persons whose duty calls them near a railway must be presumed to know of this right, and to act for their own safety with reference to such right. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 134 Ind. 16, 33 N. E. 774; Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Howard, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 476. It also follows that those operating railroad trains over this bridge must know that people are using other parts of the bridge for the purpose of passing with their vehicles; that teams are liable, under such conditions, to take fright at even the usual, customary noises incident to the operation of trains. Therefore, as such bridge passengers are passengers of the company who are operating the trains, and are entitled to more than a negative care, the trainmen should keep a lookout for the purpose of discovering whether teams have become so frightened as to become unmanageable and dangerous to their drivers and to others on the bridge. In such case it would be the duty of those in charge of the train, so far as they reasonably could, to shut off the exhaust of steam, and not cause any more of noise than is necessary under the circumstances. Nothing unreasonable is, by this, required of those operating the trains. They are simply compelled to keep a lookout to observe whether their presence is causing danger to teams and passengers using other parts of the bridge by license from its owner, and, if they do observe that it is, then it becomes their duty to do what in reason and humanity they can do and ought to do to prevent an injury.

We perceive no error in the proceedings, and the judgment is affirmed, with damages.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

W. L. TILLMAN, Plff. in Err.,
v.

P. W. DUNMAN, Exr., etc., of Joseph Dunman, Deceased, et al.

- *1. It is the right of an executor offering land for sale at public outcry to withdraw the same at any time before the hammer falls.
2. Although the motive of the executor in withdrawing the property from sale before the bid was accepted was the result of collusion between himself and another who had bargained for the premises at a private sale, and the withdrawal was made with the design of completing the private sale, nevertheless the person who had made the last and highest bid before the same was withdrawn could not insist upon the right to take the land as a purchaser. While such collusion between the executor and another would be open to inquiry by legatees and creditors, it is not open to inquiry at the instance of a stranger.

I. Scope.

Although "puffing" or by-bidding may be, in a sense, in the nature of a withdrawal of the property,—as, for instance, in a sale without reserve, if a bidder is employed by the vendor to bid up to a certain point, such bidding is virtually a withdrawal up to that point,—the aim has been to confine this note to cases of specific withdrawal of the property; and therefore, with the exception of a few instances of relevant obiter dicta in the opinions, cases of "puffing" or by-bidding have been excluded.

a. Withdrawal after bids.

In 1859 three of the five judges of the exchequer chamber, in reviewing an action by a 57 L. R. A.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Harris County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel specific performance of a contract to convey land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hatcher & Carson, for plaintiff in error:

The private sale by these executors to Murrah Brothers is contrary to public policy and void.

Jackson v. Williams, 50 Ga. 553; Furr v. Eddleman, 80 Ga. 663, 7 S. E. 167; Downing v. Peabody, 56 Ga. 40; Logan v. Gigley, 9 Ga. 114; Bond v. Watson, 22 Ga. 637; Nutting v. Thomason, 46 Ga. 34; Bagley v. Stephens, 78 Ga. 304, 2 S. E. 505; Neal v. Patton, 40 Ga. 363.

Tillman being the best and highest bidder, and his bid having been accepted and cried, it became a perfected sale. When no one would raise his bid, there being no reason to postpone the sale by the executors, his purchase could not be defeated by the executors stating that they would withdraw the land from sale, their only object being to carry out the terms of a private sale to bidder against an auctioneer for damages for refusing to accept his bid as highest bidder on a sale advertised to be without reserve, and for allowing the vendor to overbid him and withdraw the property, which had resulted in a nonsuit, held that, upon the pleadings as they then stood, such judgment of nonsuit must be affirmed, but, availing themselves of their inherent power, that they would decide in favor of plaintiff if he chose to amend his pleadings in conformity with such decision. And then the court stated that upon the facts it seemed to them that plaintiff was entitled to recover for the following reasons: The owner's name was not disclosed, and a sale was announced by the auctioneer to be "without reserve," which, according to all the cases, both at law and equity, means that neither vendor nor any person on his behalf may bid, and that the property shall be sold to the highest bidder whether the sum bid be equivalent to the real value or not; and, upon the same principle that a person giving information advertised for may sue, as upon a contract, the person offering a reward for such information, so it seemed to the court that the highest bona fide bidder at an auction may sue the auctioneer as upon a contract that the sale shall be without reserve; and further, the court states: "We think that the auctioneer who puts the property up for sale upon such a condition [without reserve] pledges himself that the sale shall be without a third person, for a less price. This was not a legal reason for postponing an executor's sale. Hence, the best and highest bidder became the purchaser.

Logan v. Gigley, 9 Ga. 114; Alexander v. Herring, 54 Ga. 204.

Administrators' and executors' sales do not rest upon the same principles as auction sales. The doctrine of locus penitentiae (place of repentance), the opportunity of withdrawing from a contract before the parties are finally bound, does not exist to the same extent.

Plaintiff does not occupy the position of a stranger; and while it is true that creditors of the testator and legatees under the will can complain, it is also true that plaintiff has an equitable title and right springing out of this transaction, which authorizes him to invoke the aid of a court of equity for a specific performance.

reserve, or, in other words, contracts that it shall be so, and that this contract is made with the highest bona fide bidder, and, in case of a breach of it, that he has a right of action against the auctioneer. The case is not at all affected by the 17th section of the statute of frauds, which relates only to direct sales, and not to contracts relating to or connected with them. . . . We entertain no doubt that the owner may, at any time before the contract is legally complete, interfere and revoke the auctioneer's authority; but he does so at his peril; and if the auctioneer has contracted any liability in consequence of his employment and the subsequent revocation or conduct of the owner, he is entitled to be indemnified." Two out of the five judges concurred in the result, but preferred to arrive at it on the ground that from the facts, although the auctioneer did not have the power to sell without reserve ab initio, he undertook to do so, and that there was a breach of this undertaking. It was also stated that there was no reversal of the judgment of the court below, but if plaintiff chose to, he might amend and proceed to a new trial. This was not done, however, the parties agreeing to a stet processus. Warlow v. Harrison, 1 El. & El. 309, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 18, 29 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 14.

If the theory thus laid down is the law, it would seem to follow that property cannot be withdrawn after a bid has been made; but there are several reasons why, under the existing state of the law, this doctrine is open to criticism; one of which is that the decisions uniformly hold that a bidder may retract his bid at any time before the hammer falls, and so it is argued that, while the auctioneer would be bound to sell if a bid were made, the bidder might retract, and therefore the mutuality necessary in a contract is lacking. To obviate this, Wharton on Agency, § 641, suggests that if the auctioneer is bound the bidder is also bound by the same contract, and if he withdraw his bid the auctioneer may have an action against him for his personal loss by the failure of the sale; but, in view of the facts that the great weight of authority is to the effect that the bidder may retract at any time before the hammer falls, and that no case can be found bearing out the above suggestion, it seems impractical. Another objection, also, to Wharton's theory, is expressed by counsel on the argument in Jones v. Nanney (1824) 13 Price, 76, that to hold that an action would lie on an implied undertaking not to retract a bid would furnish a mode of getting rid of the statute of frauds, 57 L. R. A.

It is a fraud in law to induce a purchaser to buy a part of a tract, and then refuse to sell to him another part which he had intended and was ready to buy and pay for to complete his purchase.

The successful bidder at an administrator's sale may compel a performance of the contract on the terms prescribed, if they are consonant with law.

which could not be permitted. However, as we have seen, Warlow v. Harrison later held that the statute of frauds has no application to this preliminary contract, on the ground that it is not a contract of direct sale; but Browne on the Statute of Frauds, § 286, says that an agreement by which a party shall ultimately be bound to sell or purchase land is as much within the statute as if he bound himself immediately to do so, citing Rucker v. Steelman, 73 Ind. 397.

Nevertheless, the rule laid down by Warlow v. Harrison was approved (in 1899) in England by Johnston v. Boyes [1899] 2 Ch. 73, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 425, 80 L. T. N. S. 488, 47 Week. Rep. 517. This was an action by a woman against an auctioneer for damages for not allowing her husband, as her agent, to complete the sale by signing the contract and paying the required deposit, when he was the highest bidder and the property had been knocked down to him. The refusal of the auctioneer to complete the sale was on the ground of insolvency of the bidder and the tender by him of a check instead of cash. It was contended that, as the action was not for specific performance, no question as to the statute of frauds was involved, as that relates to direct sales, and not to contracts relating to, or connected with, them, and as it was held in Warlow v. Harrison that the statute, § 17, would not affect a case where chattels are advertised for sale by auction on printed conditions, and a member of the public accepts the offer and complies with the conditions, counsel argued that, in like manner, § 4 relates to direct sales of land, and not to contracts related to, or connected with, them. The court held that in point of law such an action as this could be sustained; that a vendor who offers property for sale at auction on the terms of printed conditions can be made liable to a member of the public who accepts the offer, if those conditions be violated; and that the statute of frauds would not afford any defense to such an action, for the plaintiff was not suing on a contract to purchase land, but simply because her agent, in breach of the conditions of sale, was not allowed to sign a contract which would have resulted in her becoming the purchaser of land, and that this conclusion results from the decision in Warlow v. Harrison. But the court held that the auctioneer might refuse to complete the sale on account of the insolvency of the bidder, and was not obliged to take a check in lieu of cash.

In dismissing a bill by a bidder to compel

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Tillman filed an equitable petition in the superior court of Harris county against P. W. and J. E. Dunman, executors of Joseph Dunman, deceased, and T. T. and G. N. Murrah, and Murrah Brothers, praying that the executors above named be required to execute and deliver to him a deed to certain described lands; that T. T. and G. N. Murrah, or Murrah Brothers, be required to surrender for cancellation such deed of conveyance as they may have received from these executors, as being a cloud on petitioner's title; that all the defendants be restrained and enjoined from changing the status of the property; and for general relief. The allegations of the petition are substantially as follows: Joseph Dunman died testate, seised and possessed of certain described property. His will was duly probated, and letters testamentary issued to P. W. and J. E. Dunman, who, as executors, entered into possession of the lands of their testator for the purpose of administering his estate and carrying out the terms of the will, under the provisions of which they duly advertised for sale certain lands of decedent for the purpose of paying the debts of the estate, and for distribution among the legatees according to the statute and the terms of the will. The advertisement recited that the land was to be sold in five parcels, "for cash," before the court-house door of Harris county, on the first Tuesday in February, 1900. At that time, and at the place above stated, petitioner being present, the executors read the advertisement publicly, and began to sell the land in the order and parcels as therein stated. Petispecific performance, in Day v. Wells, 30 Beav. 220, 7 Jur. N. S. 1004, 9 Week. Rep. 857, the judge delivering the opinion of the court stated that he did not wish to be understood as intending to confirm such a proposition as that a vendor, as soon as a lot is knocked down, is entitled to say, "I will not ratify the sale," but that he dismissed the bill on the ground that the vendor bona fide made a mistake as to the authority which he thought he had vested in the auctioneer, and which he intended should be exercised.

Keightley v. Birch (1814) 3 Campb. 521 holds that a sheriff is not justified in selling goods to the highest bidder greatly under their value, but should make a return that they remain in his hands for want of bidders. (See infra, III. b.)

The doctrine of Warlow v. Harrison is evidently followed in Canada in the case of McAlpine v. Young, 2 Ch. Chamb. Rep. (Ont.) 85, where a motion, which was made to stay the settling of a new advertisement of sale, was granted on the ground that the previous sale could not be abandoned, and that where a bid had been made the property could not be withdrawn from sale, for the reason that the party bidding had certain rights which he was entitled to have protected.

Another Canadian case, which goes on the same theory, is O'Connor v. Woodward, 6 Ont. Pr. Rep. 223. This was an application to resell the property after a previous putting up of the same and repeated adjournments. The court stated that, according to the standing conditions under which the property was offered, the highest bidder was the purchaser, and could not be deprived of his right by the auctioneer refusing to knock the property down to him; and that, it having been once offered by the vendor, it was not open to him to refuse a bid, however small, on the ground of mere inadequacy of price; and that specific performance would not be refused on that ground unless the inadequacy was so great as to be evidence of fraud. These previous irregular proceedings, however, were held to be wholly null and void, but on another ground.

But, on the other hand, is the doctrine, firmly established, that a bidder may retract his bid at any time before the hammer falls; and many text books lay down the rule that either party may retract before that time. Bateman, Auctions, § 30; Benjamin, Sales, §§ 42, 270; Story, Sales, § 461; Baker, Sales, §§ 550, 569; note on Auctions, to Thomas v. Kerr (Ky.) 96 Am. Dec. 265; 2 Kent, Com. 10th ed. 756; Murfree, 57 L. R. A.

Sheriffs, § 1003; Warvelle, Vendors & Purchasers, § 7.

The leading authority upon these propositions is Payne v. Cave (1789) 3 T. R. 149. It was contended that a bidder is bound by the condition of a sale without reserve to the highest bidder, to abide by his bidding, and cannot retract, and that he is a conditional purchaser if nobody bids more; and that otherwise it is in the power of any person to injure the vendor, because all former biddings are discharged by the last; but the court held that "every bidding is nothing more than an offer on one side, which is not binding on either side until it is assented to."

How these two theories,—one, that the vendor is bound to sell without reserve, after so advertising, upon a bid being made, and the other, that the bidder may retract his bid at any time before the hammer falls—may be reconciled, it is difficult to say. Langdell in his Summary of the Law of Contracts, § 19, recognizes and considers this question as follows: "It was decided in Payne v. Cave, 3 T. R. 149, that a bid at an auction is in the nature of an offer, which is accepted by knocking down the hammer; and perhaps it is too late to question the correctness of the decision. On principle, however, it is open to much doubt. The true view seems rather to be that the seller makes the offer when the article is put up, namely, to sell it to the highest bidder; and that when a bid is made there is an actual sale subject to the condition that no one else shall bid higher. This view was urged by the plaintiff's counsel. If the bidder can retract at any time before the hammer falls, so also can the seller; and hence a bid will secure no right to the bidder whether there is any higher bid or not. The article may be withdrawn if the bidding is not satisfactory, though it were put up with the express announcement that it should be sold to the highest bidder. That the decision in Payne v. Cave has not been acquiesced in by sellers at auction appears from the frequent attempts that have been made to render bids irrevocable by a provision to that effect inserted in the conditions of sale. That such attempts are unavailing is no argument in favor of Payne v. Cave, but rather the contrary."

On the other hand, Pollock, Contr. § 14, criticises Warlow v. Harrison, and says that the "proposal of a definite service to be done for reward, which is in fact a request . . . for that particular service, though not addressed to anyone individually, is quite different in its nature from a declaration to all whom it may concern that one is willing to do tioner, with others, bid for the same, and two parcels were knocked off to him, and one to another bidder. A certain described parcel of the land was then offered and cried for sale, and petitioner bid thereon, as did one of the defendants in this case (Murrah), and others present; and the bids were accepted and cried until finally petitioner bid a certain sum, which was accepted and cried by the auctioneer conducting the sale; and no person would raise petitioner's bid, which was the best and highest bid. Murrah then announced publicly that Murrah Brothers or himself had bought this tract at private sale, and whoever bought it would buy a lawsuit, and that he claimed the property, after which the bidding was continued. When petitioner announced that his bid had been accepted and cried, and if anyone wanted to bid, then to raise his bid; but no one raised it, and he claimed the property, his bid being the highest and best offer. The executors then consulted their attorney, and said they would withdraw that parcel from sale, and then proceeded to sell the remaining tracts advertised. Petitioner publicly announced that he claimed the property, and denied the legal right of the executors to withdraw the land from sale to consummate a private sale previously made for a less amount than his bid, and thereupon tendered the amount of his bid, and demanded that the executors make him a deed to the tract; and they refused to accept the money, or execute and deliver to him a deed to the same. Petitioner thereafter frequently tendered the purchase price to the executors, and tenders the same into court upon filing his petition. It is charged that T. T. and G. N. Murrah, either as individuals business with them in a particular manner. Of course the person who publishes such an invitation does contemplate that people who choose to act on it will do whatever is necessary to put themselves in a position to avail themselves of it. But acts so done are merely incidental to the real subject; they are not elements of a contract, but preliminaries. It does not seem reasonable to construe such preliminaries into the consideration for a contract which the parties had no intention of making."

Cull v. Wakefield, 6 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 178, which was an action against an auctioneer for selling goods so carelessly and negligently that they brought a sum much less than they were reasonably worth, may perhaps be distinguished by the fact that the sale was not expressly advertised to be without reserve, and the vendor informed the auctioneer of a sum which he thought the property ought to bring, although he did not expressly direct that it should not be sold for less. It was held that an action would lie against the auctioneer, but the court remarked that no adjudged cases could be found on this point. In the opinion it is stated that the auctioneer was not obliged, by anything shown by the evidence, "to let any lot go inevitably, merely because he had put it up; but, more especially, when the property was sold, as it was, in a succession of lots, it was, of course, competent to him, when he found that the earlier lots were not selling to advantage, to forbear putting up the remainder;" and further, the court states that it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the auctioneer is not bound to exercise any discretion or caution whatever, or that there is no redress unless there has been something fraudulent or irregular in his proceedings, and that in point of fact the discretion of forbearing to sell at a ruinous sacrifice is often exercised. This case certainly recognizes no binding contract on the part of the vendor to sell to the highest bidder.

b. Withdrawal before bids.

In 1873, Harris v. Nickerson, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 286, 42 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 171, 28 L. T. N. S. 410, 21 Week. Rep. 635, held that an intending bidder is not entitled to recover for his loss of time and expenses in attending a sale at which property advertised to be sold, and which the bidder wished to purchase, had been withdrawn; and the court remarked that, while there is ground for saying that a contract is entered into between the auctioneer and the highest bona fide bidder, that rule has no application where the lots were never put up, and no offer was made by plaintiff, or promise by defendant, except the advertisement that certain goods would be sold, and that it is impossible to say that there is a contract with everybody attending the sale that the auctioneer is to be liable for their expenses if any single article is withdrawn. The court states that this is a case of first impression.

And in another case, where a right of way through property was reserved by the vendor after the sale had been advertised but before it actually took place, by writing such reservation in a number of the notices of sale, it was held that a vendor has the power to revoke an authority to sell at any time before the sale, although such reservation is not known to the bidder, who became the purchaser under the impression that he was obtaining the property as first advertised. Manser v. Back, 6 Hare, 443.

In discussion on the argument in Malnprice v. Westley (1865) 6 Best & S. 420, 34 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 229, 11 Jur. N. S. 975, 13 L. T. N. S. 560, 14 Week. Rep. 9, one of the judges remarked to counsel that an auctioneer's withdrawing property from sale might render him responsible in damages; and also that, if he warranted that he would sell the property, that might make him responsible for not doing so; and further, that if, after issuing the handbill, the defendant (auctioneer) refused to hold the auction or to knock down the premises to the highest bidder, an action ought to be maintainable against him for the expense and loss of time incurred in attending the sale. From the facts it appeared that the property was advertised to be sold at a peremptory sale to the highest bidder, but at the sale the vendor's solicitor bid it in, stating that there was a reserved price. The decision in favor of the bidder does not take the merits of the case into consideration, but is based upon a technicality.

III. In the United States.

a. In general.

In the United States the rule is even less clearly defined than in England and Canada, and the influence of Warlow v. Harrison is much less plainly shown. As it is now settled that all auction sales, except strictly judicial sales, are within the statute of frauds, the scarcity of cases may, perhaps, be partly explained on the ground that if the property is withdrawn before any written memorandum is or as a firm, have entered into a combination or conspiracy with the executors to defeat petitioner's title and prevent his possession and ownership of the land, and have procured from the executors deeds of conveyance thereto, and are now in possession, claiming title to the same. This tract of land has not since been advertised by the executors, who claim that they had made a private sale of this land to T. T. and G. N. Murrah, and that, when petitioner bid a higher price at the sale than had been agreed on at this private sale, they were forced to withdraw the land and protect the purchasers in their private bargain. Petitioner insists that, after he had bought two parcels or tracts of the land, it would be inequitable and unjust for the executors to refuse to accept his bid for another tract, and consummate a sale of same made privately, before the date of the sale as advertised, at a less price than was bid by petitioner at the sale. A general demurrer to this petition was sustained by the trial judge and the petition dismissed, and, to the order sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition, Tillman excepted.

1. The questions to be determined in this made in compliance with the statute, it is perhaps considered that those sales are void which come within the statute, and that therefore no cause of action exists, while sales too small to come within the statute are too small to be worth much litigation; and this theory of a preliminary contract, for a breach of which an action for damages will lie, is perhaps considered as too doubtful and uncertain to be relied upon.

In a brief memorandum of decision in Newman v. Vonderheide (1884) 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 164, it is held that, "where property offered at public auction for sale is withdrawn before the acceptance of a bid, there is no contract of sale, and the highest bidder cannot compel a conveyance by an action for specific performance, or obtain damages for refusal to convey." Further report of this case is not given, but as reported it is in direct opposition to the English theory.

An action by the bidder to compel specific performance failed in Corryolles v. Mossy (1831) 2 La. 504, where the auctioneer raised on the highest bid and withdrew the property; but this is a decision under the Louisiana Civil Code. The court referred to the rule laid down in 2 Kent, Com. 424, that every bidding is nothing more than an offer on one side, which is not binding on either side until it is assented to, and stated that the rule thus laid down would decide the case in favor of the vendor, but that the court preferred to decide the question under § 1795 of the Code, which provides that "the party proposing shall be presumed to continue in the intention which his proposal expressed. If, on receiving the unqualified assent of him to whom the proposition is made, he does not signify the change of his intention;" and the court thought that the change of intention was signified in this instance, and that the case does not come within the exception in the next article, § 1796, of a proposition being made in such terms as to exercise a design of giving the other party the right of concluding the contract by his assent.

The doctrine of Warlow v. Harrison seems to be recognized by obiter dicta in some cases of "puffing;" as, in Hartwell v. Gurney, 18 R. I. 78, 13 Atl. 113, the court says: "It seems to us that the stricter rule is the just and honest rule, and that it ought to prevail; for an offer to sell at auction is an offer to sell to the highest bidder, and every bid is an inchoate acceptance entitling the bidder to the property offered, if it turns out to be the highest, and there is no retraction on either side before the hammer falls," etc.; and further: "If it be said that without bidding the property offered may be sacrificed, the answer is that it is not necessary to offer it without reserve, and the risk of sacrifice may be avoided by publicly reserving the right to bid or to make one or more bids in the conditions of sale, or by starting the sale at an upset price. In this or 57 L. R. A.

some similar way good faith may be kept with the bidders, and at the same time the property be protected." This statement seems to recognize the theory that if property is advertised for sale without reserve it must go without reserve, and cannot be withdrawn unless special conditions are stated at or before the time of putting it up.

So, also, in the opinion in Miller v. Baynard, 2 Houst. (Del.) 559, 83 Am. Dec. 168, a case of "puffing," the court says that "It is perfectly competent for the seller to fix a minimum price, or to reserve to himself the right to bid, or to employ another to bid for him; but he must give fair notice of the fact, so that no one may be misled or deceived in such a sale."

In New York, in Taylor v. Harnett, 26 Misc. 362, 55 N. Y. Supp. 988, the court says, in substance, that there is no case in the state which is directly in point upon the proposition that, as a matter of law, where an auctioneer advertises a sale at public auction, and in response to this invitation bidders attend, an implied contract arises between them that the property will be knocked down to the highest bidder, for a breach of which an action for damages will lie against the auctioneer at the suit of such bidder; and, while conceding all respect due to the high authority of Warlow v. Harrison, which decides this question in England, it is not, of course, a controlling authority in New York. This was not a case of withdrawal of property, but the auctioneer refused to accept the highest bid on account of its trifling advance over the preceding one, and the court stated that the auctioneer has a certain amount of discretion with respect to the procedure on the sale; that it is well settled that he may refuse a bid tendered in bad faith, or proffered by a person who is insolvent, or otherwise disabled from completing the purchase; and without in the same reasoning comes the right of refusing trifling advances offered by bidders in the course of the sale, especially where that kind of bidding is initiated at the outset, and the sum so bid is utterly incommensurate with the actual known value of the property.

By § 1796 of the California Civil Code, and § 1026 of the Dakota Civil Code, it is enacted that "if at a sale by auction the auctioneer, having authority to do so, publicly announces that the sale will be without reserve, or makes any announcement equivalent thereto, the highest bidder, in good faith, has an absolute right to the completion of the sale to him; and upon such a sale bids by the seller or any agent for him, are void." But in both of these states it is also enacted that bids may be withdrawn at any time before the hammer falls. While most of the states have statutes regulating auctions, no others are found having provisions similar to Dakota and California.

Without doubt a vendor may put up his property for sale under such conditions as he may desire, and a withdrawal of the property case are whether an executor has the right to withdraw property from sale after it has been duly advertised, offered for sale at public outcry by an auctioneer employed by the executor, and bids received and cried, before the same is knocked off to the highest bidder; and whether the highest bidder in such a case acquires any right, by reason of his bid, to compel the executor to accept the same and make him a deed upon tender of the amount so bid. As a decision of these two questions is controlled by the same principle of law, they will be considered together. It is well-recognized law that a bidder at an auction sale may withdraw his bid, even after it has been cried, at any time before the hammer falls or the property is knocked off to him. See Payne v. Cave, 3 T. R. 149; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 501, and cases there cited. In Payne v. Cave, 3 T. R. 149, the principle underlying this rule is thus stated: "The auctioneer is the agent of the vendor, and the assent of both parties is necessary to make the contract binding, that is signified on the part of the seller by knocking down the hammer. . . . Every bidding is nothing more than an offer on one side, which is not binding on follows as a matter of course if such conditions are not complied with.

b. Judicial and official sales.

Where the facts showed that at a commissioner's sale of land the property was withdrawn after being put up, it was held, in Miller v. Law, 10 Rich. Eq. 320, 73 Am. Dec. 92, that commissioners have, under the control of the court, the discretion to withdraw property temporarily from sales when they see that to press the sale would be to sacrifice the property; and the court affirmed a dismissal of a motion to show cause why the sale should not be complied with.

But this last case is in the nature of a judicial sale and the trend of opinion seems to be that in involuntary and judicial sales the officer making such sale is vested with the right to use discretion in regard to adjournments, and may even withdraw the property when it will serve the best interests of the parties concerned; and therefore the decision in TILLMAN v. DUNMAN may be justified on that ground, but such discretion is ever within the court's control.

Another example in this direction is Blossom v. Milwaukee & C. R. Co. 3 Wall. 196, 18 L. ed. 43, where, upon an application to have the sale confirmed to him by a bidder at a sale of mortgaged premises under a decree of the court, it was held that, as the property was not struck off to the bidder, nor his bid accepted by the seller, there was no sale, and that officers acting under such decrees are invested with a reasonable discretion; and that where there was but one bidder such an officer would be justified in postponing the sale to prevent a sacrifice of the property. In this case, after the property was put up and bid upon, and after repeated adjournments, the mortgage was finally paid and the property entirely withdrawn.

And in Knox v. Spratt, 19 Fla. 838, the court holds that merely being the highest bidder at a judicial sale does not entitle one to a deed of the premises, until the sale is confirmed.

Also, a sheriff is not bound to sell without reserve if he receives a bid, but if he can prevent the property being sacrificed by a little delay, he is justified in making a return of no sale for want of bidders. Conway v. Nolte, 11 Mo. 74; Shaw v. Potter, 50 Mo. 281; State ex rel. Central Type Foundry v. Moore, 72 Mo. 285; Cole County v. Madden, 91 Mo. 615, 4 S. W. 397; Rogers & B. Hardware Co. v. Cleveland Bldg. Co. 132 Mo. 458, 462, 31 L. R. A. 335, 34 S. W. 57; Davis v. McCann, 143 Mo. 178, 44 S. W. 795.

These cases seem to follow the old English case of Keightley v. Birch (1814) 3 Campb. 521, which see under supra, II. a.

But to the contrary is State v. Johnston, 2 57 L. R. A.

N. C. (1 Hayw.) 293, which holds that if but one bidder appears the sheriff must sell to him, unless he is irresponsible.

To the same effect is McLeod v. McCall, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 89.

Also, Gilbert v. Watts-DeGolyer Co. 169 Ill. 129, 48 N. E. 430, holds that a provision in the statute authorizing a sheriff to postpone an execution sale for want of bidders does not authorize postponement on the sole ground that only one bidder was present.

And in a brief memorandum of decision in Morton v. Moore, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 717, it is held that a commissioner making a sale has no right to refuse to accept a bid unless the bidder will not give the bond with good security required by the judgment of sale, but is bound to accept all bids and knock the property off to the highest bidder.

IV. Summary.

Upon the whole, it seems that the right to withdraw property from an auction sale after it has been put up depends upon the nonexistence of a binding obligation on the part of the auctioneer to sell after a bid has been made, and that the existence of such an obligation is still an open question, although the doctrine that the bidder may retract at any time before the hammer falls is considered as settled by many writers and decisions. How the vendor can be bound if the bidder is not, and how either can be bound in violation of the statute of frauds, are serious questions.

Upon principle, there may be this preliminary contract, consisting of an offer by the vendor to sell without reserve to the highest bidder, accepted and becoming binding upon a bid being made, subject to the bidder's release if a higher bid is offered. Upon such a contract both parties are bound, and an action in damages for personal loss by the failure of the sale might lie in favor of either if the other party withdraw. This contract is not within the statute of frauds, being entirely distinct from the direct contract of sale, which consists of an offer by the bidder, accepted by the vendor's knocking down the hammer and making a memorandum in compliance with the statute of frauds in those cases where it is necessary, and which the vendor can refuse to do only on the ground of irresponsibility of the bidder; and in this direct contract of sale, upon a withdrawal by either party an action for specific performance may be enforced if the statute of frauds has been complied with. But such a theory as this encounters the established doctrine that the bidder may retract at any time before the hammer falls, and in view of the decisions, at present, especially in the United States, principle must yield to adjudicated cases.

M. M. M.

either side till it is assented to." For the same reason, the seller has the right to withdraw the property before it is knocked off to the bidder. Mr. Story, in his treatise on the Law of Sales (§ 461), states the rule thus: "In a sale by auction the seller may withdraw the goods, or the bidder may retract his bid at any time before they are knocked off; for, so long as the final consent of both parties is not signified by the blow of the hammer, there are only mutual propositions, but no mutual agreement to one definite proposition." See 2 Kent, Com. 4th ed. *537; Corryolles v. Mossy, 2 La. 504. But it is claimed that this rule of auction sales does not apply to sales by administrators and executors, as they are regulated by statute, which must be strictly complied with, and that, while such representatives are vested with large discretion, they cannot lawfully withdraw property when it has been exposed for sale after due advertisement. There is a close resemblance between an executor or administrator's sale, when made under an order of court, to one made under an execution or decree, or other compulsory process; but, where the sale is made under a power contained in the will, the executor's sale more nearly resembles that of an individual offering his property for sale. But granting, for the sake of the argument, that the sale in question rested upon the same footing with judicial sales, we find that it has been determined that an officer of court has a right to withdraw property, even when offered for sale under compulsory process, and bids have been received and cried, and that the bidder at such a sale acquires no right to compel the officer to convey the property, even where his bid is the best and highest, unless the property is knocked off to him, or the hammer falls, and the sale is thus completed. Mr. Freeman, in his work on Executions (vol. 2, § 288, p. 1665), says, on authority: "Officers charged with the duty of conducting chancery, trustee, and other involuntary sales have also a discretion to withdraw the property after being offered for sale." In the case of Miller v. Law, 10 Rich. Eq. 320, 73 Am. Dec. 92, it was ruled that "the commissioner has a discretion, subject to the control of the court, to withdraw land from sale after it has been offered, and even after a bid has been received and cried. If he does so, the highest bidder . . . is not entitled to a conveyance, there being no contract with him." It was ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Blossom v. Milwaukee & C. R. Co. 3 Wall. 198, 18 L. ed. 43, that "a bidder at a judicial sale at public auction, whose bid has not been accepted, . . . cannot insist, even though he has been the highest and best bidder, on leave to pay the amount of his bid, and have a confirmation of the sale made to him." Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, after stating the rule above quoted from Story on the Law of Sales, says: "Same rules prevail upon a sale under common-law process as in other cases of sales at public auction." From the foregoing authorities it seems to be well settled that on principle, as well as by well-considered adjudications, the officer offering property at a judicial sale, except where his discretion is controlled by the order of sale, can withdraw the property offered for sale before the same is knocked off, and that a bidder at judicial sales acquires no right to compel a conveyance of the property offered until the same has been knocked off to him. See also, in this connection, Scales v. Chambers, 113 Ga. 920, 39 S. E. 396. It would therefore seem that, even if the rule governing judicial sales is to be applied to the sale by the executors in the present case, they had the right to withdraw the property offered from sale, and that Tillman, by reason of being the highest and best bidder at such sale, acquired no right to compel a conveyance by the executors, as the property was withdrawn before the same was knocked off to him by the auctioneer, for the reason that there was no acceptance of his offer and no contract.

2. But it is contended that it would be inequitable for the executors, after having advertised the land, and after having sold to petitioner other parcels, to withdraw this parcel from sale when he desired it to complete the tracts which he had purchased, and that to allow the executor to withdraw the land from sale for the purpose of carrying out a private sale for less than the amount of the petitioner's bid is against public policy. The reply to this contention is that petitioner, having acquired no right to compel a conveyance to him, and in fact having acquired no right at all, since his offer was rejected, is a stranger to that transaction, and has no right to inquire into the motives which prompted the executors to withdraw the property from sale; and, being such, he cannot make the question that the act of the executors was against public policy. The acts of the executors are open to inquiry only to the creditors, heirs, or legatees of the deceased, or to some other person having a beneficial interest in the estate of the testator.

We are therefore of opinion that the trial judge did not err in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

William H. BAIN, by Next Friend,
v.

Hyman I. ATKINS et al.

(.....Mass.....)

Insurance against loss through liability for personal injuries does not constitute a trust fund for the benefit of the injured person, and he cannot maintain an action against the insurer to reach such fund, where, before his claim against the insured is established, the insurer satisfies its obligation to him under the policy, although, by reason of the insolvency of the insured, the claim will be otherwise unenforceable.

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County, for the opinion of the full bench, of an action brought to reach the proceeds of an insurance policy to satisfy the claim of plaintiff for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant Atkins. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walter B. Grant and Thomas H. Buttler, for plaintiff:

A policy of insurance of this kind should be construed to be one in which the insurance company agrees to defend the action and assume and pay the liability to the extent of $5,000; and the insurance company must see to the proper application of the insurance money to the plaintiff's benefit.

Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Merrill, 155 Mass. 404, 29 N. E. 529.

The policy was not merely one of indemnity against any act of the employee; but, in case of an accident to an employee or other person, whereby he had a cause of action against the insured, the insurance company would assume and pay the liability.

NOTE.—For a case in this series somewhat similar to the above, see Embler v. Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 44 L. R. A. 512, although in that case a majority of the court put their decision on the ground that a recovery against the employer for the employee's death precluded recovery on a policy indemnifying the employer. But one judge, however, based his opinion on the ground that the employee had no right of action on the policy under any circumstances.

As to insurance against employer's liability generally, see, in this series, Anoka Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Minn.) 30 L. R. A. 689; Hoven v. West Superior Iron & S. Co. (Wis.) 32 L. R. A. 388; and Fenton v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Or.) 48 L. R. A. 770.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is now settled by the findings and the agreed facts that when the plaintiff began this attempt to reach, in liquidation of his claim against Atkins, a supposed obligation to Atkins on the part of the Union Casualty & Surety Company, that obligation was no longer in existence. The bill was filed on January 19, 1898. Nine days before that date the supposed obligation, disputed by the company, had been ended by an actual payment of money then made by the company to Atkins on a settlement made in good faith on the part of both, and without notice to either of any claim on the part of the plaintiff in the obligation, or founded upon it. The settlement was not made for the purpose of enabling Atkins to avoid his liability to the plaintiff, nor of enabling the company to avoid any liability to the plaintiff. When it was made the company had no knowledge of Atkins' financial condition. The settlement is found to have been made as in the ordinary course between two parties, one of whom denied all liability, and wanted to settle for as little as it could without injuring its reputation for fair dealing with those who insured with it, and the other of whom wanted to get all he could, up to the full amount of his claim. Atkins put into his business the $3,000 which he received in the settlement, and, had it not been for the judgment of $7,000 afterwards recovered against him by the plaintiff in the action of tort for personal injuries then pending, Atkins could have gone on with his business. He went into bankruptcy in consequence of that judgment, and has paid nothing upon the judgment, and the plaintiff has been unable to collect the judgment, in whole or in part.

We do not consider whether, if, when the bill was brought, the company had been under an existing obligation to indemnify Atkins against the plaintiff's demand, the latter could have compelled, in equity, the application of that obligation to the satisfaction of his claim against Atkins. The fact that when the plaintiff sought the aid of an equity court there was no such obligation is conclusive against the contention that there was an equity springing from such an obligation. Therefore the plaintiff is compelled to contend that the obligation of the company upon the happening of the accident constituted a fund for the benefit of the plaintiff, impressed with a trust for him; that such a trust fund could be paid to Atkins, if at all, only to reimburse him after he had satisfied his own liability to the plaintiff; and that the company's settlement with Atkins without the consent of the plaintiff was in the company's own wrong, and void as to the plaintiff. The essence of this contention, without which no part of it can stand, is that the insurance constituted a trust fund for the benefit of the plaintiff, and for this there is no ground. The only parties to the contract of insurance were Atkins and the company. The consideration for the company's promise came from Atkins alone, and the promise was only to him and his legal representatives. Not only was the plaintiff not a party to either the consideration or the contract, but the terms of the contract do not purport to promise an indemnity for the benefit of any person other than Atkins. The policy only purports to insure Atkins and his legal representatives against legal liability for damages respecting injuries from accidents to any person or persons at certain places, and within the time and under the circumstances defined. It contains no agreement that the insurance shall inure to the benefit of the person accidentally injured, and no language from which such an understanding or intention can be implied. Atkins was under no obligation to procure insurance for the benefit of the plaintiff, nor did any relation exist between the plaintiff and Atkins which could give the latter the right to procure insurance for the benefit of the plaintiff. The only correct statement of the situation is simply that the insurance was a matter wholly between the company and Atkins, in which the plaintiff had no legal or equitable interest, any more than in other property belonging absolutely to Atkins. Most of the cases cited in support of the plaintiff's contention are entirely wide of the mark. In all of them the obligation which the plaintiff sought to apply to the extinguishment of his demand existed when he brought his suit. In Anoka Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 63 Minn. 286, 30 L. R. A. 689, 65 N. W. 353; Hoven v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 93 Wis. 201, sub nom. Hoven v. West Superior Iron & S. Co. 32 L. R. A. 388, 67 N. W. 46, and Fritchie v. Miller's Pennsylvania Extract Co. 197 Pa. 401, 47 Atl. 351, the liability of the insurer was sought to be reached by process of garnishment. In American Employer's Liability Ins. Co. v. Fordyce, 62 Ark. 562, 36 S. W. 1051, and Fidelity & C. Co. v. Fordyce, 64 Ark. 174, 41 S. W. 420, the question was whether the insured must first pay the judgment in favor of the employee, before an action could be brought upon the policy. In Fenton v. Fidelity & C. Co. 36 Or. 283, 48 L. R. A. 770, 56 Pac. 1096, the action against the insurer by a surgeon who had attended an injured employee was allowed because of an assignment to the plaintiff of the cause of action. In Embler v. Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection & Ins. Co. 158 N. Y. 431, 44 L. R. A. 512, 53 N. E. 212, the decision was that a suit could not be maintained by an assignee of the administratrix of an employee who had been killed by an explosion, against the insurer, upon a policy issued to the employer. The decision was put by the majority of the court upon the ground that there was no such relation between the employee and his employer, and no such privity on the part of the employee to the contract of insurance, as gave him or his representatives a right of action upon the policy of insurance. It is to be noted that this policy was written before the enactment of the New York statute of 1892 (chap. 690, § 55), which authorizes an employer to take out insurance for the benefit of his employees. The case of Beacon Lamp Co. v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 59,

47 Atl. 579, was overruled by the court of last resort, which held that the obligation of the insurer was with the employer only, and left the person who had the claim for damages on account of the accident to rely only on obligations from the insurer to the employer existing when the bill was brought. Moses v. Travellers' Ins. Co. (N. J. Eq.) 49 Atl. 720. Hunt v. New Hampshire Fire Underwriters' Asso. 68 N. H. 305, 38 L. R. A. 514, 38 Atl. 145, grew out of the reinsurance by a solvent company of a part of a fire risk reinsured in part by a company which became insolvent after the loss by fire; and the right of the original insurer to the fund was a right in equity to avail itself of a then subsisting provision made by his insolvent debtor, the first reinsurer, for the payment of the claim of the original insurer. Neither that case nor those of the class of Locke v. Homer, 131 Mass. 93, 41 Am. Rep. 199, or Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 610, 33 L. ed. 667, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494, are put upon the ground of a trust. If the usual result of insurance against liability for damages respecting accidental injuries to others was to give money to the insured, when he was not obliged to compensate the person injured, it would be for the legislature to say whether such insurance should not be disallowed as contrary to public policy. The insurance written by the policy held by Atkins was in fact permitted by our statutes, and for his own benefit, and not for that of the persons whose injuries might give them a claim against him. The fact that, owing to his bankruptcy, the plaintiff's claim cannot be satisfied, although he has in fact received the insurance money, or a part of it, cannot make that a trust fund which neither the statute which allowed the contract, nor the contract which created the fund, impressed with a trust. Atkins had as full a right to settle with the company, and to use in his business the proceeds of the settlement, as to deal at his will with any other part of his property; and the company had a right to settle with him as it did.

Bill dismissed, with costs.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

NATIONAL MUTUAL BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION of New York

v.

F. V. BRAHAN.

(.....Miss.....)

1. Whether or not a loan by a foreign building and loan association to a resident of the state, secured by mortgage on land within the state, is usurious, will be determined by the local laws, notwithstanding the notes are payable at the domicile of the corporation, if it has localized its business by establishing boards throughout the state to which payments on loans are to be made.

2. Amended notices and pleas seeking to inject a Federal question into a case nearly two years after it has been at issue and ready for hearing may be stricken from the files.

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lauderdale County in favor of plaintiff for a part only of his demand in an action brought to recover usurious interest alleged to have been paid to defendant; defendant appealing from so much as permitted any recovery, and plaintiff appealing from so much as denied recovery of his entire claim. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal.

Defendant is a corporation under the laws of New York. It had no office or general agent in the state of Mississippi, but did have special agents or local boards in various parts of the state, with authority to solicit subscriptions for stock, to receive payment of dues, interest, and premiums, to receive applications for loans which should be transmitted to the home office for approval. Plaintiff subscribed for stock, procured a loan, which was paid off without the cancellation of the stock, and afterwards procured another loan, which was paid before the stock matured. He surrendered his stock, received credit for the surrender value, and paid the balance by draft on New York. Subsequently he instituted this suit to recover all interest paid by him on the two loans. The court held that the first loan, having been made prior to the passage of the act of 1892, was not usurious, and denied a recovery as to that. It, however, permitted a recovery as to the balance.

Mr. A. S. Boxeman for appellant.

Messrs. George B. Neville and F. V. Brahan for appellee.

Whitfield, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is controlled on the direct appeal, as to the loan made under the Code of 1892, by the cases of National Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Wilson, 78 Miss. 993, 30 So. 56; Shannon v. Georgia State Bldg. & L. Asso. 78 Miss. 955, post, 800, 30 So. 61, and the authorities therein cited; and National Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Burch, 124 Mich., at page 63, 82 N. W. 839, wherein this very appellant was appellant there, and the same conclusion reached by us in the first two cases above was reached by the supreme court of Michigan, the court saying: "It is said the contract is a New York contract, and must be governed by the New York law, and for that reason can be enforced. We do not think it at all clear this is a New York contract, or that it was so understood to be when it was made. While, by the terms of the mortgage, the loan was to be paid in New York, it was expected the money would be paid to the treasurer of the local branch at Muskegon, and most of it was paid to him." And emphatically to the same effect are the very thoroughly considered cases of Washington Nat. Bldg. L. & Invest. Asso. v. Stanley, 38 Or. 340, 58 L. R. A. —, 63 Pac. 489, and People's Bldg. Loan & Sav. Asso. v. Kidder, 9 Kan. App. 390, 58 Pac. 798, and Southern Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Atkinson, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 516, 50 S. W. 170. In Stanley's Case, at pages 340, 341, 38 Or., 58 L. R. A.,—page 495, 63 Pac., Judge Wolverton, in the course of a masterly opinion, says with great power: "The plaintiff contends, however, that the agreement must be treated as a Washington contract, and therefore should be construed with reference to the usury laws of that state, and incidentally, that the transaction of making the loan, and taking a note payable at Seattle, Washington, and a mortgage upon lands in Oregon, to secure its payment, was not doing business within this state. It is strange reasoning to insist, on the one hand, that, in order to enable the plaintiff to sue in our courts, it has complied with the law with that particularity which will enable it to do business in the state, and yet, when it is suggested that it has violated the laws of usury here by a transaction consummated under the same authority that authorizes the suit, to insist that it has not done business within the state. The very purpose of the act is to enable those associations having their domicils in other states to do and transact business and sue and be sued here, and it ought to be alike effective under all conditions. When they come here under the statute, and have the license of the secretary of state to do business here, they become pro hac vice domestic corporations, and must operate as if actually domiciled in the state. They submit and render themselves amenable to the laws of the state, which must be taken to govern all their transactions entered into and consummated 57 L. R. A.

therein. Our own citizens would not be permitted to make contracts here payable in another state, and then insist upon having them construed here according to the laws of such state; and it does not seem consistent with principle and reason that a foreign corporation, securing citizenship in this state for the purpose of promoting its business, can insist upon making its contracts payable elsewhere, and then invoke the authority and process of our courts to enforce them according to laws other than our own. If such were to be recognized as good law, it would in many instances give foreign corporations, although domiciled in this state, advantages over those organized under its laws, and having their principal place of business here. But the transaction, under the conditions attending it, must be regarded as doing business within this state. Bank of British Columbia v. Page, 6 Or. 431; Hacheny v. Leary, 12 Or. 40, 7 Pac. 329; Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 U. S. 727, 28 L. ed. 1137, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739. The contract was made in Oregon, and must be construed and enforced according to our laws. The application for stock and the loan was made in Oregon, to and by an association domiciled and doing business therein, through a resident solicitor. The mortgage was given upon an Oregon farm, and was executed and acknowledged here. The money was used here, and this suit was instituted in the county in which the mortgaged premises are situated, as contemplated by the association when it acquired the license to do business in the state. All this, notwithstanding the mortgage stipulation to the effect that it is a Washington contract, clearly shows its Oregon nativity, and it is therefore solvable by the laws thereof. Meroney v. Atlanta Bldg. & L. Asso. 116 N. C. 882, 21 S. E. 924; Martin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 481, 8 L. R. A. 170, 10 S. E. 1092; Dickinson v. Edwards, 77 N. Y. 573, 33 Am. Rep. 671; Jackson v. American Mortg. Co. 88 Ga. 756, 15 S. E. 812." All this is in exact line with what we held in Shannon's and Wilson's Cases as to what constituted "doing business" in a state, and as to the clear duty of the court to go behind the paper recital to the actual facts of the case as to the board being the agent of the company, and the money being really payable here. In Kidder's Case the whole contract was made by correspondence through the mail,—there was not only no local board, but not even an agent of the corporation in Kansas, and yet the court said: "These contracts were entered into by correspondence; they were drawn by plaintiff in New York and sent to defendants at Scandia, who executed and returned them to the plaintiff. All payments were to be made to the secretary of the association at Geneva, New York. . . . The contract for the purchase of stock and for the loan of money was made by correspondence between Kidder, in the state of Kansas, and the association, in New York; the place of performance as fixed was at the office of the association in the latter state. This contract, so far as its language could control, was entered into with reference to the laws of the state of New York, and was to be there performed; that is, the purchase price of the stock and the principal and interest upon the loan were to be paid at the association's office. However, the mortgage could only be enforced in the state of Kansas. A contract usually is entered into with reference to the laws of the state or country where it is made, or to be performed; but where a contract must be enforced in a particular place, the laws of that state may apply to such provisions of the contract as are in conflict with the laws thereof. In the foreclosure of a real-estate mortgage, the usury law of the state in which the land is situated will govern, although payment of the loan in another state is provided for by the terms of the contract. The contract amounts to an evasion of the usury laws, and it cannot be enforced. . . . It seems, however, that while the association desires to claim all the benefits of a New York contract as an abstract proposition, it desires the courts of this state to enforce the same as a Kansas contract, for the purpose of enabling it to secure the foreclosure of its lien upon Kansas soil for the payment of a usurious contract. This contract made as it was by correspondence, with a view of being enforced in this state, is a Kansas contract." This goes far beyond our holding in the Shannon and Wilson Cases. In Atkinson's Case in 20 Tex. Civ. App. 516, 50 S. W. 170, the court holds the local boards the agents of the company, and the notes Texas contracts, on the evidence, notwithstanding recitals to the contrary in the contract. It looked, as we did, to the actual facts. We add these very recent, and well-considered cases, to those cited in Shannon's and Wilson's Cases. They support fully, in every particular, the law as announced by us in those cases. And we call special attention to the fact that in Stanley's Case the cases of Alleyer v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 832, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427, and National Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Bedford, 88 Fed. 7, were cited and relied on without avail. See brief of counsel, 38 Or. 326. The judgment on the direct appeal is therefore affirmed.

On the cross appeal, as to the loan made under the act of 1886, the case of this Same Appellant v. Pinkston, controls. 79 Miss. 468.* The judgment on the cross appeal is therefore reversed, and the cause, as to that loan, remanded to be proceeded with in accordance with the opinion this day delivered in National Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Pinkston (Miss.) 31 So. 834. We desire, in passing upon the merits of the case, to say for the satisfaction of learned counsel for appellant, that we have, both in this case and in the case of Shannon v. Georgia State Bldg. & L. Asso. and National Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Wilson.—both reported in 78 Miss., 30 So.,—carefully considered the opinion of Judge

Hammond in 88 Fed. 7, and Judge McKenna in Bedford v. Eastern Bldg. & L. Asso. 181 U. S. 227, 45 L. ed. 834, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 597. The differences between that case and this and the Shannon and Wilson Cases are great and obvious. The statutes of this state construed by us in Shannon's Case and Wilson's Case are wholly different from the act of the legislature of Tennessee passed March 26, 1891, and from chapter 2 of the Acts of 1891, Laws of Tennessee, and the facts in this, and Shannon's Case, and Wilson's Case, are very much stronger for appellee than in Bedford's Case. The precise question for decision in Bedford's Case is thus stated in Bedford v. Eastern Bldg. & L. Asso. 181 U. S., at page 237, 45 L. ed. 843, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 600: The assignments of error present the question of the enforceability of the notes and mortgages under the Tennessee law, "or, as the question may be put, whether there was a contract between the parties,—a right in one, and an obligation in the other, arising from a consideration given and received; mutual covenants by which each party acquired the right to that which the other promised or engaged to do, and whether the laws of Tennessee as interpreted by its courts impaired that right." The question is again stated by the court at page 240, 181 U. S., page 844, 45 L. ed., and page 601, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep., thus: "The statutes of Tennessee relied on as a defense were passed March 26, 1891, and to repeat, the question is, Did the subscription to the stock of the association, its issuance and the application for a loan in pursuance of it, constitute a contract which was inviolable by the state legislature? We think the answer should be in the affirmative." The facts were shown to be, so far as decision is concerned, that Bedford made his application for a loan on the 20th of March, 1891, and that the business of the association in Tennessee, which business it had been there carrying on, was lawful at that time and up to March 26, 1891, when the legislature of the state of Tennessee passed chapter 122, § 2, of the Acts of 1891, prescribing the terms and conditions on which foreign corporations might do business in that state; that on the same day the legislature passed chapter 2 of the Acts of 1891 providing certain conditions, compliance with which the legislature made a condition precedent to the right of foreign building and loan associations to do business in that state, one of the conditions being that such foreign building and loan associations should "deposit and continually thereafter keep deposited, in trust for all of its members and creditors, with some responsible trust company, or with some state officer of this, or some other state of the United States, mortgages, or other securities, received by it in the usual course of its business amounting to not less than $25,000, nor more than $50,000 at the discretion of the state treasurer." The facts in the case show, as is clearly pointed out by Mr. Justice McKenna, that the contract was made and completed by Bedford's subscribing to the stock of the association, prior to the passage of both these statutes. And the facts further show that the court of chancery appeals of Tennessee, in United States Sav. & L. Co. v. Miller (Tenn. Ch. App.) 47 S. W. 17, which was affirmed on appeal by the supreme court of the state of Tennessee December 18, 1897 (and it will be specially noted, without written opinion), held that a contract, similar to the contract in Bedford's Case, was a New York contract. This had also been held by the supreme court of Tennessee in Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. v. Cannon, 96 Tenn. 603, 33 L. R. A. 112, 36 S. W. 386, without any citation of authorities. Note, that it seems to have been conceded in that case that the contract was a Minnesota contract, and no point was made as to that. The facts, however, in Pioneer Sav. & L. Co. v. Cannon are very different indeed from the facts in Bedford's Case, the facts in Miller's Case, and the facts in this case.

*This case held that the act of 1886, which exempted building and loan associations from the statutes in regard to usury, did not apply to foreign building and loan associations.

The precise point decided, therefore, in Bedford's Case in 181 U. S. 237, 45 L. ed. 843, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 600, was simply and only this, that, inasmuch as the contract of loan had been fully made prior to the passage of the two Tennessee statutes involved, a reciprocal fixed and vested right on Bedford's part to demand the loan, and on the company's part to require him to complete the loan, had attached prior to the passage of the acts,—the obligation of which contract so made prior to these statutes it was not within the power of the state of Tennessee, by legislation, to impair. That, that precisely, and nothing more nor less than that, was what was decided in Bedford's Case, and was all that was decided in Bedford's Case. Any observations of the court in 88 Fed. 7, beyond what was thus decided, were not necessary to decision, and were mere obiter dicta. We understand Bedford's Case as decided in 181 U. S. 237, 45 L. ed. 843, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 600, to be in perfect harmony with our decision in Shannon's Case and Wilson's Case, 78 Miss., 30 So. We put the decision in Shannon's Case as follows (see p. 964, 78 Miss., and p. 52, 30 So.): "The chief point of contention is whether this is a Georgia or a Mississippi contract. It is true the notes were payable in Georgia, but the mortgage was on land in Mississippi, and the debtor lived in Mississippi, where alone the mortgage could have been enforced. All the payments through a series of years were actually made in Mississippi, instead of Georgia, to the local treasurer here, and it is manifest it was intended they should be made here. This foreign corporation had the power to organize local boards throughout Georgia and other states. It did organize a local board, thoroughly officered, at Ellisville, in this state, and to the local secretary and treasurer of this board all payments were made by the appellant and his vendor, and by other members of this association, through a series of years. It is obvious that this foreign corporation has thus localized its Mississippi business within the state of Mississippi. It is not a case of a nonresident money lender, or a foreign corporation, in a few isolated cases dealing with our citizens and taking notes payable in the state of the domicile of such person or corporation. It is the case of a localization, within this state, of a large business done by a foreign corporation on the faith of mortgages on land in this state, the payments to be made to the secretary and treasurer of their respective local boards scattered throughout the state. Wherever, under circumstances such as these, the foreign corporation, thus localizing its business within this state, has the payment made to the secretary or treasurer of a local board, the real intention of the parties is that the payments shall be made in this state, and the only purpose of reciting the contrary in the notes is to evade the usury laws of this state. The contract is a Mississippi contract according to the real facts and the real intention of the parties. Courts look through all disguises to the real case made by the actual facts." And again on page 970, 78 Miss., page 54, 30 So.: "And it is immaterial whether the foreign corporation is doing business under a license here, or has, without such license, localized its business and domesticated itself here as to such business. And the act of 1890, p. 10, places 'each branch office' and 'each agency' on the same footing exactly, treating each as a separate and distinct building and loan association, and taxes each as such. The general doctrine is, of course, well settled that the law of a place where the contract is to be performed governs the contract; and the presumption that this contract was to be performed according to the laws of Georgia, simply because the notes were payable in Georgia, is, at last, nothing but a mere presumption to that effect, subject to be overcome by proof that in truth and in fact they intended the money to be paid in Mississippi. When all there is, in a case like this, to show that the intention was to perform the contract in a foreign state, is a mere specious paper recital in the notes, and over against this, and contrary to this, are all the other facts in the case, and the whole course of dealing between the parties, it would be an abdication of common sense on the part of any court, to find the real intention of the parties in the paper recital, instead of in the real facts of the case. It must be remembered that the state has the power to prescribe the terms on which foreign corporations may do business. It is declared in § 849 of the Code of 1892, last clause: 'Such foreign corporations shall not do or commit any act in this state contrary to the laws or policy thereof, and shall not be allowed to recover on any contract made in violation of law or public policy.' This is the plain mandate of our law, which must be rigidly enforced by the courts. And the Code elsewhere provides that (§ 2348) domestic building and loan associations are excluded from the operation of the usury laws, but foreign building and loan associations are subject to them; and to enforce this public policy, thus declared by the statute, is not to give extraterritorial operation to our statutes. On the contrary, this corporation has come into the state, localized its business here, through local boards scattered all over the state, and must submit such business thus localized to the operation of the laws of the state. To hold otherwise would operate the grossest injustice to our citizens, and would virtually abrogate our statutes against usury." And again, on page 974, 78 Miss., page 55, 30 So.: "Foreign corporations wishing to do business with our citizens, and localizing that business within our state through local boards, must comply with the laws of this state. They cannot, under such circumstances, enforce here stipulations in contracts allowed by the law of the state which created them, if these stipulations violate our laws or public policy. Such laws of such foreign states can have, ex proprio vigore, no extraterritorial effect, and it is not competent for a foreign corporation, whose business has been localized in this state, or the borrower, or both, to abrogate, by attempted contract, stipulations whose purpose it is to evade our laws against usury,—the laws of this state on that subject. This holding in no way interferes with the right of a foreign corporation, whose business has not been localized here, to make contracts with borrowers, to be governed by the laws of the state of their domicile, if there be no purpose therein to evade the usury laws of this state. Such liberty of contracting, exercised in good faith, is not herein interfered with. The authorities cited to that point by counsel for appellee are not pertinent to cases like the one before us. All the cases are admirably collected in a note to Bank of Newport v. Cook (Ark.) 46 Am. St. Rep. 171. In that note the learned editor points out, on page 202, the distinction to be observed; saying: 'The proper answer to this argument is, that mere shams and evasions are not permitted to counteract and annul the law; and where it appears that the purpose of the parties in making the obligation payable in another state was to evade the law against usury of the state in which it was executed, it will be regarded as infected with usury.' " And in that decision we supported our conclusion by authorities drawn from many states to which we again refer, and which we again approve. Now, it is perfectly plain, to the most casual observation, that the point on which the Shannon Case hinged, which was supported by the facts in that case, and by the authorities cited, was not even presented to the court,—either to the judge of the circuit court of the United States in 88 Fed., or to the United States Supreme Court in 181 U. S., 45 L. ed., 21 Sup. Ct. Rep., supra. There was not a suggestion of this point in that case as presented either in the lower court or the Supreme Court, nor was any such point presented, in any manner, in any of the cases previously cited from the supreme court of Tennessee. In other words, the facts in Shannon's Case, a Mississippi case, presented a ground for decision under the statutes of this state, not even hinted at in Bedford's Case, or Miller's Case, or Cannon's 57 L. R. A.

Case, in 99 Tenn. 344, 41 S. W. 1054, or the other Cannon Case in 96 Tenn., 36 S. W., 33 L. R. A., and that ground of decision was that the foreign corporation had many local boards scattered throughout this state, which local boards were the agents manifestly of the corporation, through which boards the corporation had been for years transacting business in this state, making large numbers of loans, involving large sums of money, and had thus localized its business here, and had domesticated itself as to that business within this state. The very converse of this, it clearly appears, was true in Bedford's Case. Mr. Justice McKenna takes pains to point out, at page 236, 181 U. S., 45 L. ed. 837, page 600, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep., that after the passage of the act of March 26, 1891, the loan company transacted no further business in Tennessee (no new business), confining itself strictly,—so as to avoid the statute,—to completing loans contracted prior to the passage of these acts, and at page 241, 181 U. S., page 844, 45 L. ed., and page 602, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep., he says: "It might, indeed, have the right to decline any condition and retire from the state, and from all it had the option to retire from. But it could not retire from the execution of its contracts. It contracted with Bedford to make him a loan, if it had the means in its treasury, and his security was good. The state could not affect that obligation nor impair it. . . . We recognize the power of the state to impose conditions upon foreign corporations doing business in the state. We have affirmed the existence of that power many times, but manifestly it cannot be exercised to discharge the citizens of the state from their contract obligations." Language could not more plainly say that the only point decided in the case was that, inasmuch as Bedford and the company had already completed their contract before these acts were passed, the legislature could not by a subsequent act impair the contract; there is not the slightest suggestion in the opinion of the court that the facts on which the opinion in the Shannon Case was based were ever presented to the court. Again, the Supreme Court of the United States very naturally followed the supreme court of Tennessee, as to there being no usury in the Bedford contract, since that court, in the light of the contract in the pioneer case, had held that a similar contract made in Tennessee, payable in Minnesota, was a Minnesota contract, and had also held the same in the Miller Case (Tenn. Ch. App.) 47 S. W. 17. What the Tennessee supreme court thus held in construction of the contracts in those cases, and also in construction of their usury statutes, the Supreme Court of the United States properly followed, under the well-settled doctrine that that court will always follow the interpretation put upon state statutes—merely local laws—by the supreme court of the state whose statutes they are dealing with. Under our statutes, which are materially different, as is shown in Shannon's Case, from the statutes of Tennessee, and under the facts in this case and Shannon's Case and Wilson's Case, which in all these cases are vitally different from the facts in Bedford's Case, we hold the contracts are usurious, and in so holding we are doing nothing more nor less than construing our own statutes as to usury, and our statutes imposing privilege taxes on "each branch office" and "each agency" of a foreign building and loan association. See Laws 1890, p. 10; Shannon's Case, 78 Miss. 970, 30 So. 51. Furthermore, it is made perfectly plain by Mr. Justice McKenna that the supreme court of Tennessee, in Cannon's Case, 99 Tenn., 41 S. W., and in Miller's Case (Tenn. Ch. App.) 47 S. W. 17, held that the contracts were not Tennessee contracts, but that they were nevertheless void, because the foreign corporations had not complied with the terms and conditions prescribed by the legislature of Tennessee, upon compliance with which alone they were authorized to do business in that state. The Supreme Court of the United States, therefore, in the Bedford Case had no trouble in finding the contract a New York contract, because they simply followed the supreme court of Tennessee. That, therefore, was not the point of decision. The respect in which it reversed the supreme court of Tennessee was merely in its holding that the borrower did not have a vested right to the loan nor the association a legal right (see 99 Tenn. 348, 41 S. W. 1054) to have it consummated, even though the contract had been completed prior to the passage of the act of March 26, 1891. One other thing is to be distinctly noted, that the Supreme Court of the United States does not approve all that is said by Judge Hammond in 88 Fed. 7. If we pass by some of the rather heated expressions in that opinion, as, for instance, those in which he speaks of the "vaunted police power of a state," and those in which, speaking of the public policy declared by the legislature of the state of Tennessee, he says that "possibly the oft-reiterated charge that the real purpose of the legislation was to make fees for the registration officers in the different counties may furnish a clue to the kind of public policy which is the foundation of the legislation,"—expressions thrown off, unadvisedly, currente calamo, we will see that Judge Hammond himself, at page 20, 88 Fed., states the proposition, in harmony with Shannon's Case, as follows: "Foreign corporations that desire such domestication must comply with the provisions of these statutes; and if they carry on their business in the same manner that domestic corporations do, and make their contracts to be performed within the state of Tennessee without compliance with these acts, then they are within the pains and penalties of the statutes. But if they confine their business to their own home places, make their contracts there, to be performed there, as was done in this case, they are not within the pains and penalties of the acts, and such contracts are not affected by them. As to such contracts, it is not within the power of the state to discharge or suspend their obligations." If the learned judge had consigned his decision to what he here, and at page 13, says correctly was the question for decision, to wit, whether the acts of the Tennessee legislature could suspend or discharge the obligation of this contract made before their passage, he would have relieved us of the necessity of reviewing his opinion on two or three points, which we shall now note.

First. He holds that the local boards are agents of the borrower; the direct contrary of this was held in the unanswerable opinion of Justice Brown in Supreme Lodge, K. of P. v. Withers, 177 U. S. 260, 44 L. ed. 762, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611, followed by us in Murphy v. Independent Order of S. & D. of J. of A. 77 Miss. 830, 50 L. R. A. 111, 27 So. 624, and Shannon's Case, 78 Miss. 975, 30 So. 51. The obvious fallacy of the reasoning of the learned judge is that he treats the mere specious paper recital in the contract that the local boards are the agents of the borrowers, as conclusive of that fact; when plainly such recital furnishes nothing but a mere presumption that that is true. It is a mere presumption, and subject, like all such presumptions, to be overcome by proof to the contrary. And where, as in Shannon's Case, the testimony of the witnesses shows clearly that the local boards were scattered all over the state, and that it had been the practice for years for these local boards to receive all payments, and solicit loans, all this solicitation and payment of money taking place in this state, these boards all the while acting in everything they did under the orders of the company, and for the company, it is an affront to common sense to deny what is thus made plain, that both parties meant and understood those boards to be the agents of the company, and the money to be payable in Mississippi. Whether one is the agent of another depends, not on any mere paper recital,—which may easily be worded to hide the real purpose,—but on his acts,—what he actually does. If his actual conduct, his actual doings every day for years, shows he is acting as agent for the company, then courts would be weak, indeed, which should hold, against these facts, that he was agent for the borrower simply because there was a fraudulent paper recital to that effect. And all these observations apply with equal force to the mere recital that the notes were to be payable in New York. What we have said in the Shannon Case on this subject we reaffirm, and refer again here to the authorities from other states on this point, there cited. It is doubtless an extremely easy method of escaping the labor of investigation to say that local boards are the agents of the borrower, and the moneys are payable in New York, simply because the paper recital says so. But courts discharge their whole duty only when they look deeper than prepared recitals, to the actual facts of every case. Suppose it were true, in a given case, that the intention to pay in the foreign state was really true as recited at the inception of the contract, is it possible that it can be contended that it is not in the power of the parties to discharge that feature of the original contract by a long course of dealing to the contrary? How much stronger is the case when the original recitation was made to evade the positive statute law of a state, and manifestly for no other purpose,—the whole course of dealing from the inception of the contract demonstrating this beyond doubt?

Second. He says on page 16, 88 Fed.: "It is decided in Allgeyer's Case that it can be enforced if the contract is made through the agency of the mails." With all deference, we hold that nothing of the sort was decided in Allgeyer's Case. On the contrary, Mr. Justice Peckham in that opinion (165 U. S. 587, 41 L. ed. 832, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 430), says: "In the case before us the contract was made beyond the territory of the state of Louisiana, and the only thing that the facts show was done within that state was the mailing of a letter of notification, as above mentioned, which was done after the principal contract had been made." Again, at page 588, 165 U. S., page 835, 41 L. ed., and page 431, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep., he says: "We have, then, a contract which it is conceded was made outside and beyond the limits of the jurisdiction of the state of Louisiana, being made and to be performed within the state of New York, where the premiums were to be paid and losses, if any, adjusted. The letter of notification did not constitute a contract made or entered into within the state of Louisiana. It was but the performance of an act rendered necessary by the provisions of the contract already made between the parties outside of the state. It was a mere notification that the contract already in existence would attach to that particular property." Again, he says at page 592, 165 U. S., page 836, 41 L. ed., and page 432, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep.: "The giving of the notice is a mere collateral matter; it is not the contract itself, but is an act performed pursuant to a valid contract, which the state had no right or jurisdiction to prevent its citizens from making outside the limits of the state." The learned judge—whom we hold in the highest esteem—has manifestly misconceived Allgeyer's Case. Another misconception of his is this: He says at page 16, 88 Fed.: "I suppose it would be agreed that if the defendant had made the same contract through the agency of the express company, that it would not have been illegal; or if he had put a messenger on the cars, and sent him with a power of attorney to the city of New York, it would not have been illegal. Now, why is it any more illegal to negotiate through persons in Tennessee who are willing to take the burden of attending to the details, and transmitting their correspondence through the mails?" This is answered completely in the language of Mr. Justice White in Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 658, 39 L. ed. 301, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 610, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211: "It is said that the right of a citizen to contract for insurance for himself is guaranteed by the 14th Amendment, and that, therefore, he cannot be deprived by the state of the ca-capacity to so contract through an agent. The 14th Amendment, however, does not guarantee the citizen the right to make within his state, either directly or indirectly, a contract, the making whereof is constitutionally forbidden by the state. The proposition that, because a citizen might make such a contract for himself beyond the confines of his state, therefore he might authorize an agent to violate in his behalf the laws of his state, within her own limits, involves a clear non sequitur, and ignores the vital distinction between acts done within and acts done beyond a state's jurisdiction." This language is quoted and reaffirmed in Allgeyer's Case by Justice Peckham at page 588, 165 U. S., page 835, 41 L. ed., and page 431, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. The learned judge in 88 Fed. confuses the case of a single isolated borrowing—as Allgeyer's Case—with "doing business" in the state,—a very different thing indeed. The dissenting opinion in Hooper's Case shows at page 661, 155 U. S., page 302, 39 L. ed., page 623, 5 Inters. Com. Rep., and page 212, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep., this very difference, the dissenting justices saying: "This single act of the company cannot be held to prove that it proposed to transact business in that state, or that it contemplated the issuing of any other policy to a resident of California. . . . Indeed, the prosecution in the present case manifestly had in mind the difference between a single act of insuring property and 'proposing to transact insurance business by agent or agents.'" Again, at the bottom of the page it is pointed out "as an abridgment of the privileges, not of a foreign corporation, but of individual citizens of other states," etc. We are not dealing in this case with a single individual citizen borrowing from appellant having made his contract out of the state in New York, and giving them notice, collaterally by mail or not; we are dealing with the case of a foreign corporation transacting an immense business in the state, through a large number of local boards of control,—its own agents manifestly,—such foreign corporation having thus localized its business in this state, and having—precisely as was done in Oregon, Stanley's Case, 38 Or. 340, 58 L. R. A. —, 63 Pac. 489,—become domesticated here, as to that business. If on facts like these, under statutes such as we have on usury, and the laws taxing "each local board" or "branch" or "agency" of a foreign building and loan association, the state has no power to declare this contract violative of our statutes and public policy, then, indeed, is the boasted authority of a state to prevent infraction of its positive statute law and its public policy by a foreign corporation a meaningless platitude,—a veritable mockery. But we find and quote, to give it our most unqualified indorsement, a most able statement of this view in the Supreme Court of the United States in Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 658, 39 L. ed. 301, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 610, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211, where the court, through Mr. Justice White, says: "If the contention of the plaintiff in error were admitted, the established authority of the state to prevent a foreign corporation from carrying on business within its limits, either absolutely or except upon certain conditions, would be destroyed. It would be only necessary for such a corporation to have an understanding with a resident that in the effecting of contracts between itself and other residents of the state, he should be considered the agent of the insured persons, and not of the company. This would make the exercise of a substantial and valuable power by a state government depend, not on the actual facts of the transactions over which it lawfully seeks to extend its control, but upon the disposition of a corporation to resort to a mere subterfuge in order to evade obligations properly imposed upon it. Public policy forbids a construction of the law which leads to such a result, unless logically unavoidable." There is no such vagueness about the phrase "doing business within the state," or "negotiating business within the state,"—no "such ambiguity or elasticity in its quality,"—as seems to be apprehended by the learned judge in 88 Fed., at page 17, we humbly submit. The United States Supreme Court has made the meaning of that phrase, to our thinking, clear as light. This appellant was "doing business in this state" within the definition of that phrase by the Federal Supreme Court, and doing it through its own agents,—its local boards,—as held by the Federal Supreme Court in Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Withers, 177 U. S. 260, 44 L. ed. 762, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611. We refer again here to the citation from Stanley's Case in the opening of this opinion, as to what constitutes "doing business in a state."

We have thus, at some length, noticed the Bedford Case as set out in 88 Fed. 7, in 181 U. S. 227, 45 L. ed. 834, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 597, and also Allgeyer's Case, with the view of satisfying the thoroughly industrious and very able counsel of the appellant. It may be a vain effort to satisfy one who seems to doubt so strongly, but so high is the regard in which we hold him, that we have undertaken the task in the hope that a more patient and thorough examination of this case, and the others to which we have referred in this, and in the Cases of Shannon and Wilson, will enable him to concur in the correctness of the conclusion at which we have arrived, on our statutes, and the facts in our cases.

It is only necessary to add that the court, properly, under our statutes and practice, struck from the files the amended notices and pleas, the object of which was to inject into the case, nearly two years after the cause had been at issue, and ready for hearing, a Federal question. It is clearly shown that the appellant, after its motion to remove the cause to the Federal court had been overruled July 29, 1899, filed the plea of general issue, with elaborate notice, on September 27, 1899; that afterwards, without having first obtained leave of the court, it filed, on April 20, 1901, some eighteen months after the cause was at issue, an amended notice—a wholly different notice—under its plea of the general issue; and that later, on August 6, 1901, again without having obtained leave to do so, it filed an amendment to its pleas, and an amended—so called—notice, wholly different from its first notice, nearly two years after the cause had been at issue and ready for trial. This effort, by these amendments to the pleas and notice, was simply an after-thought, an effort, at that late stage, to inject a Federal question into the record. Appellant also asked an instruction, and filed a series of reasons why the instruction should be granted. It was an extraordinary procedure to file with a requested instruction a page or two of written reasons why it should be granted. The purpose was obvious. It was another ingenious, but unsuccessful, effort to inject the Federal question into the record. If the court had allowed the amended notice and pleas to be filed, which presented nothing on the merits, but simply the alleged Federal question, then there would have been an issue involving the Federal question, to which an instruction would have been appropriate. But the court had very properly, in accordance with our statutes and practice, refused leave to file the amended pleas and notices, and stricken them from the files, on the obvious ground that appellant had presented them entirely too late,—nearly two years after the cause had been fully at issue and waiting for trial. Such delay was gross laches, and the court properly refused the leave to file them.

Affirmed on direct appeal and reversed on cross appeal.

Affirmed by Supreme Court of United States April 4, 1904.

Charles R. SHANNON, Appt.,
v.

GEORGIA STATE BUILDING & LOAN ASSOCIATION.

(78 Miss. 955.)

1. An assignee of property subject to a usurious mortgage may recover from the mortgagee the whole usurious interest paid by himself and his assignor.
2. A contract with a building and loan association for a loan, which provides for a fixed premium which, added to the interest reserved, exceeds the legal rate, is usurious.
3. Whether or not a loan by a foreign building and loan association to a resident of the state, secured by mortgage on land within the state, is usurious, will be determined by the local laws, notwithstanding the notes are payable at the domicile of the corporation, if it has localized its business by establishing boards throughout the state to which payments on loans are to be made.
4. A foreign building and loan association which localizes its business in a state cannot complain of a provision of its laws making foreign associations subject to the usury laws, but exempting domestic associations therefrom.

NOTE.—See the preceding case and footnotes thereto.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jones County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover usurious interest alleged to have been paid to defendant. Reversed.

Plaintiff's mother contracted with defendant, through its local agency at Ellisville, for a loan, to secure which she executed a deed of trust on real estate in Jones county. Under the by-laws of the association she was required to pay interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and a fixed premium at 6 per cent per annum on the amount of the loan, payable in monthly instalments. The notes were made payable in Georgia, but the by-laws permitted payment to be made to the local agent in Mississippi. Subsequently Mrs. Shannon conveyed the property to her son, and he assumed the obligation to defendant. He paid off the indebtedness, and instituted this action to recover the amount of interest which had been paid by himself and his mother, on the ground that it was usurious.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Shannon & Street, for appellant:

"Premium" is but another name for interest; hence it is clear that appellee has charged and collected 12 per cent per annum interest on a loan made in this state. Having violated the laws of this state by contracting for an illegal and usurious rate of interest, and not being included among the exceptions of § 2348 of the Code of 1892, appellee must suffer the penalty.

Sokoloski v. New South Bldg. & L. Asso. 77 Miss. 155, 26 So. 361; Bond v. Jones, 8 Smedes & M. 368; Chaffe v. Wilson, 59 Miss. 42.

Appellant, a substituted debtor, could take advantage of the usurious contract.

M'Alister v. Jerman, 32 Miss. 142; Chaffe v. Wilson, 59 Miss. 42; Boyd v. Warmack, 62 Miss. 536.

Messrs. Frank Johnston and Stirling & Harris, also for appellant:

Primarily a contract is governed by the laws of the state where it is made; but, where it is to be performed in another state, it may be governed by the laws of the place of performance. This is merely a matter of presumption, arising out of the supposed intentions of the parties in respect to what law was contemplated by them in making the contract. There is nothing conclusive about these presumptions, and they must yield to the facts and circumstances of a particular case, which indicate the real purpose and intent of the parties.

Brown Bros. v. Freeland, 34 Miss. 181, 69 Am. Dec. 389; Commercial Bank v. Auzé, 74 Miss. 609, 21 So. 754.

Contracts of a foreign building and loan association doing a local business in this state through local agents, and making contracts in this state, are governed by the usury laws of this state.

Tex. Civ. App. 519, 50 S. W. 166; Meroney v. Atlanta Bldg. & L. Asso. 116 N. C. 882, 21 S. E. 924.

Where a money-lending foreign corporation establishes and carries on a local business in a state through local agents, its contracts are governed by the usury laws of the state; and those laws cannot be evaded or abrogated by any contract stipulation whatever.

Building & L. Asso. v. Griffin, 90 Tex. 480, 39 S. W. 656; Perkins v. Garner, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 519, 50 S. W. 166; Martin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 481, 8 L. R. A. 170, 10 S. E. 1092; Fletcher v. New York L. Ins. Co. 4 McCrary, 440, 13 Fed. 526, 117 U. S. 519, 29 L. ed. 934, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 837; Wall v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 32 Fed. 273; Western Assur. Co. v. Asso. 77 Miss. 155, 26 So. 361; Crofton v. New South Bldg. & L. Asso. 77 Miss. 166, 26 So. 362.

Messrs. Williamson, Wells, & Croom and Hardy & Howell, for appellee:

Usury is a personal plea, and appellant, being in no sense privy to the contract, cannot avail himself of it,—especially to the extent of suing to recover interest paid on the loan by the party privy to it.

Moses Bros. v. Home Bldg. & L. Asso. 100 Ala. 465, 14 So. 412; Conover v. Hobart, 24 N. J. Eq. 120.

Appellant, in August, 1899, withdrew the shares, which he had a right to do under the by-laws, and received from the association $172, the value thereof. This settlement was made voluntarily, with full knowledge and notice, without any concealment or mistake of fact.

Appellant is estopped from claiming or suing for usury.

Natchez Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Shields, 71 Miss. 630, 15 So. 793; Building & L. Asso. v. Leonard, 74 Miss. 810, 21 So. 53.

Accord and satisfaction is a complete defense to appellant's contention in this case.

Looby v. West Troy, 24 Hun, 78; Pom. Code Remedies, 3d ed. § 665; Berdell v. Bissell, 6 Colo. 162.

This contract is not usurious under the laws of Georgia, where the association is domiciled and transacts all of its business and makes all its contracts.

Whitfield, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is thoroughly settled in this state, under facts like those in this record, that the appellant can recover the whole of the interest. M'Alister v. Jerman, 32 Miss. 142; Chaffe v. Wilson, 59 Miss. 42. The appellant stood as a substituted debtor, and had all the rights the original debtor had. The premium in this case was fixed, and the contract was therefore usurious. See the case of Sokoloski v. New South Bldg. & L. Asso. 77 Miss. 155-166, 26 So. 361.

The chief point of contention is whether this is a Georgia or a Mississippi contract. It is true, the notes were payable in Georgia; but the mortgage was on land in Mississippi, and the debtor lived in Mississippi, where alone the mortgage could have been enforced. All the payments through a series of years were actually made in Mississippi, instead of Georgia, to the local treasurer here, and it was manifest it was intended they should be made here. This foreign corporation had the power to organize local boards throughout Georgia and other states. It did organize a local board, thoroughly officered, at Ellisville, in this state; and to the local secretary and treasurer of this board all payments were made by the appellant and his vendor, and by other members of this association, through a series of years. It is obvious that this foreign corporation had thus localized its Mississippi business within the state of Mississippi. It is not the case of a nonresident money lender or a foreign corporation in a few isolated cases dealing with our citizens, and taking notes payable in the state of the domicile of such person or corporation. It is the case of a localization within this state of a large business done by a foreign corporation on the faith of mortgages on land in this state, the payments to be made to the secretary and treasurer of their respective local boards, scattered throughout the state. Whenever, under circumstances such as these, the foreign corporation thus localizing its business within this state has the payments made to the secretary or treasurer of a local board, the real intention of the parties is that the payments shall be made in this state, and the only purpose of reciting the contrary in the notes is to evade the usury laws of this state. The contract is a Mississippi contract, according to the real facts and the real intention of the parties. Courts look through all disguises to the real case made by the actual facts. This proposition is abundantly supported by the authorities. In the precisely parallel case of Building & L. Asso. v. Griffin, 90 Tex. 488, 39 S. W. 659, the court says: "It therefore became domiciled in the state, the same as an individual would who came here for the purpose of doing a like business, and yet retained his citizenship in the state from which he came. The borrower lived in Texas. All of the property that he owned, so far as we know, was situated in this state. At least, there is nothing to indicate that he owned any property in the territory of Dakota. To secure the payment of the debt, a deed of trust was taken upon the property situated in this state. Upon these facts, the question is to be determined whether or not the contract, under the evidence and surrounding circumstances, was really intended to be performed in the territory of Dakota or in the state of Texas. The general rule of law contended for by the loan company, that a contract which is to be performed in a state other than that in which it is made may reserve interest according to the laws of either state, is too well settled to require discussion or the citation of authority; but the law looks to the substance of the contract, and will not tolerate any contrivance by which it is intended to evade the laws of a state in which the contract is made or sought to be enforced. The fact that the contract expresses that the money borrowed is to be paid in the territory of Dakota is met by the real, substantial provisions for its enforcement, and the circumstances under which the business was transacted, with such overwhelming force, that we are brought to the conclusion that the contract, in so far as it provided by its terms for the payment of the money in the territory of Dakota, was simply a device to evade the laws of this state, and that these facts are so manifest from the face of the papers themselves that it ceases to be a question of fact, but becomes a matter of law, to be determined from the undisputed evidence that is thus furnished. The contract having been made with a view to its enforcement in the state of Texas, and not in the territory of Dakota, the agreement expressed in it that it should be paid in the territory of Dakota was intended to enable the loan company, by authority of the laws of this state, to do business in Texas, and set our laws at defiance with impunity, and it cannot be enforced by the courts of this state. Tyler, Usury, p. 83; Miller v. Tiffany, 1 Wall. 298, 17 L. ed. 540; Falls v. United States Sav. Loan & Bldg. Co. 97 Ala. 417, 24 L. R. A. 174, 13 So. 25; Meroney v. Atlanta Bldg. & L. Asso. 116 N. C. 882, 21 S. E. 924; Martin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 481, 8 L. R. A. 170, 10 S. E. 1092; Fowler v. Bell, 90 Tex. 150, 39 L. R. A. 254, 37 S. W. 1058. In Meroney v. Atlanta Bldg. & L. Asso. 116 N. C. 882, 21 S. E. 924, the court says, at page 887, 116 N. C., and page 926, 21 S. E.: "It is important that foreign capital invested within our borders shall have, to the very utmost, its just dues, and that it shall find our courts ready now, as they have always been, to protect its interest and enforce all its lawful rights. But it is important, also, that the settled policy of the state should be upheld by its courts, and that schemes which to them seem manifestly adopted merely to evade its usury laws should not be allowed to bring about a virtual abrogation of those statutes. If a foreign bank or other lender of money may establish local branches or offices in this state, and through its agents solicit and take application for loans on mortgages of land here, to be sent to the home office, to be passed upon and allowed there, and if, because of such arrangement, and the insertion of a statement, put in the note or mortgage, that the contract is 'solvable' in the foreign jurisdiction, and is made 'with reference to its laws,' the courts of this state are required to enforce such contracts, and decree a foreclosure of the mortgage and a sale of the land, that the foreign usurer may have his usury, then, surely, will it have come to pass that it is no longer true that there is no 'cover or device' by which the wholesome restraints put upon the money lenders by our statutes may be escaped. Upon this subject there is in Martin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 481, 8 L. R. A. 170, 10 S. E. 1092, a most emphatic declaration from the highest court of the state that is the domicile of the defendant corporation. A loan of money had been made by a citizen of Massachusetts, through an agent in Georgia, to a citizen of the latter state, secured by mortgage on land there, but payable in the former state. It was contended that the rights of the mortgage were not to be governed by the laws of Georgia in respect to usury because the note was payable in Massachusetts. The court said: 'If this court should hold that a note made in this state, but payable in the state of Massachusetts, for money advanced by the agent of a person who resides in Massachusetts, could be collected, notwithstanding it contained 16 per cent usurious and unlawful interest, then the law of this state as to usury would be inoperative and useless; the money lenders of those states that have no usury laws, but which allow to be collected any rate of interest contracted for, could flood this state with their agents, and by the loan of money exact the highest rate of interest, even 100 per cent.' It seems, therefore, that the principle for which the defendant corporation contends is denied in the courts of its own domicile, that a foreign money lender, loaning money in Georgia on mortgage on Georgia land, must be content, in a foreclosure proceeding, to have the amount due determined by Georgia law. The reasons that support the rule there are valid here. The rules of comity require us to allow foreign corporations a standing in our courts to enforce the valid contracts they may have made with our citizens, and all such liens upon property situated within this state as they have lawfully acquired. But that comity does not require that we should allow foreign corporations to enforce contracts here, if such enforcement would be in conflict with our laws, and, being thus in conflict, the enforcement thereof would work against our own citizens, and give to the foreigner an advantage that the resident has not. Walter v. Whitlock, 9 Fla. 86, 78 Am. Dec. 607. Much less does it require that we should allow a Georgia corporation to enforce a mortgage loan which is illegal and void by our laws (Ward v. Sugg, 113 N. C. 480, 24 L. R. A. 280, 18 S. E. 717), while in that state the rule is as stated in Martin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 481, 8 L. R. A. 170, 10 S. E. 1092. It is well settled, so well settled that authorities need not be cited, that a purely personal contract made in one place, to be executed in another, is to be governed by the laws of the place of performance. This general rule is subject to the qualification that the parties act in good faith, and that the form of the transaction is not adopted to disguise its real character. Tyler, Usury, p. 83. Now, it seems very manifest to us, considering all the facts and circumstances, that this Georgia corporation required the plaintiff, a citizen and resident of this state, to declare, in the obligation given by him to it for the money loaned him, that the contract was solvable in that state, and was made with reference to its laws, not because it was contemplated by either of the parties that the money would be paid there, or that the parties would enforce their respective rights under the contract in the courts of that state, but because this money lender desired to escape the restraints of the laws of this state, and, by this formal declaration inserted in the contract, compel the courts of this state, in a suit for the foreclosure of the mortgage, to adjust the rights of the parties according to the laws of Georgia and the decisions of its courts, and in disregard of the laws of this state and the decisions of this court." In Fletcher v. New York L. Ins. Co. 4 McCrary, 440, 13 Fed. 528, Judge Treat says: "The defendant company was doing business in Missouri, with the privileges granted to it here, when said insurance was effected. It may be that the formal acceptance of the proposed contract was, by the letter of the contract, to be consummated in New York. The broad proposition, however, remains, no artifice to avoid which can be upheld. The statutes of Missouri, for salutary reasons, permit foreign corporations to do business in the state on prescribed conditions. If, despite such conditions, they can, by the insertion of clauses in their policy, withdraw themselves from the limitations of the Missouri statutes, while obtaining all the advantages of its license, then a foreign corporation can, by special contract, upset the statutes of the state, and become exempt from the positive requirements of the law. Such a proposition is not to be countenanced. The defendant corporation chose to embark in business within this state under the terms and conditions named in the statute. It could not by paper contrivances, however specious, withdraw itself from the operation of the laws by the force of which it could alone do business within the state. To hold otherwise would be subversive of the right of a state to decide on what terms, by comity, a foreign corporation should be admitted to do business, or be recognized therefor, within the state jurisdiction. Each state can decide for itself whether a foreign corporation shall be recognized by it, and on what terms. Primarily, a corporation has no existence beyond the territorial limits of the state creating it, and, when it undertakes business beyond it, does so only by comity. The defendant corporation, having been permitted to do business in Missouri under the statutes of the latter, was bound by all the provisions of those statutes, and could not, by the insertion of any of the many clauses in its forms of application, etc., withdraw itself from the obligatory force of the statute. The contract of insurance, therefore, is a Missouri contract, and subject to the local law."

This last utterance is in exact accord with the holding of this court in Western Assur. Co. v. Phelps, 77 Miss. 625, 27 So. 745. See also Southern Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Atkinson, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 516, 50 S. W. 170, and Neal v. New Orleans Loan, Bldg. & Sav. Assn. 100 Tenn. 607, 46 S. W. 755. See, especially, the very recent case of Crippen v. Loughton, 69 N. H. 540, 46 L. R. A. 467, 44 Atl. 538. And it is immaterial whether the foreign corporation is doing business under license here, or has, without such license, localized its business and domiciled itself here as to such business. And the act of 1890, p. 10, places "each branch office" and "each agency" on the same footing exactly, treating each as "a separate and distinct building and loan association," and taxes each as such. The general doctrine is, of course, well settled that the law of a place where the contract is to be performed governs the contract, and the presumption that this contract was to be performed according to the laws of Georgia, simply because the notes were payable in Georgia, is, at least, nothing but a mere presumption to that effect, subject to be overcome by proof that in truth and in fact they intended the money to be paid in Mississippi. When all there is, in a case like this, to show that the intention was to perform the contract in a foreign state, is a mere specious paper recital in the notes, and over against this, and contrary to this, are all the other facts in the case, and the whole course of dealing between the parties, it would be an abdication of common sense on the part of any court to find the real intention of the parties in the paper recital, instead of in the real facts of the case. It must be remembered that the state has the power to prescribe the terms on which foreign corporations may do business. It is declared in § 849 of the Code of 1892 (last clause): "Such foreign corporations shall not do or commit any act in this state contrary to the laws or policy thereof, and shall not be allowed to recover on any contract made in violation of law or public policy." This is the plain mandate of our law, which must be rigidly enforced by the courts. And the Code elsewhere provides that (§ 2348) domestic building and loan associations are excluded from the operation of the usury laws, but foreign building and loan associations are subject to them; and to enforce this public policy thus declared by the statute is not to give extra-territorial operation to our statutes. On the contrary, this corporation has come into the state, and localized its business here through local boards scattered all over the state, and must submit such business thus localized to the operation of the laws of the state. To hold otherwise would operate the grossest injustice to our citizens, and would virtually abrogate our statutes against usury. It may be further remarked that we announce, as to this foreign building and loan association, the identical doctrine which the state of Georgia, through its supreme court, has announced (Martin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 481, 8 L. R. A. 170, 10 S. E. 1092), in an exactly similar case. We append, for convenience, a few of the authorities supporting our views, whose reasoning we approve, so far as relates to the question under discussion: United States Sav. & L. Co. v. Scott, 98 Ky. 695, 34 S. W. 235, decided in 1896, the court saying: "A foreign building and loan association engaged in doing business in Kentucky will be permitted to charge no higher rate of interest than is chargeable under the laws of this state; and while, by the laws of comity, the charter of such a corporation will be recognized here as the law of its existence, it is the charter alone which is recognized, and not the general legislation of the country of its domicile with reference thereto, or the construction of its charter provisions by the foreign courts. Moreover, when such a corporation employs the usual agencies to solicit and transact business in this state, and contracts for the payment of premiums and interest in excess of the rate authorized here, the transaction will be denounced as an attempted evasion of our laws, whatever may be the nominal rate specified or artifice adopted; and this though it be specifically provided that the contract is made with reference to the laws of the foreign state. Such a provision only makes the intent to evade the more manifest." Pryse v. People's Bldg. L. & Sav. Assn. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 752, 41 S. W. 574, decided in 1897 (these two being Kentucky cases); National Loan & Invest. Co. v. Stone (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 67, decided in 1898 (a Texas case). It was held therein that it was immaterial whether the association had obtained a permit or license to do business in Texas, if in fact it had localized its business there. In such latter case the contract was a Texas contract, as well as in the former. Harmon v. Hart (Tenn. Ch. App.) 53 S. W. 310 (a Tennessee case, decided in 1899); Jackson v. American Mortg. Co. 88 Ga. 756, 15 S. E. 812; Thompson v. Edwards, 85 Ind. 414; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed., p. 1072, note 5. Crippen v. Loughton, 69 N. H. 540, 46 L. R. A. 470, 44 Atl. 541. 542, where the court says: "In the case of contracts the common law enforces the contract made by the parties, but not the lex loci, except in so far as they have made it a part of the contract. The doctrine that contracts are to be interpreted according to the law of the place where they are made or to be performed is merely a rule for finding the intention of the parties. Peninsu- lar & O. Steam Nav. Co. v. Shand, 3 Moore, P. C. N. S. 272; Anstruther v. Adair, 2 Myl. & K. 272: 'A different decision would totally defeat the intention of the contracting parties.' Di Sora v. Phillips, 10 H. L. Cas. 624, 638, 639. The only purpose of the proof of the foreign law is to determine the meaning of the language used by the parties,—for the same reason, precisely, that evidence is heard of the signification of technical terms. Prentiss v. Savage, 13 Mass. 20, 23; Koster v. Merritt, 32 Conn. 246; Dyke v. Erie R. Co. 45 N. Y. 113, 118, 6 Am. Rep. 43. The foreign law, as such, and ex proprio vigore, has no effect. Effect is given to the agreement of the parties only. The court looks into the lex loci so far, and only so far, as may be necessary to determine what the contract is, and whether it shall be enforced, if at all, according to the intention of the parties. This is not a matter of courtesy or favor, either to the country where the contract was made or to the parties. It is the right of the parties. It is as if the foreign law were, in terms, expressed in the contract. The principle 'loosely called comity' (Schibasy v. Westenhole, L. R. 6 Q. B. 155, 159) 'is not of courts, but of nations.' Story, Conf. L. §§ 37, 38; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 589, 10 L. ed. 274, 308. . . . The question of the enforcement of the laws of a foreign state is not a question of comity to that state, but of the power of the courts of the forum. The organic or statute or common law of no state in the Union has conferred upon its courts authority to put into active operative effect, efficient per se, the statutes of another state. There is a wide difference between the putting a foreign statute in active operation, and treating a transaction of which the court has jurisdiction as it is modified, affected, or characterized by the law that operated upon it where it took place. To enforce a liability created solely by the statute of a foreign land is to give that statute precisely the same force and effect as if it were a statute of the forum." Falls v. United States Sav. Loan & Bldg. Co. 97 Ala. 417, 24 L. R. A. 174, 13 So. 25; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Com. 5 Bush, 68, 96 Am. Dec. 331.

In the cases in 46 S. W. and 34 S. W., supra, there was no local board, as in this and the Sokoloski Cases, but the foreign corporation had local offices, and local agents, and had thus localized its business; and the same rule above announced was applied,—a point not here presented. The principle is much like that of Jahier v. Rascoe, 62 Miss. 699; Rorer, Interstate Law, p. 48. It seems that in 1898, carrying out the doctrine of these cases, where foreign corporations localized their business in other states, the state of South Carolina actually passed a law providing that "all contracts secured by mortgages of real estate situated within this state shall be subject to and construed by the laws of this state, regulating the rate of interest allowed, and in all other respects, without regard to the place named for the performance of the same." 22 S. C. Stat. at L. p. 747. And 57 L. R. A.

the South Carolina supreme court, in Tobin v. McNab, 53 S. C., at page 76, 30 S. E. 829, pronounces this a "wise law." Foreign corporations wishing to do business with our citizens, and localizing that business within our state through local boards, must comply with the laws of this state. They cannot, under such circumstances, enforce here stipulations in contracts allowed by the law of the state which created them, if these stipulations violate our laws or our public policy. Such laws of such foreign states can have, ex proprio vigore, no extra-territorial effect; and it is not competent for a foreign corporation whose business has been localized in this state, or the borrower, or both, to abrogate by attempted contract stipulations, whose purpose it is to evade our laws against usury, the laws of this state on that subject. This holding in no way interferes with the right of a foreign corporation whose business has not been localized here to make contracts with borrowers to be governed by the laws of the state of their domicile, if there be no purpose therein to evade the usury laws of this state. Such liberty of contracting, exercised in good faith, is not herein interfered with. The authorities cited to that point by counsel for appellee are not pertinent to cases like the one before us. All the cases are admirably collected in a note to Bank of Newport v. Cook (Ark.) 46 Am. St. Rep. 171. In that note the learned editor points out on page 202 the distinction to be observed, saying: "The proper answer to this argument is that mere shams and evasions are not permitted to counteract and annul the law, and, where it appears that the purpose of the parties in making the obligation payable in another state was to evade the law against usury of the state in which it was executed, it will be regarded as infected with usury. Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige, 615; Junction R. Co. v. Bank of Ashland, 12 Wall. 226, 20 L. ed. 385; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. 65, 10 L. ed. 61."

Our decision is rested upon the two distinct grounds: First, that where a foreign money-lending corporation has localized its business within this state through local boards, doing here regularly and continuously for years the business of the corporation, it has thus voluntarily domesticated itself within this state, and subjected its business and contracts to the operation of our laws; and, second, that where, in such case, all the facts, fairly weighed, show that the only purpose of a mere stipulation in the notes or mortgages for payment in the foreign state must have been to evade our laws on the subject of usury, no device or disguise or contrivance will prevent the courts from stripping off the mask, and pronouncing the judgment of the law on the real case made by the actual facts.

The proposition that the local secretary and treasurer is the agent, not of the lending corporation whose secretary and treasurer he was, but of the borrowing debtor, is utterly unfounded. Murphy v. Independent Order of S. & D. of J. of A. 77 Miss. 830, 50 L. R. A. 111, 27 So. 624. The facts of the case make Natches Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Shields, 71 Miss. 630, 15 So. 793, and Building & L. Asso. v. Leonard, 74 Miss. 810, 21 So. 53, wholly inapplicable.

It is noteworthy that no dividends or profits are allowed by the by-laws of this association where the stock is surrendered before maturity. The appellant, so far from deriving any profits, actually lost $19.50.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Re Edward ASCHER.

(.....Mich.....)

One accused of a capital offense has not been in jeopardy which will bar a subsequent trial, where, after the jury has been impaneled and the trial begun, the judge discharges them after ascertaining by independent investigation that some of them are so prejudiced in favor of the accused as to be incompetent, and have endeavored to prejudice other jurors, belittled the state's evidence, procured the intoxication of the bailiff, and obtained communication with persons not jurors.

(May 19, 1902.)

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain petitioner's discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Wayne County to which he had been committed pending trial of an indictment charging him with murder. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George F. Monaghan for petitioner.

Mr. Henry A. Mandell, with Mr. Ormond F. Hunt, for respondent:

Habeas corpus is not the proper remedy for taking advantage of the claim of a former conviction or former acquittal.

It was within the power of the trial court to discharge the jury in this case before verdict, without the defendant's consent, on the ground that, from the facts and circumstances as they appeared, there existed a legal necessity for such act.

Northville v. Westfall, 75 Mich. 603, 42 N. W. 1068.

The common-law principle of a legal jeopardy prevails in Michigan.

People v. Harding, 53 Mich. 481, 19 N. W. 155; Northville v. Westfall, 75 Mich. 603, 42 N. W. 1068.

The law has invested courts of justice with the authority to discharge a jury from giving any verdict, whenever, in their opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the act, or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated.

United States v. Perez, 9 Wheat. 579, 6 L. ed. 165; People v. Harding, 53 Mich. 481, 19 N. W. 155; United States v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815; Simmons v. United States, 142 U. S. 148, 35 L. ed. 968, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 171; Thompson v. United States, 155 U. S. 271, 39 L. ed. 146, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 73; Logan v. United States, 144 U. S. 263, 36 L. ed. 429, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Gardes v. United States, 30 C. C. A. 596, 58 U. S. App. 219, 87 Fed. 172; People v. Jones, 48 Mich. 554, 12 N. W. 848; People v. Taylor, 117 Mich. 583, 76 N. W. 158; People v. White, 68 Mich. 650, 37 N. W. 34.

If misconduct on the part of the jury, or members thereof, is discovered before the verdict, it is proper to discharge the jury on that account.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner is now detained by the sheriff of the county of Wayne, pending an indictment charging him with the murder of Valmore C. Nichols. The petition filed in this cause for his discharge shows that said charge is still pending and undetermined in the recorder's court of the city of Detroit. Petitioner claims he has once been in jeopardy, within the meaning of the Constitution of the state and of the United States, and cannot again be tried, but is entitled to his discharge.

After the jury was obtained and a portion of the witnesses for the People were sworn, information came to the trial judge in relation to some of the jurors and the officers having charge of the jury, which led him to make an investigation. In his return to the writ of certiorari the trial judge returned that this investigation was made by him with no one present except the court stenographer and the person he was then examining. "The investigation and inquiries so made are supplemented by my observation of the conduct of juror Henry G. Poupard in open court in his seat in the jury box during the progress of this trial, the flagrancy of which led me to make a statement to him in the presence of all the jurors herein in the court room upon the adjournment of court at noon upon Tuesday, the 12th day of November, 1901. The said investigation and inquiries were made for the purpose of determining whether or not the jurors herein, or any of them, were, when impaneled herein, unbiased and unprejudiced jurors, and otherwise qualified to sit herein; and also for the purpose of determining whether or not, since the impaneling of the jurors herein, the said jurors or any of them, have, by their conduct or statements, so conducted themselves as to interfere with the due and orderly administration of justice to that extent where the rights of the people or the defendant herein were imperiled or endangered. The further purpose of such investigation and inquiries was to ascertain whether or not the officers, or any of them, in charge of the jurors, herein, had been guilty of any misconduct, and, if so, whether such misconduct would, in the event of a conviction herein, be such as to nullify the proceedings had. From such investigation, inquiries, and from the personal observation of the court, I do specifically find and determine the facts to be: That juror Henry G. Poupard, upon his voir dire examination herein, purposely and wilfully concealed a material fact when asked about it. Upon his voir dire examination said juror, Henry G. Poupard, stated that he did not know any member of the family of this defendant, other than Mr. Simon Ascher. His voluntary statement to me under oath upon Thursday, the 14th day of November, 1901, is that while engaged as a saloon keeper in the city of Detroit he had business dealings with Louis Ascher, the brother of said defendant, and that said dealings covered a considerable period of time, and that he now is a debtor of the said Louis Ascher in a small sum of money as the result of said dealings. In the light of the subsequent conduct and statements made by the said juror, Henry G. Poupard, during the progress of this trial, as ascertained by me from the said investigation and inquiries, and from personal observation of him, I am led to the conclusion and do conclusively find, that at the time he was impaneled herein he was not an impartial and unbiased juror, and I do conclusively find that, in order to be accepted as a juror herein, he fraudulently and wilfully concealed from the court and counsel his bias and prejudice, which so existed both at the time and before he was sworn and impaneled herein as a juror. I further find and determine that, from the inception of this trial, the said juror, Henry G. Poupard, has frequently, by his statements and by his manner in making such statements, expressed to his colleagues disbelief in the testimony given by the witnesses herein; that he has expressed his belief in the innocence of the said defendant to his fellow jurors; that he has said, in the presence of some of his fellow jurors, that the officials were persecuting the defendant herein, and that the police officers in this case were endeavoring to procure a conviction of defendant herein, whether guilty or innocent; that he has repeatedly endeavored to influence some of his colleagues by criticising, ridiculing, and belittling the testimony of the witnesses sworn herein. I further specifically find and determine that upon the night of Saturday, the 9th day of November, 1901, at the Hotel Normandie, in this city, the said Henry G. Poupard was guilty of gross misconduct in purchasing and furnishing to some of his fellow jurors herein an excessive quantity of intoxicating liquor, and in then and there procuring the intoxication of Patrolman Daniel O'Keefe, who was then in charge of the said jurors. I further specifically find and determine that upon the night of Saturday, the 9th day of November, 1901, at said Hotel Normandie, the said juror, Henry G. Poupard, did hold communications with Charles Lewis and Edward W. Harmeyer, who were not jurors herein, without receiving permission from the court, and that such communications were had in the presence of no officers in charge of the jurors herein. I find and determine that at the inception of this case, and before the taking of testimony had begun, the said juror, Henry G. Poupard, was biased and prejudiced against the people, and in favor of the defendant herein, to such an extent as to disqualify him serving as a juror herein; that his conduct and statements following the taking of testimony grew out of the bias so held by him; and that he has made a studied and persistent effort to create a like bias in the minds of the other jurors herein. I find and determine that juror John E. Sauer, throughout this trial, and from its inception, has exhibited a strong and studied bias and prejudice; that at no time since he was impaneled herein has he been an impartial juror. I further find and determine that he has studiously shown his bias and prejudice for the purpose of influencing other jurors herein, and that he has ridiculed and belittled the testimony of witnesses sworn herein in the presence of his fellow jurors. I further find and determine that for the purpose of discrediting the testimony of one of the witnesses herein the said John E. Sauer willfully misstated the reasons for the reversal of this case by the supreme court of this state. I further conclusively find and determine that upon the night of Saturday, the 9th day of November, 1901, at the Hotel Normandie, the said John E. Sauer was guilty of gross misconduct in being a party toward the procurement of the intoxication of Patrolman Daniel O'Keefe, and that his misconduct in that regard was of such a character as would, in the event of the conviction of the defendant herein, nullify the proceedings here had and require a new trial of the issue herein involved. I further find and determine that upon the night of Saturday, the 9th day of November, 1901, while in charge alone of the jurors herein at the Hotel Normandie, in this city, Patrolman Daniel O'Keefe became and was intoxicated, and that his intoxication incapacitated him from discharging the duty then and there devolving upon him, and that by reason of such intoxication unauthorized communication was had by juror Henry G. Poupard with Charles Lewis and Edward W. Harmeyer, they not being jurors herein, and that there was then and there opportunity given the jurors herein for other unauthorized and improper communications with persons with whom communication was then and there improper. I further find and determine that in my opinion the misconduct of the said officer was of such a character that, in the event of a conviction of the defendant herein, the facts being disclosed to the court, a new trial of this cause would be required. From the foregoing findings of fact I have concluded that it is within my power, and that it is my imperative duty, to discharge the jury herein impaneled from further consideration of this case, and formally do declare this trial to be a mistrial."

The findings of fact were duly entered upon the court journal. In the presence of counsel for the respondent and the respondent himself, the court then made an order in which the findings of fact were recited, and that the trial was a mistrial, and discharging the jury from further consideration of the case, and remanding the respondent to the custody of the sheriff pending a new trial. Counsel for the respondent moved the court for his discharge, which motion was overruled, and this proceeding is brought.

It is claimed the question is one of greater importance than the personal rights of the respondent, and involves the integrity of the right of trial by jury. It is said that no person shall be placed twice in jeopardy for the same offense. Nor shall he be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. U. S. Const. Amend. art. 5. No one will question this right of a person accused of crime. The trouble arises in determining when one is placed twice in jeopardy.

It is claimed the proceedings heretofore had in this case show the respondent has been placed in jeopardy, and that he should now be discharged, citing Cooley, Const. Lim. 327; People v. Harding, 53 Mich. 485, 19 N. W. 155, 53 Mich. 48, 51 Am. Rep. 95, 18 N. W. 555; People v. Taylor, 117 Mich. 585, 76 N. W. 158. The courts of the English-speaking people have for centuries been exceedingly jealous of the right of persons accused of crime to a fair and impartial trial. This has been provided for, not only by the action of the courts, but, in this country, by making provisions in the written constitutions intended to bring about this result. Section 29, art. 6, of the Constitution of Michigan provides: "No person after acquittal upon the merits, shall be tried for the same offense." While this language differs from that used in the United States Constitution, the law of jeopardy is doubtless the same under both provisions. Northville v. Westfall, 75 Mich. 603, 42 N. W. 1068.

At one time, the doctrine of placing the accused in jeopardy but once was invoked as a bar to a second trial where a jury had disagreed, or a member of the panel had been taken so ill the trial could not proceed, or had died, but such a claim would no longer be made. In People v. Harding, 53 Mich. 481, 19 N. W. 155, where the jury had disagreed, it was contended the respondent had been placed in jeopardy, and, as the record did not show it had been judicially determined the jury was unable to agree, nor any necessity for their discharge, that the respondent could not again be put upon trial. In disposing of the case Justice

Cooley said: "This case is therefore to be determined on common-law rules; and the respondent relies upon People v. Jones, 48 Mich. 554, 12 N. W. 848, as ruling it. That case is not very fully reported. The record showed that the respondent was put on trial before a jury duly impaneled and sworn; that the prosecution went into the proofs and rested; that thereupon the jury was discharged, and a new information filed against the respondent for the same offense, upon which he was tried and convicted. The proceedings on the first information were pleaded as a bar to the second, and this court sustained the bar. No reason appeared for discharging the jury, and the discharge stood upon the record as an act of the court, not shown to have been assented to or compelled by any necessity. On each of the trials appearing in the record before us, the jury reported to the court an inability to agree, and were immediately discharged by its order. It is conceded on behalf of respondent that, when it is found impossible for the jury to agree, the judge may lawfully discharge them for that reason, and the discharge is not an acquittal; but it is contended that the record must show that the judge found that a necessity for the discharge existed; and upon the validity of this contention the case must turn. There is no doubt the report of the jury that they cannot agree is the proper evidence upon which the judge should act in determining upon the impossibility of their reaching a verdict. But he may not be satisfied with their first report, and has a right to keep them together for further consultation as long as, in his opinion, there is reasonable ground for believing they may finally agree. The whole subject, however, is referred to his judgment; and when he decides, no one can question his conclusion. And if in this case he had directed an entry upon the journal of the court that, being satisfied the jury could not agree, he directed their discharge, no question could be made of the right to proceed to a new trial. But while it would be very proper to make such an entry, it has never been the practice in this state to do so. The fact that the judge, on receiving the report of the jury of their inability to agree, directs their discharge, is understood to be an assent on his part to their own conclusion, and a determination by him that the necessity for their discharge without a verdict has arisen. And we think this a proper view to take of his action. Any other would be technical, and tend in many cases to defeat justice." In People v. Taylor, 117 Mich. 583, 76 N. W. 158, the respondent having been once acquitted, it was held he could not be put upon trial again, but in disposing of the case Justice Hooker used the following language: "This case should be distinguished from a class of cases where, after a jury is impaneled and charged with the defendant and his case, some intervening necessity compels the discharge of the jury, e. g., the death or sickness of a juror, the ending of the term, a disagreement, etc., and possibly a continuance, granted upon the motion of the defendant. The case of Stewart v. State, 15 Ohio St. 155, is such a case. After the jury was sworn it was discovered that one of the jurors had been on the grand jury which found the indictment in the case. The defendant's counsel objected to proceeding to trial with the jury thus impaneled, but declined to waive any of the defendant's rights. The jury was discharged, and a conviction by another jury was sustained. Such a case was People v. Gardner, 62 Mich. 312, 29 N. W. 19. There a question arose over the regularity of the jury, and a new one was called upon the defendant's objection to the first. It was said by Mr. Justice Champlin that 'he has no right to complain that his objection was sustained, and the discharge of the jury with his consent cannot be set up as an acquittal.'" See People v. White, 68 Mich. 648, 37 N. W. 34.

These cases clearly recognize the doctrine that occasions may arise after the trial is entered upon, making it necessary to stop the trial and discharge the jury, without it necessarily following that respondent has been so placed in jeopardy that he cannot again be put upon trial. While the precise question involved in this case has not been before this court, it is not a new question. In United States v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815, after the trial was entered upon, a jury was discharged under circumstances very similar to the case at bar. In holding that the respondent might again be put upon trial the court said: "The rule of the common law, as shown by the authorities cited by the defendant's counsel, is that neither party has a right of challenge, after the juror is sworn, for cause then existing. But it by no means follows that it is not in the power of the court, at the suggestion of one of the parties, or upon its own motion, to interpose and withdraw from the panel a juror utterly unfit, in the apprehension of every honest man, to remain there. Suppose a prisoner on trial for his life should inform the court that a juror had been bribed to convict him,—that the fact was unknown to him when the juror was sworn, and that he had just obtained plenary evidence of it, which he was ready to lay before the court. Is the court compelled to go on with the trial? Suppose the judge, during the trial, obtains by accident personal knowledge that one of the jurors is determined to acquit or convict without any regard to the law or the evidence. Is he bound to hold his peace? In my judgment such a doctrine would be as wide of the common law as it would be of common sense and common honesty. The truth is that this rule, like a great many other rules, is for the orderly conduct of business. There must be some prescribed order for the parties to make their challenges, as well as to do almost everything else in the course of a trial. As matter of right, neither party can deviate from this order. And it is the duty of the court to enforce these rules, which are for the general good, even if they occasion inconvenience and loss in particular cases. But there goes along with all of them the great principle that, being designed to promote the ends of justice, they shall not be used utterly to subvert and defeat it; being intended as a fence against disorder, they shall not be turned into a snare. They do not tie the hands of the court, so that when, in the sound discretion of the court, the public justice plainly requires its interposition, it may not interpose; and it would be as inconsistent with authority as with the great interests of the community to hold the court restrained. A very eminent English judge has treated this rule concerning challenges just as I believe it should be treated. Chief Justice Abbott says: 'I have no doubt that if, from inadvertence or any other cause, the prisoner or his counsel should have omitted to make the challenge at the proper moment, the strictness of the rule which confines him to make the challenge before the officer begins to administer the oath would not be insisted on by the attorney general, or, if insisted on by him, would not be allowed by the court.' [The Derby Case, Joy, Confessions, 220.] That is, like other rules of procedure in trials, it is in the power of the court to dispense with it when justice requires. But the interposition of the court may be placed on even higher ground, supported by authority which in this court is decisive. In United States v. Perez, 9 Wheat. 579, 6 L. ed. 165, the question came before the Supreme Court whether it was in the power of the circuit court to discharge a jury in a capital case and afterwards put the prisoner on trial by another jury. The distinction between capital cases and misdemeanor, under the provision of the Constitution of the United States, cited by the defendant's counsel, is very plain; yet, speaking even of capital cases, the court says: 'We think that in all cases of this nature the law has invested courts of justice with authority to discharge a jury from giving any verdict, whenever, in their opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the act, or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated. They are to exercise a sound discretion on the subject, and it is impossible to define all the circumstances which would render it proper to interfere.' That a court would interfere far more readily in a case of misdemeanor there can be no doubt, and it is so asserted in terms by Story, J., in United States v. Coolidge, 2 Gall. 364, Fed. Cas. No. 14,858. In United States v. Shoemaker, 2 McLean, 114, Fed. Cas. No. 16,279, and United States v. Gibert, 2 Summ. 19, Fed. Cas. No. 15,204, it will be found that Justices Washington, Story, and McLean have all acted in their circuits upon these principles. Now, if the court has such a discretion, and if, as the Supreme Court says, it is to be exercised even in capital cases, where the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated, what case can be imagined more fit for its interposition than one where the court finds that a juror is so biased, either against the prisoner or the government, that he is unfit to sit in the cause? The truth is that it is an entire mistake to confound this discretionary authority of the court, to protect one part of the tribunal from corruption or prejudice, with the right of challenge allowed to a party. And it is, at least, equally a mistake to suppose that, in a court of justice, either party can have a vested right to a corrupt or prejudiced juror, who is not fit to sit in judgment in the case. I hazard nothing in saying that no such right is known to the common law." The case of Simmons v. United States, 142 U. S. 148, 35 L. ed. 968, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 171, was a case very similar to this. The opinion is by Justice Gray, who said: "The general rule of law upon the power of the court to discharge the jury in a criminal case before verdict was laid down by this court more than sixty years ago, in a case presenting the question whether a man charged with a capital crime was entitled to be discharged because the jury, being unable to agree, had been discharged, without his consent, from giving any verdict upon the indictment. The court, speaking by Mr. Justice Story, said: 'We are of opinion that the facts constitute no legal bar to a future trial. The prisoner has not been convicted or acquitted, and may again be put upon his defense. We think that, in all cases of this nature, the law has invested courts of justice with the authority to discharge a jury from giving any verdict, whenever, in their opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the act, or the ends of public justice would otherwise be defeated. They are to exercise a sound discretion on the subject; and it is impossible to define all the circumstances which would render it proper to interfere. To be sure, the power ought to be used with the greatest caution, under urgent circumstances, and for very plain and obvious causes; and, in capital cases especially, courts should be extremely careful how they interfere with any of the chances of life in favor of the prisoner. But, after all, they have the right to order the discharge; and the security which the public have for the faithful, sound, and conscientious exercise of this discretion rests, in this as in other cases, upon the responsibility of the judges, under their oaths of office.' United States v. Perez, 9 Wheat. 579, 6 L. ed. 165. A recent decision of the court of Queen's bench, made upon a full review of the English authorities, and affirmed in the exchequer chamber, is to the same effect. Winsor v. Queen, L. R. 1 Q. B. 289, 390, 6 Best & S. 143, and 7 Best & S. 490. . . . There can be no condition of things in which the necessity for the exercise of this power is more manifest, in order to prevent the defeat of the ends of public justice, than when it is made to appear to the court that, either by reason of facts existing when the jurors were sworn, but not then disclosed or known to the court, or by reason of outside influences brought to bear on the jury pending the trial, the jurors or any of them are subject to such bias or prejudice as not to stand impartial between the government and the accused. As was well said by Mr. Justice Curtis in a case very like that now before us: 'It is an entire mistake to confound this discretionary authority of the court to protect one part of the tribunal from corruption or prejudice with the right of challenge allowed to a party. And it is, at least, equally a mistake to suppose that, in a court of justice, either party can have a vested right to a corrupt or prejudiced juror, who is not fit to sit in judgment in the case.' United States v. Morris, 1 Curt. C. C. 23, 37, Fed. Cas. No. 15,815. Pending the first trial of the present case, there was brought to the notice of the counsel on both sides, and of the court, evidence on oath tending to show that one of the jurors had sworn falsely on his voir dire that he had no acquaintance with the defendant; and it was undisputed that a letter since written and published in the newspapers by the defendant's counsel, commenting upon that evidence, had been read by that juror and by others of the jury. It needs no argument to prove that the judge, upon receiving such information, was fully justified in concluding that such a publication, under the peculiar circumstances attending it, made it impossible for that jury, in considering the case, to act with the independence and freedom on the part of each juror requisite to a fair trial of the issue between the parties. The judge having come to that conclusion, it was clearly within his authority to order the jury to be discharged, and to put the defendant on trial by another jury; and the defendant was not thereby twice put in jeopardy, within the meaning of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

proval in Thompson v. United States, 155 U. S. 271, 39 L. ed. 146, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 73.

In our effort to see that the rights of persons accused of crime are protected, we should not overlook the fact that the people also have interests that should be safeguarded. It is a right of which the accused cannot be deprived to have his case tried by an impartial jury. The people have an equal right to have their case tried by a jury no member of which has obtained a place thereon for the purpose of preventing a righteous verdict. If during the progress of the trial the trial judge learns, or it is satisfactorily made to appear to him, that one or more jurors had obtained places on the jury intending to convict the accused whatever the evidence, can there be any doubt that it is not only his right, but his duty, to say there has been a mistrial? Can there be any doubt of the converse of this proposition? The accused has a right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury, but he has no vested right to a trial by a jury some member of which is not impartial, but who obtained his place thereon for the purpose of acquitting the accused whatever might be the evidence. The trial judge would not be justified in discharging a jury and declaring a mistrial for slight cause, but if the facts exist, as found by the trial judge after a careful investigation made by him, it would be a reflection upon the administration of justice to say the trial must proceed. The conduct of the two jurors and of the court officer indicate a very strong probability that improper influences were at work which might affect the verdict of the jury, and justified the conclusions of the trial judge.

The other questions argued by counsel have been considered, but we do not deem it necessary to discuss them. The application for the discharge of the respondent is denied.

Long, J., did not sit. The other Justices concurred.

TECUMSEH NATIONAL BANK

v.

CHAMBERLAIN BANKING HOUSE et al.,
Appts.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. A bank examiner who takes charge of the assets of a national *Headnotes by SEDGWICK, C.

NORM.—For a case holding that a bank is not bound by unauthorized statements of cashier made for the purpose of inducing a person to become surety on the bond of a teller, see, in this series, Lieberman v. First Nat. Bank (Del.) 48 L. R. A. 514.

As to liability of bank for false statement by cashier as to amount insurance company bank under the directions of the controller is not the agent for the bank in such negotiation as the bank may be permitted to enter into with a view to the resumption of business.

2. When a defaulting officer of such bank, for the purpose of replenishing the assets of the bank to enable it to resume business, is allowed to furnish collateral securities for his indorsements upon paper previously sold by him to the bank, has on deposit, see Hindman v. First Nat. Bank (C. C. App. 6th C.) 48 L. R. A. 210, ante, 108.

As to liability of directors for false statements in report to person buying stock in reliance thereon, see Gerner v. Mosher (Neb.) 46 L. R. A. 244.

representations made by such examiner as to the liabilities of such officer to the bank and the value and condition of the securities already furnished by him are not binding upon the bank; and one who furnishes collateral securities to such defaulting officer to be so used by him cannot rely upon such representations of the examiner as a defense in an action by the bank to foreclose its lien upon such securities.

3. Such bank, being represented by a majority of its board of directors, who are not in default, may, with the consent of the comptroller, accept such collateral securities from such defaulting officer; and in obtaining securities from a third person, to be used by him for that purpose, such defaulting officer will not be regarded as the agent of the bank. His representations as to his liability to the bank, and the value and condition of the securities already furnished by him, will not be binding upon the bank, so as to enable the person furnishing such securities at his request, with knowledge of the purpose for which he intends to use the same, to rely upon such representations as a defense in a subsequent action by the bank to foreclose its lien upon such securities.

4. The contract of a defaulting bank officer to furnish collateral security for his indorsement upon paper previously sold to the bank by him so as to replenish the assets of the bank and enable it to resume business is not illegal, and after such securities have been furnished, and the bank has resumed business, the person furnishing such securities at the request of such defaulting officer with knowledge of the use to be made thereof by him cannot be heard to say that there was no consideration for furnishing the same.

5. When a principal is represented by a duly authorized agent, and some third person who may also be benefited by the transaction assumes, without the knowledge or consent of the principal or his agent, to make representations and statements to promote the transaction, the principal will not be bound thereby, although he accepts the benefits of the transaction negotiated by his agent.

(December 4, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Johnson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to foreclose a lien on assigned bank stock. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Deweese, M. B. C. True, Isham Reavis, and Robert Ryan, for appellants:

Whether or not the parties were acting as authorized agents of the bank is immaterial, in view of the fact that now the bank seeks to avail itself of the fruits of these misrepresentations. Under such circumstances, it ratifies the acts of its hitherto unauthorized agents, and they become as binding as though the authority had antecedently existed.

Griffith as bank examiner was in actual control of the property of the bank. He advised with the directors and stockholders as to the means for putting the bank into operation again, and acted with them in the adjustment of its affairs. All this was within the general scope, if not the strict letter, of his duties,—his duties were to conserve the interests of the bank. The bank has accepted the fruits of his activity, with full knowledge, now, of his efforts, and, by this action, it must be held to have ratified what he did.

Russell & Holmes were, both by law and by subsisting contract, bound to make good their obligations expressed in their indorsements, or to secure them; hence, a promise to extend the time in which to do it could be no consideration for doing it.

Esterly Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Pringle, 41 Neb. 265, 59 N. W. 804; Baldwin Invest. Co. v. Bailey, 45 Neb. 580, 63 N. W. 847.

As the delivery of the stock could not be a consideration for the promise to extend, so the promise to extend could not be a consideration for the delivery of the stock.

The bank cannot now plead the promise to extend as consideration for the delivery of the stock, even if a promise to extend was actually given.

There was no power on the part of the bank to agree to an extension of time of payment of the notes when the stock was assigned by Mrs. Chamberlain. There was no attempt to make such extension; and, as the collateral was pledged, as appellee claims, to secure notes already in existence according to their terms, there was no consideration for the assignment of the certificate of stock.

The indebtedness of Russell & Holmes to the bank was contracted while the one was president and the other a director of the bank, the indebtedness being largely in excess of the amount allowed by law, and the contracting of which was illegal and forbidden by the law governing the bank. These facts tainted with illegality the transaction by which the stock of Mrs. Chamberlain was pledged as security, even if there had been no misrepresentation of facts, or fraud perpetrated directly upon her.

Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 261; Bloom v. Warder, 13 Neb. 476, 14 N. W. 395.

Sedgwick, C., filed the following opinion:

On the 16th day of October, 1891, the comptroller of the currency, through the bank examiner, closed the doors of the Tecumseh National Bank, and took possession of its assets. The embarrassment of the bank was caused by excessive loans to Russell & Holmes, and by discounting a large amount of commercial paper upon which they were indorsers. The firm of Russell & Holmes was composed of James D. Russell, who was a director in the bank, and Charles A. Holmes, who was also a director and was president of the bank. They also held a majority of the stock of the bank. After the examiner had taken charge of the bank, an effort was made to reopen the bank for business, and the comptroller proposed to allow such action to be taken if Russell & Holmes would pay in cash their direct indebtedness to the bank, so as to reduce it to $5,000, the limit allowed by law; and would also satisfactorily secure their indirect liability as indorsers. Russell & Holmes appear to have still retained the confidence of the people to a considerable extent, and succeeded in obtaining accommodation notes from the farmers and others of their business acquaintances sufficient to enable them to pay to the examiner the amount required to be paid upon their direct indebtedness; and also put up various collateral securities for their liability as indorsers, and among such collaterals the banking stock in question in this suit, which is 72 shares of $100 each of the capital stock of the Chamberlain Banking House of Tecumseh. Charles M. Chamberlain was at the time cashier of the Chamberlain Banking House, defendant, and the defendant Edith R. Chamberlain is his wife. She is also the daughter of James D. Russell, of the firm of Russell & Holmes. Soon after the bank was closed by the examiner, she was induced to and did assign this stock to the Tecumseh National Bank, and delivered it to her father, who deposited it with the bank as collateral to the indebtedness and liability of Russell & Holmes and the individual members of that firm. The securities being approved by the comptroller, the bank resumed business, but the liabilities of Russell & Holmes to the bank have not been satisfied. This action was brought in the district court of Johnson county to foreclose the lien of the plaintiff bank upon said bank stock so assigned. Upon the trial of the cause in the district court there were findings and a decree in favor of the plaintiff bank, and the defendants Edith R. Chamberlain and the Chamberlain Banking House have brought the case to this court by appeal.

1. It is contended by the plaintiffs in error that the transfer of the stock is voidable, because Edith R. Chamberlain was induced to assign the same by the misrepresentations of the officers and directors of the bank and the national bank examiner. The trial court made the following finding of fact: "To obtain the assignment and transfer of said certificate by his daughter, James D. Russell said to her that everything had been straightened up at the bank; that she would not lose the stock; that they simply wanted it for a short time in order to enable Mr. Griffith to make a better showing to the comptroller at Washington; that the paper it was to secure had been passed on by the directors, and said to be good, but that, in any event, in case the paper was not good, there was other collateral,—$30,000 of his and Mr. Holmes's life insurance; also stock in the banks at Sterling, Elk Creek, and Johnson, and stock in the stone quarry company,—so hers would not be touched. Similar statements were made by the examiner to her husband, to her brother-in-law, and in the presence of the witness Mr. Rood, each of whom reported to her what the examiner had said. Edith Russell Chamberlain relied on what her father said to her and on what her husband, her brother-in-law, and Mr. Rood reported to her was said by Mr. Griffith, the examiner, and was thereby induced to make said assignment and transfer of said stock." And the following conclusions of law: "Although James D. Russell was a director of plaintiff bank at the time he made the statements to his daughter, Edith Russell Chamberlain, on which she relied, and which induced her to assign and transfer her said stock, yet he was then acting for himself alone, and not for or on behalf of the plaintiff. His statements, however false and fraudulent they may have been, were not the statements of the plaintiff, nor made on its behalf, and were not binding on plaintiff. John M. Griffith, national bank examiner, had no authority to make representations of any kind which could in law bind the plaintiff bank. His powers are defined by the national statutes. Each person dealing with him is bound to know the extent of his authority. His statements to Charles M. Chamberlain, to Clarence K. Chamberlain, and in the presence of Rood, which they reported to defendant Edith Russell Chamberlain, were not binding upon plaintiff bank, were not such as he had power to make, and were not such as, though false, would give defendant a standing in equity to avoid the said transfer of her said stock to plaintiff." It is insisted that this finding of fact is not supported by the evidence, and it is argued that, because Russell's interest would be subverted by the bank's resumption of business, therefore, in the absence of evidence on that point, it cannot be presumed that Russell did not represent his bank interest as well as his individual interest. But we think that this position is not well taken. The evidence shows that Russell had borrowed a large amount of money from the bank, and incurred large obligations to the bank by his indorsements, with Holmes, of commercial paper transferred to the bank. It is true that Russell and Holmes were directors of the bank, and as such officers had, with the other three directors, control of the affairs of the bank; but they also had personal individual business with the bank, and in their personal transactions with the bank they could not represent the bank, nor participate in such representation. When they incurred obligations to the bank, or furnished further securities for existing obligations, they represented only themselves. Someone else acted for the bank. All of the difficulties of the bank arose out of the inability of Russell & Holmes to square themselves with the bank. This they undertook to do. They did not have sufficient funds of their own. It was necessary to call upon their friends. Mr. Russell, after he had exhausted all other resources, went to his daughter. He asked her to help him, not the bank. She was requested to place her stock so that Mr. Russell could use it as he used his own resources; that is, to regain his standing in the bank, and continue the bank in business. The circumstance that the assignment was direct to the bank, instead of to Russell and by him to the bank, has no significance. She trusted her father with her bank stock, to be used by him as his own, and for his own purposes. Mrs. Chamberlain and her advisers knew that Russell was acting for himself in procuring her stock. No doubt, in obtaining this security, he served his "bank interest" as well as his "individual interest;" but he represented his individual interest, and the bank in this transaction was represented by the other three directors, and not by Russell, as the dealing was directly between Russell and the bank. His position in this transaction is not left in doubt by the evidence. It is, of course, true that, after the bank examiner had closed the doors of the bank and taken possession of its assets, the officers of the bank could not transact its ordinary business, and any attempt by them to do so without the consent of the comptroller would be nugatory; but, on the other hand, it is undoubtedly true that under the law the comptroller was clothed with discretionary power to allow the bank to resume business if proper provisions were made to restore its assets, and enable it to comply with the requirements of the national banking law. When the bank, through its three disinterested directors, undertook to do this, the comptroller, through the examiner, consented, and informed the parties that, if they could make such arrangements as to restore the financial condition of the bank, the examiner would return the control of the assets to the bank officers. When the officers of the bank undertook, with that understanding, to make such arrangements, it was understood by all parties that any contracts that they attempted to enter into to that end were subject to the condition that they should succeed in restoring the assets of the bank, and be thereby enabled to receive full control of the affairs and business of the bank from the comptroller; that is, the bank examiner did not undertake to conduct the negotiations, but allowed the parties to go ahead, and make their own contracts, bearing in mind that they would be of no force and could not be carried out until the assets of the bank were restored. The contracts and arrangements were thereupon made between the parties upon that condition. It was outside of the duties of the examiner, and outside of the authority conferred upon him, to negotiate for the replenishing of the assets of the bank. From that time, in regard to these negotiations, the comptroller, through the examiner, acted rather as a disinterested arbitrator between the officers of the bank, who were desirous of opening its doors, and the creditors of the bank, for the protection of whose interests he had intervened, than as the agent of either party. Any information that he might give to either party interested would be entirely voluntary on his part. When the friends of Mrs. Chamberlain went to the examiner for information, they did so at their own risk, and cannot hold the bank responsible for his statements. It is very clear that Mr. Griffith was not the agent of the bank in the transaction in question. "He had no authority, as such [examiner], to act for the bank in any manner, and could not bind it by any act done or undertaken in its behalf. He represented a department of the government which supervises and controls the banks as to whether in certain cases they shall do business at all or not; but it does none for them, other than to wind up their affairs for their creditors. The examiner makes report to that department to furnish a basis for action with reference to the continuance of the banks in business. His reports might be favorable or otherwise, as any advice he should give might be followed. He doubtless acted for the best interests of the creditors of the bank in giving this advice, but what was done in following it had no more effect than as if it had been done without it." Witters v. Soules, 32 Fed. 764. The appointment of a receiver does not work a dissolution of the corporation. First Nat. Bank v. National Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall. 383, 20 L. ed. 840. The authority of its officers is not destroyed, but partially suspended; and the result of the proceedings may be that the corporation is dissolved, or its powers fully restored, and this will depend upon conditions as they may be developed, or may be brought about, by prompt action on the part of those interested in the bank. In the meantime the examiner, from the time he takes possession, has certain designated powers and duties. He must take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of the association, and may collect the debts due and claims belonging to it, but he is given no general powers to act for the corporation. When he stated to Mr. Chamberlain's advisers that he wanted the liabilities of Russell & Holmes provided for, and that arrangements were being made to induce the comptroller to authorize the bank to resume business, and that he wanted to make as good showing to the comptroller to that end as possible, he was acting in the line of his duty, and no one could possibly be deceived in regard to his position in the matter. And when he further stated to Mrs. Chamberlain's advisers that everything had been straightened up at the bank, that she would not lose the stock, that the paper it was to secure had been passed upon by the directors and said to be good, and other representations in regard to the condition and value of the securities that had been turned over to the bank by Russell & Holmes, Mrs. Chamberlain's advisers must have known the capacity in which he was acting, and that he had no authority to bind the bank by statements of that character, and had no knowledge in regard to the condition and value of the securities, except that they had been passed upon by the directors; and they were bound to know, and must certainly, under the circumstances, in fact have known, that Mrs. Chamberlain, if she furnished these securities, was furnishing them to Mr. Russell, that her contract was entirely with him, and that the transactions were had for the purpose of enabling Russell & Holmes to so far make good their default with the bank as to make it proper and safe on the part of the comptroller to authorize the bank to resume business.

2. The suggestion that the contract of Russell & Holmes with the bank was illegal, and therefore the guaranty of Mrs. Chamberlain void, is without merit. The authority of Workington's Bkg. Co. v. Rautenberg, 103 Ill. 460, 42 Am. Rep. 26, has been questioned, and, if it is to be regarded as a correct exposition of the law, it is not in point here. In that case, after an officer of the bank had already borrowed beyond the legal limit, the bank made him a further loan. The surety on this loan was held not liable. The court held that the note given by him to the bank for the further loan was illegal and void, and any guaranty of its payment by a third person equally void; but the rule, so far as we are aware, has never been extended to a case like the one at bar. In the case of Denison v. Gibson, 24 Mich. 194, Gibson sold his bank stock to Mrs. Denison's husband and others, and Mrs. Denison pledged her separate property as security upon the deferred payments to Gibson, and it was held "that the agreement of the surety is not binding where the bargain between the primary parties, out of which it springs, is contaminated by positive illegalities." No such condition exists in this case. It was not illegal for Russell & Holmes to restore to the bank what they had unlawfully drawn therefrom, and their agreement with the bank which involved the use of Mrs. Chamberlain's securities did not contemplate that they should withdraw funds from the bank, but rather that they should restore funds already borrowed. No doubt it was in the interest of every stockholder, including Russell & Holmes, to have the liabilities of Russell & Holmes to the bank provided for; and it was also in the line of the examiner's duties to encourage this. The suggestion that these securities were given the bank to secure an existing indebtedness, and that the contract containing the original indebtedness was illegal, is also without foundation. The evidence does not show that the liabilities of Russell & Holmes were incurred in pursuance of an illegal contract between themselves and the bank, but rather that it was created by the misconduct of Russell & Holmes, and without the consent of the bank.

3. It is argued that, as "Russell & Holmes were both by law and by subsisting contract bound to make good their obligations expressed by their indorsement, or to secure them, hence the promise to extend the time to do so could be no consideration for doing it." But the agreement was that Russell & Holmes should give further securities for their liability to the bank, and upon doing so their relations with the bank should be restored, and they receive the benefits that would obviously accrue through such restored relations. They manifestly would derive advantages, under these arrangements, from furnishing additional security. Their agreement to give such security was executed, and the assets of the bank passed from the hands of the comptroller, and other changes in the interest of the stockholders and creditors of the bank were made as contemplated in their agreement, and they cannot now be heard to say that there was no consideration for furnishing this security.

4. It is also argued that, if a principal avails himself of the fruits of the unauthorized acts of his agent, he thereby authorizes these acts, and they become binding upon the principal. But this rule of law has no application here. The unauthorized acts relied upon were not the acts of the agent of the bank, nor of anyone who assumed to act for the bank in the transaction in question. As we have already seen, the bank was acting through the three directors not personally interested in the transaction, and not through Russell & Holmes or the bank examiner. If an agent is employed to transact the business of his principal, and in doing so goes beyond his authority, the principal who employs him and who accepts the results of his employment must accept also the obligations assumed by his unauthorized acts. But where a principal is represented by a duly authorized agent, and some third person, who may also be benefited by the transaction, assumes, without the knowledge or consent of the principal, to make representations and statements, the principal will not be bound by such statements. Spurgin v. Traub, 65 Ill. 170. In this case the three disinterested directors were the proper parties to represent the bank, and assumed to do so, and acted for the bank in making the arrangements with Russell & Holmes. They made no representation to Mrs. Chamberlain, and they were not aware that either Mr. Russell or the bank examiner had made the representations in question. The bank, through these directors, received these securities from Mr. Russell, and there is no evidence indicating that there was any collusion between the officers who transacted this business on the part of the bank and Russell & Holmes or the bank examiner. The bank, therefore, is not chargeable with the representations made by them.

It is therefore recommended that the decree of the district court be affirmed.

Oldham and Pound, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Two successive petitions for rehearing denied.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Samuel S. COLEY

v.

NORTH CAROLINA RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(128 N. C. 534, 129 N. C. 407.)

1. Using a switching engine without a hand-hold on the tender does not constitute an assumption of the risk of such defect by the employee, where the statute makes railroad companies liable for injuries to employees from "any defect in the machinery, ways, or appliances," and makes void any agreement to waive the benefit of the statute.
2. The jury must decide whether or not a railroad employee is negligent in using a drainpipe upon a tender for a grab iron to assist him in climbing onto the tender, in the absence of such iron.
3. The damages for a personal injury caused by negligence may be the "present cash value" of the injury to the injured person, taking into consideration pain and mental suffering, and not allowing anything as a punishment, or punitive damages.

On Rehearing.

4. The legislature may lawfully charge railroad companies with liability to employees for injuries caused by defects in machinery, ways, or appliances, and forbid the waiving of this liability by contract.
5. The defense of contributory negligence is not destroyed by a statute making railroad companies liable to employees for injuries caused by defects in machinery, ways, or appliances, and forbidding the waiving of this liability by contract.

I. Introductory remarks.

In this annotation it is proposed to review the decisions respecting the provisions in the English employers' liability act, and the various statutes, colonial and American, in which its phraseology has been more or less closely copied on the subject of employers' liability for defects in their plant.

Statutes similar to the English act have been adopted in Ontario, British Columbia, Manitoba, Newfoundland, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Massachusetts, Alabama, Colorado, Indiana, and New York.

These provisions of the English act are § 1, subsec. 1, and § 2, subsecs. 1, 3, which correspond, respectively, to § 3, cl. 1, and § 6, cl. 1, 3, of the Ontario act. They run as follows, the additions made in the Canadian statute to that of the mother country being indicated by the words inclosed in brackets, except as otherwise stated:

Where [after the commencement of this act] personal injury is caused to a workman, (1) by reason of any defect in the condition [or arrangement] of the ways, works, machinery [buildings or premises], or plant connected with, intended for, or used in, the business of the employer, . . . the workman, or, in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of, nor in the service of, the employer, nor engaged in his work.

Sec. 2. A workman [or his legal representatives, or any person entitled in case of his death] shall not be entitled, under this act, to any right of compensation or remedy against the employer in any of the following cases, that is to say: (1) Under subsection 1 of sec-

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. A. B. Andrews, Jr., and F. H. Busbee, for appellant:

Plaintiff voluntarily accepted the risk of employment, arising out of the construction of the engine.

hofer v. Ernating, 23 Ind. App. 188, 55 N. E. 113.

When the servant has equal facilities with the master for ascertaining the danger incident to the labor in which he is engaged, he takes the risk upon himself.

Missouri, K & T. R. Co. v. Spellman (Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 298; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Lempe, 59 Tex. 19.

If the plaintiff's work was rendered more hazardous than it otherwise would have been, no liability can be predicated of such negligence. All those things were perfectly obvious to him; and if a servant chooses to enter into an employment involving danger of personal injury which the master might have avoided, he takes upon himself the risk of all the hazards incident to the employment, the existence of which is known to him, or which are plain and obvious.

tion 1 [that is clause 1, of section 3 of the Ontario act], unless the defect therein mentioned arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer, and [the Ontario act omits the words italicized] intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the condition or arrangement of the ways, works, machinery [building or premises], or plant were in proper condition. (3) In any case where the workman knew of the defect or negligence which caused his injury, and failed [without reasonable excuse] within a reasonable time to give, or cause to be given, information thereof to the employer or some person superior to himself in the service of his employer, unless he was aware that the employer or such superior already knew of the said defect or negligence. [Provided, however, that such workman shall not, by reason only of his continuing in the employment of the employer with knowledge of the defect, negligence, act, or omission, which caused his injury, be deemed to have voluntarily incurred the risk of the injury.]

The provisions of the other statutes on this subject will appear below in the statement of the decisions construing them.

II. Effect of these statutory provisions as to defects; generally.

The effect of these provisions, as a whole, is to give, under the circumstances specified, a statutory sanction to a doctrine which, so far as the common law is concerned, has been greatly restricted in England and the English colonies by the well-known case of Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, as to the precise effect of which, see a note to O'Neill v. Great Northern R. Co. (1900; Minn.) 51 L. R. A. 572, but which has been fully developed and is applied in all the American states,—the doctrine, namely, that the master is absolutely responsible for the proper discharge of certain duties, whether he undertakes to perform them in person, or employs an agent to perform them in his stead. In other words, the injured servant is given a right to recover damages in the cases enumerated, although the abnormal conditions which caused his injury may have been created or suffered to continue through the negligence of a fellow servant. See remarks in Ashley v. Hart (1888) 147 Mass. 573, 1 L. R. A. 355, 18 N. E. 416.

Hence, in order to establish the allegations of a complaint framed on the theory that the 57 L. R. A.

master is liable under this section, it is not necessary to show that he was himself negligent.

Lynch v. Allyn (1893) 160 Mass. 248, 35 N. E. 550, where the action was for personal injuries occasioned to the plaintiff by the falling upon him of a bank of earth which he was engaged in undermining by direction of defendant's superintendent, held that the defendant was not entitled to a ruling that "the plaintiff cannot recover under the second count of his declaration, as there was no evidence that there was any negligence on the part of the defendant."

So far as regards the character of the actual physical conditions which warrant the inference of culpability on the part of the immediate actor, whether he be the master himself or an employee, the evidential prerequisites to establishing a right to indemnity are essentially the same under the statutes as at common law. See infra, VIII. and X.

III. Master not liable unless the defect alleged was the proximate cause of the injury.

Upon the general principles of the law of negligence, as well as by the express terms of the statutes, the injured servant cannot maintain an action unless he shows that the defect alleged was the proximate cause of his injury. Southern R. Co. v. Guyton (1898) 122 Ala. 231, 25 So. 34.

Thus, he cannot recover if his injuries were due to an occurrence which was a mere accident. McManus v. Hay (1882) 9 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 425.

A freight brakeman cannot recover for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defects in a brake which he was trying to let loose, causing the brake to stick or be retarded in its revolutions, and throwing him from the top of a box car, in the absence of proof that the brake was defective, or that his falling was not due to his slipping, or to some other cause wholly unconnected with any defect in the brake. Louisville & N. E. Co. v. Binlon (1892) 98 Ala. 570, 14 So. 619.

In Hamilton v. Groesbeck (1891) 18 Ont. App. Rep. 437, Affirming (1889) 19 Ont. Rep. 76, the court of appeal held the action not maintainable, for the reason that the proximate cause of the injury was not the unguarded condition of the saw by which the plaintiff was hurt, but the fact that he tripped over a pile of staves.

The servant cannot recover if the negligence of a fellow servant in the use of the defective appliance was the actual, efficient cause of the injury.

New England Steam Brick Co.* 20 R. I. 452, 40 Atl. 7; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Jackson, 85 Va. 489, 8 S. E. 370; Wabash R. Co. v. Ray, 152 Ind. 392, 51 N. E. 920; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rogers, 6 C. C. A. 403, 13 U. S. App. 547, 57 Fed. 378; Wood, Railway Law, §§ 379, 386; Shackleton v. Manistee & N. E. R. Co. 107 Mich. 16, 64 N. W. 728; Quinn v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 175 Mass. 150, 55 N. E. 891; Turner v. Goldsboro Lumber Co. 119 N. C. 400, 26 S. E. 23; Pierce, Railroads, p. 379; Wood, Mast. & S. p. 749; Ft. Wayne, J. & S. R. Co. v. Gildersleeve, 33 Mich. 133; Whitaker's Smith, Neg. 133; Bishop, Non-Contract Law, § 677.

The fact that a defect existed, and that the plaintiff had to be assigned to the work of remedying it, is not the proximate cause of an injury received by him in consequence of a fellow servant's negligently setting machinery in motion while he was engaged in the work. Mackay v. Watson (1897) 23 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 383.

Nor can he recover if the defect in question would not have caused any injury if he had not himself been guilty of negligence in dealing with the defective appliance.

A defect in the machinery is not the cause of an injury received by a workman in consequence of his using it in an unsafe manner when he knew how to use it with safety to himself. Martin v. Connah's Quay Alkali Co. (1885) 33 Week. Rep. 216, where the plaintiff knew that a car brake was bent, and did not see that it was in its proper position before signaling to the engineer to move the car. See also Milligan v. M'Alpine (1888) 4 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 789.

The contributory negligence of the plaintiff, not the negligence of the master, is the proximate cause of the injury, where a miner, knowing of the need of props, continues working, and is injured by the fall of the roof. Pittsburgh & W. Coal Co. v. Estlevenard (1895) 53 Ohio St. 43, 40 N. E. 725.

But proof that a defect, for the existence of which the master was responsible, was the sole proximate cause of the injury, is not a condition precedent to recovery. It is only requisite to show that it was one of the efficient causes.

A plaintiff is entitled to a verdict in his favor, where the jury find that the injury was caused by a defect in the plant, and also by the negligence of a fellow servant. Bean v. Harper (1892) 18 Vict. L. Rep. 388.

Compare common-law cases, to the same effect, in note to Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (1901; C. C. App. 7th Ct.) 54 L. R. A. pp. 167 et seq.

IV. What instrumentalities are covered by the terms "ways," etc.

It will be observed that the words used to designate the instrumentalities for the defects of which the master is made responsible are not precisely the same in the statutes now under discussion. In all of them the terms "ways," "works," and "machinery" are found. But the expression "plant," which occurs in the English act, as well as in those of the various British colonies and of Alabama, is omitted in the statutes of Massachusetts, Colorado, and New York. In the Indiana act the list of instrumentalities enumerated in the English act is enlarged by the addition of the word "tools." That these variations of phraseology imply corresponding differences in the total extent of the master's liability cannot be affirmed in view of the decisions as they stand, though possibly some case may hereafter arise in which they may be found material.

District of Columbia v. McElligott, 117 U. S. 621, 29 L. ed. 946, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 884; 2 Thomp. Neg. ed. 1880, § 1008; 3 Wood, Railway Law, § 370; Cowles v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 84 N. C. 309, 37 Am. Rep. 620; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612.

That the risk was not voluntarily undertaken, because plaintiff was influenced by a fear of losing his employment, does not change the rule.

ous British colonies and of Alabama, is omitted in the statutes of Massachusetts, Colorado, and New York. In the Indiana act the list of instrumentalities enumerated in the English act is enlarged by the addition of the word "tools." That these variations of phraseology imply corresponding differences in the total extent of the master's liability cannot be affirmed in view of the decisions as they stand, though possibly some case may hereafter arise in which they may be found material.

a. Two or more descriptive terms used in combination.

In the cases where the court, in affirming or denying the defendant's liability, has coupled together two or more of the instrumentalities specified in the statute under review, it is impossible to say with certainty to which designation it was intended to refer the instrumentality which caused the injury.

A defect in the "ways, works, machinery, or plant," enumerated in the Alabama statute, has been held to exist where the supply pipe of a water tank extended over a railroad track, so as to knock a brakeman off the top of a freight car. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Thompson (1891) 94 Ala. 636, 10 So. 280.

In an Alabama case it has been held that a rope used for lowering timber in the construction of a trestle along a railroad track, by means of which heavy timbers are put into their places, is, in no sense, a part of the ways, works, machinery, or plant of a railroad company. Southern R. Co. v. Moore (1900) 128 Ala. 434, 20 So. 659. The court seems to have assumed that the authority of the two Alabama cases cited in IV. d, infra, declaring such an appliance not to be "machinery," is conclusive against the right of the servant to maintain the action. But there is no apparent reason why the rope in question should not be regarded as a part of the "plant."

The shorter formula—"ways, works, and machinery"—which occurs in the Massachusetts statute has been held to cover the following appliances:

A truck used by a railroad company as a part of the appliances of the repair shop, consisting of axles, wheels, and a frame, all fastened together and fitted to the tracks. Gunn v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1898) 171 Mass. 417, 50 N. E. 1031.

The statute goes no further than to remove the defense that the injury was sustained by the negligence of a fellow servant.

four days to a week at a time in each place, is a part of the owner's ways, works, and machinery while in use at a particular place. Prendible v. Connecticut River Mfg. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 131, 35 N. E. 675. (Held to be competent for the jury to find this.)

A temporary derrick at a stone yard, erected to move stones from cars to where stone cutters, who have nothing to do with setting it up, can use them, is a part of the "ways, works, and machinery" connected with the yard. McMahon v. McHale (1899) 174 Mass. 320, 54 N. E. 854. This is considered to be a part of the fitting of the stone yard, rather than an appliance to be put together and set up and moved from place to place by the workmen who are using it. See infra, XI.

Loaded freight cars received from other lines form a part of the "works and machinery" of the receiving company. Bowers v. Connecticut River R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 312, 38 N. E. 508. See also infra, V.

b. "Ways."

In its ordinary sense, this term may be regarded as embracing any part of the master's premises over which the servants pass, on foot or otherwise, from one point to another.

The course which a workman would, under ordinary circumstances, take in order to go from one part of a shop where part of the business is done, to another part where business is done when his duties require it, is a "way." Per Lord Esher. Willett v. Watt [1892] 2 Q. B. 92, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 540, 66 L. T. N. S. 818, 40 Week. Rep. 497, 56 J. P. 772.

Compare the statement that the word applies to such places as a workman or servant is called upon to pass over in the performance of his duty, in Caldwell v. Mills (1893) 24 Ont. Rep. 462, holding that a plank put down to serve as a fulcrum for a lever, if it is placed in such a position that servants have to pass over it in the course of their duties, is a "way."

For specific instances of "defects" in what are conceded to be "ways," see infra, VII. a.

To constitute a way, within the purview of the act, it is not necessary that it should be marked out by metes and bounds, or by habitual user.

In Willett v. Watt [1892] 2 Q. B. 92, 99, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 540, 66 L. T. N. S. 818, 40 Week. Rep. 497, 56 J. P. 772, Fry, L. J., said: "In determining what is a 'way' we should, I think, look to the fact that workmen have to go through places where sometimes there is an open space, while at other times what was an open space is covered with stores 57 L. R. A.

When but one construction can reasonably be drawn from the plaintiff's testimony or the admitted facts, we cannot see why it did not become a question of law,—as much so as if the facts stated in the evidence had been agreed to as the facts in the case. If this is so, it certainly became a question of law.

Miller v. Wilmington & P. R. Co. 128 N. C. 26, 38 S. E. 29; Neal v. Carolina C. R. Co. 128 N. C. 640, 49 L. R. A. 684, 36 S. E. 117; Pleasants v. Raleigh & A. Air-Line R. Co. 95 N. C. 195; Smith v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 99 N. C. 241, 5 S. E. 896.

When there is a safe and an unsafe way to perform any act, and a person selects the unsafe way, he cannot recover for any injury sustained.

or other things used in the business. We should consider, further, the case of an open yard where the whole or only a small part might be used at any time, according as there were a great many or only a few workmen going through it. I think that these and other considerations show that we should answer in the negative the question whether metes and bounds are necessary to a way under the statute. There are many ways which persons have a right to use that are not defined by any physical boundary, and to hold that such a boundary is necessary would be to withdraw from the protection given by the statute a large number of places used by workmen in which the mischief at which the statute was aimed might arise. For the purpose of this case, I should say that wherever there is a large space connected with or used in the business of the employer, over which the workmen pass in the course of their employment, when that space is for the time being vacant, and is so used, it is a way within the meaning of the statute."

In a more special sense, the term signifies the line or course along which a thing which is being worked on or with is caused to move.

The most familiar instance of such a way is a railway track. See Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton (1892) 97 Ala. 240, 12 So. 88; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bouldin (1895) 110 Ala. 185, 20 So. 325; McQuade v. Dixon (1887) 14 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 1039.

A roadway of iron plates, along which loads are conveyed on a car, was held to be a way, in McGiffin v. Palmer's Shipbuilding & Iron Co. (1882) L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 5, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 25, 47 L. T. N. S. 346, 31 Week. Rep. 118, 47 J. P. 70.

Doubtless the term would also be held to include the ways in a ship-building yard, or the skids used for the transfer of heavy articles, such as logs, barrels, etc., or the posts between which the hammer of a pile-driver moves up and down.

The ways with which the cases deal are usually horizontal or sloping. But presumably the term also covers such instrumentalities as the vertical shaft of a mine or of an elevator.

In Pegram v. Dixon (1886) 55 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 447, 51 J. P. 198, 2 Times L. R. 603, it was apparently assumed that a lift-well in a building under construction becomes a way when workmen place ladders in it for the purpose of obtaining access to the upper floors.

Mcassrs. T. M. Argo and W. H. Day for appellee.

Furchee, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for injuries by the defendant road. In the "case" it is stated: That the defendant North Carolina Railroad had been leased to the Southern before the injury complained of was received, and that the Southern was in possession and operating the same at that time. But, as no point was made as to this fact on the trial of the case nor on appeal, we will give it no further attention. The plaintiff was an experienced railroad man, having been engaged in railroad work for more than twenty years, and had been in the employ of the defendant for the last four years; and on the 14th of June, 1898, while in the employment of the defendant as conductor of the shifting engine at Goldsboro, he received the injury complained of. That prior to and until the 20th of May, 1898, he had used a regular shifting engine with a sloping or turtle-top tender, but on that day the defendant took this engine and tender from Goldsboro, and replaced it with an old road engine and tender, unsuited for use as a be regarded as connotative of the same idea as "system."

In Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 60 L. J. Q. B. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 487, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660, Lord Watson, in commenting on the finding of the jury that the manner in which the apparatus in question was used betokened negligence, first referred to the method adopted as being a "defective system," and, in a later passage of his opinion, remarked that the evidence brought the case within the operation of the rule, that a dangerous arrangement of machinery and tackle constitutes a "defect" in the condition of the works.

d. "Machinery."

The term "machine" has been defined as "every mechanical device or combination of mechanical powers and devices to perform some function, and produce a certain effect or result." Corning v. Burden (1853) 15 How. 287, 14 L. ed. 690 (patent case).

Such a definition obviously excludes such an appliance as a hammer disconnected from other mechanical appliances and operated only by muscular strength. Georgia P. R. Co. v. Brooks (1887) 84 Ala. 138, 4 So. 289 (employee injured by scale flying from an iron rail struck by a hammer wielded by a fellow servant).

It would seem that, if the rail was in such a condition as to render such an accident probable, the defendant should have been held liable as for a defect in the "plant," or in the "works."

This word does not include a steel bar used to align the track on a railway bridge. Clements v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. (1900) 127 Ala. 168, 28 So. 643. The reason assigned was that the bar was "disconnected from any other mechanical appliances, and operated by muscular strength directly applied." Apparently the action might have been maintained in both these cases if the pleader had alleged defects in the "plant."

For specific examples of appliances viewed as "machinery," the point actually involved being whether there was a defect, see infra, VII. c.

e. "Plant."

See also infra, V.

This term includes "whatever apparatus is used by a business man for carrying on his business,—not h's stock in trade which he buys or makes for sale, but all goods and chattels, fixed or movable, live or dead, which he keeps for permanent employment in his business." 57 L. R. A.

Yarmouth v. France (1887) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 647, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 7, 36 Week. Rep. 281, per Lord Esher, who thus disposed of the contention that a horse was not a part of the "plant:" "It is suggested that nothing that is animate can be plant; that is, that living creatures can in no sense be considered plant. Why not? In many businesses horses and carts, wagons, or drays, seem to me to form the most material part of the plant; they are the materials or instruments which the employer must use for the purpose of carrying on his business, and without which he could not carry it on at all. The principal part of the business of a wharfinger is conveying goods from the wharf to the houses or shops or warehouses of the consignees; and for this purpose he must use horses and carts or wagons. They are all necessary for the carrying on of the business. It cannot for a moment be contended that the carts and wagons are not 'plant.' Can it be said that the horses, without which the carts and wagons would be useless, are not?"

To same effect, see Harston v. Edinburgh Co. (1887) 14 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 621; Fraser v. Hood (1887) 15 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 178.

For examples of instrumentalities assumed to come within this definition, see infra, VII. d.

V. Significance of the qualifying phrase, "connected with or used in the business of the employer."

a. Instrumentalities temporarily used by servants in the transaction of the business.

The mere fact that the employer did not own the defective instrumentality which caused the injury will not protect him, if, as a matter of fact, it was being used in his business at the time of the accident. Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21, 28 N. E. 1128; Engel v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 260, 22 L. R. A. 283, 35 N. E. 547; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davis (1890) 91 Ala. 487, 8 So. 552.

Whether there was such a use within the meaning of the statutes, is determined with reference to various considerations. In some cases the essential question is whether or not he himself or his agent had, at the time when the injury was received, adopted the instrumentality as a part of the plant by means of which the employee was expected to perform his duties. If such adoption is shown, he is considered to have assumed, as regards this temporary addition to his plant, a liability shifting engine and tender. That his work as switch engineer necessitated his riding on the rear end of the tender much of his time. That he could not successfully do the work of switch engineer without so riding. That, besides the tender of the last engine furnished being unsuited for his work, it had no hand-holds or "grab irons" to enable him to raise himself upon its platform with safety, which it was necessary for him to do to enable him to signal the engineer. That he saw and knew this tender had no hand-holds or grab irons when he received it on the 20th of May, and he knew that it was dangerous to use it without them, but that he used it, and continued to use it, without such grab irons, until the 14th of June, when he received the injury complained of. That to supply the place of the grab irons, or, rather, because there were no grab irons, he used the drainpipes from the top of the tender. These were tubes or hollow cylinders leading from the top of the tender to take off the overflowing water, and were never intended to be used as hand-holds. The plaintiff says that he had frequently used them as hand-holds before the day of the injury, though he had used the one on the other side of the tender most. That on the day of the injury he had driven down to some lumber cars, and attached the shifting engine to them, and gave the signal to the engineer to move out. To do this the engine would have to move backward, and when he gave the signal to move he undertook to get on the platform of the tender, and, for the want of grab irons, he took hold of the drainpipe, which gave way (pulled out or broke off), and he fell to the ground, and was run over by one of the wheels of which, it would seem, is of precisely the same character and extent as that to which he is subject, as regards his own property.

Lack of ventilation of the hold of a vessel belonging to a navigation company, in which coal is shipped by contractors to supply coal to a railway at another port, where such contractors have to unload the coal, in consequence of which one of their employees is injured by an explosion of gas accumulating in the hold, is a defect in the plant of such contractors. Carter v. Clarke (1898) 78 L. T. N. S. 76, 14 Times L. R. 172.

It has been laid down, without qualification, that a defect in a cart hired temporarily to carry a load is not a defect in the plant. Allmarch v. Walker (1885) 78 L. T. Jour. 391. But this ruling seems to be inconsistent with the one last cited, and to be unjustifiable in general principles. The report is so meager that it is impossible to say precisely what the standpoint of the court may have been.

Manifestly, no adoption within the meaning of the above doctrine, can be inferred, where the employee or his fellow workmen took and made use of the defective instrumentality without any authority, either express or implied, from the employer himself or his agent. Under such circumstances no liability can be predicated from the fact that there was a defect, and that a proper inspection would have disclosed it.

It has been held that where a servant, while at work on a new building owned by his employer, was injured by reason of the defective condition of planks laid on the top of walls 5 feet from the ground by some of his fellow workmen, he cannot recover, as such planks, used merely for temporary purposes, cannot be considered as ways or works within the meaning of the statute. Morris v. Walworth Mfg. Co. (1902; Mass.) 63 N. E. 910.

A verdict for an employee was set aside where the injury was caused by the giving way of a ladder which the workmen themselves had taken and used simply because they found it lying on the premises where they were sent to work, and which had not been borrowed, so as to become a part of the plant, by any person having authority to make it a part of such plant. Jones v. Burford (1884) 1 Times L. R. 137.

A complaint of which the gravamen is that the plant was defective is not sustained by evidence showing that the plaintiff, a painter in the employ of a firm of contractors doing work on a government building, asked his foreman for a ladder; and that, being referred by the foreman to the government official in charge of the work, he was told that he might have a ladder belonging to the government; and that the ladder which he thus obtained proved to be so defective that it broke under him. Perry v. Brass (1889) 5 Times L. R. 253. The court relied mainly on the fact that the ladder did not belong to the defendants, but Denman, J., also laid stress on the fact that their foreman knew nothing about it. The correctness of this decision under the particular facts in evidence seems somewhat dubious, as it may fairly be argued that the permission of a foreman to use whatever appliance a designated person may supply should have the effect of making the appliance actually selected a part of the plant.

The essential basis of other decisions is that the words of the provision now under discussion imply that "the defect must be one which the employer has a right to remedy if he does discover it, and of a kind which it is possible to charge a servant with the duty of setting right." Engel v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 260, 22 L. R. A. 283, 35 N. E. 547, holding that a railroad track owned, maintained, and repaired by a manufacturing company, and used by a railroad company only under a license or invitation to deliver freight under a contract, is not a part of the railroad company's "ways." In delivering the opinion of the majority of the court, Holmes, J., said: "We think that neither the language of the statute, nor good sense, would permit us to hold an employer liable under the act for defects which he cannot help, in a place out of his control, to which his employees once in a while may be called for a few minutes."

A railroad company that only goes upon the track of another under a license to take cars therefrom, and has no control over it, is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by its defective character. Trask v. Old Colony R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 298, 31 N. E. 6.

An employee of a gas company, hired to remove gas pipe from a trench dug by authority of the city, has no right to expect his employer to shore the sides of the trench or to make it safer than it was, for he must be taken to know that his employer had no control over it. Hughes v. Malden & M. Gaslight Co. (1897) 168 Mass. 393, 47 N. E. 125.

The location of the tracks of a street-car company being determined by the municipal authorities, it cannot be charged with failure to provide a safe place for its conductor for the reason that there is a tree close to the side of the tender. His arm was crushed so badly that it was necessary to amputate it, and he was badly injured otherwise. And he contends that it was no fault of his that he was injured, but that it was caused by the fault and negligence of the defendant in not furnishing him a tender with grab irons, with which to do his work. While, on the other hand, the defendant does not deny but what it was guilty of negligence in not furnishing a tender with grab irons, it contends that this was a patent defect, seen and known by the plaintiff on the 20th of May, when he received this engine and tender; and, by his continuing to use the same from that time to the time of the injury, that was a waiver of any objection on that account, and an "assumption of the risk" of any damage that might result from such defect. The defendant also contends that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to, and was the proximate cause of, his injury, and that he cannot recover on that account. The defendant also contends that there are errors in the judge's charge to the jury, in charging what he should not have charged, and by refusing to give special requests of the defendant that he should have given. The defendant also contends that the judge erred in his instructions to the jury as to the measure of damages, as pointed out in its assignment of errors, as that was the earliest opportunity it had of doing so.

While this case was ably and carefully tried, it is apparent from the record, the prayers for instruction, and the argument of counsel on both sides, that the main contention below, as it was in this court, was as to whether the plaintiff had "assumed the car, unless it is shown that the company had a right to remove the tree. Hall v. Wakefield & S. Street R. Co. (1901) 178 Mass. 98, 59 N. E. 668.

The want of a fence at the top of a declivity at one side of a public street used by the employer as an approach to his place of business is not a defect for which he can be held liable. Stride v. Diamond Glass Co. (1895) 26 Ont. Rep. 270, Following Engel v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 260, 22 L. R. A. 283, 35 N. E. 547.

Discussing the question whether the defective condition of a public street, which was used by the employer in connection with his business, was a defect in a "way used in the business," within the meaning of the Ontario employers' liability act, § 3, subsec. 1, Boyd, Ch., said: "Light is thrown upon the scope of these words by § 6, subsec. 1, which provides that the workman shall not be able to recover unless the defect arose from, or had not been remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer. That means some defect on his premises, or on a place over which he had control, that could be made right by the employer. Such is not the case in regard to a public street upon which the employer had no right to construct a fence or barrier, as is here suggested. One part of the street is higher than the other, but it is the business of the corporation of the city to deal with the alleged defect in the interests of the public, or be exposed to action by injured persons."

A coalmaster is not liable to a servant for injuries caused by defects in wagons sent by a railway company to be loaded with coal for carriage, and left at the pit in charge of his servants. Such wagons are not a part of the coalmaster's plant, and, even if they are, he is not, under such circumstances, under the duty of inspecting them before allowing the servants to use them. Robinson v. Watson (1892) 20 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 144.

An auctioneer selling goods on the premises of a stranger is not responsible to his servants for the sufficiency of the appliances for bringing forward and removing the goods which are to be sold. Nelson v. Scott (1892) 19 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 425.

A corollary of this doctrine is that, unless there is something to put him on inquiry, a master is not under any active duty of inspection with regard to an instrumentality not under his control.

The failure of a gas company to ask how long a trench dug by the city has been dug, and to tell its employee the length of time, 57 L. R. A.

before sending such employee into the same to remove gas pipe therefrom, does not render it liable for an injury to the employee caused by the caving in of the trench. Hughes v. Malden & M. Gaslight Co. (1897) 168 Mass. 395, 47 N. E. 125. The plaintiff, said the court, "had a right to expect that if the defendant knew of any danger which the plaintiff did not know and ought not to be assumed to know, it would inform him. But no such knowledge on the part of the defendant was shown. It does not appear to have known anything except what was visible to the eye, or to have been able or bound to infer from what was visible anything which the plaintiff with his experience was not equally able to infer. What more could it have done? There is no reason to suppose that inspection would have disclosed anything beyond the visible facts, and therefore it is not necessary to consider whether the duty of inspection existing with regard to cars received from connecting lines to be forwarded on a railroad would be held to exist in such a case as this."

In the absence of any allegation of particular circumstances which would impose upon the master the duty of inspecting the fittings of a ship on which a stevedore or other person has contracted to do work, his servant cannot maintain an action against him for an injury caused by defects in those fittings. Simpson v. Paton (1896) 23 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 590; McLachlan v. S. S. Peveril Co. (1896) 23 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 753 (complaint, based on existence of duty to inspect, held to be demurrable). Lord Young dissented on the ground that the stevedore was not wholly exempt from the duty of supervision, and declined to assent to the proposition that there would be no liability if things were wrong, and by proper supervision, without requiring anything out of the way on his part, he would have discovered that they were in that condition.

The cases involving the liability of a railroad company for defects in a car received from another road have been made to turn upon the question whether they were loaded or empty.

Loaded cars, it is said, form a part of the works and machinery of the receiving company, inasmuch as the company is not bound to use them in its train if on inspection they are found to be unsafe. Bowers v. Connecticut River R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 312, 38 N. E. 508, settling this point, which was left undecided in the case next cited.

But an isolated empty car on its way to be the risk" of the defective tender in not having the grab irons; and this question has given us a great deal of trouble, as we had such a line of cases, commencing at least as far back as Crutchfield v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 78 N. C. 300; Johnson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 81 N. C. 454; Cowles v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 84 N. C. 312, 37 Am. Rep. 620; Hudson v. Charleston, C. & C. R. Co. 104 N. C. 501, 10 S. E. 669; Pleasants v. Raleigh & A. Air-Line R. Co. 95 N. C. 195; and other cases in our own Reports, besides many cases from other courts that seem to sustain the contention of the defendant; while there are more recent decisions in our own court, though not directly in point, that seem to sustain a different rule,—such as Greenlee v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 977, 41 L. R. A. 399, 30 S. E. 115; Trowler v. Southern R. Co. 124 N. C. 189, 44 L. R. A. 313, 32 S. E. 550, and Lloyd v. Hanes, 126 N. C. 361, 35 S. E. 611. But, after all, it seems that this important contention as to the "assumption of risk" is disposed of by chap. 56, Private Laws 1897, which was not called to our attention in the arguments or briefs, and which reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. That any servant or employee of any railroad company operating in this state, who shall suffer injury to his person, or the personal representative of any such servant or employee who shall have suffered death, in the course of his service or employment with said company, by the negligence, carelessness, or incompetency of any other servant, employee, or agent of the company, or by any defect in the machinery, ways, or appliances of the company, returned to its owner is a part of the ways, works, or machinery connected with or used in the business of a railroad company which received it loaded. Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21, 28 N. E. 1128. The court said: "By the terms 'ways, works, or machinery connected with or used in the business of the employer,' we understand something in the place, or means, appliances, or instrumentalities provided by the employer, for doing or carrying on the work which is to be done. The use of other words may not make the meaning clearer, but it would seem that there must be a defect in something which can, in some sense, be said to be provided by the employer."

It is, however, not apparent why the right of rejection, which undoubtedly exists in this instance as well as in the former, should not create a similar obligation. The distinction taken and its rationale are, it is submitted, unsatisfactory. In Massachusetts it is no longer of importance, since the passage of the amendatory act of 1893, chap. 359, declaring that the mere fact of a car being in the possession of a railroad company makes it a part of its "ways, works, or machinery."

In one case the principle is applied that a "defect," within the meaning of these statutes, exists where the physical conditions resulting from a use to which the servant's employer permits a stranger to put his premises are of such a nature that negligence would have been a warrantable inference if they had been created by the act of the employer himself or his agent. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. O'Leary (1899) 35 C. C. A. 562, 93 Fed. 737, where a railway company which permitted a guy to be stretched by a third person across its tracks, at a point where the volume of business required great diligence and care as to the condition of the track, was held liable for an injury to an employee, caused by failure to see that the guy was placed at a particular height to avoid such injury (construing the Massachusetts statute).

As the decisions holding that the master is not liable for an injury due to a defect in an instrumentality belonging to another person may be regarded as being essentially merely declarations that the wrong party is being sued, there would, at first sight, seem to be no serious practical objection to such applications of the general principle that responsibility is a juridical incident of the power of control, and does not exist apart from such power. But the extremely nebulous condition of the law defining the nature and extent of a stranger's liability to the servants of one with whom he has business relations involving the use of, or contact with, his property (see note to Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Berry [1899: Ind.] 46 L. R. A. 38) renders it wholly unwarrantable to assume that in all the cases in which the defendant will be absolved for the reason that he had no control over the defective instrumentality, the plaintiff will be able to maintain an action against the actual owner of that instrumentality. It is manifest, therefore, that the employment of this test to determine the applicability of these statutes will sometimes result in leaving the injured servant entirely remediless.

Under these circumstances, the doctrine that the possession or nonpossession of the power of control is the main differentiating factor in cases in which the existence or absence of authority to use the defective instrumentality is not involved, as one of the determinant elements, deserves to be somewhat closely scrutinized.

It is submitted that the clause in question may, upon a perfectly reasonable construction, be made to comprehend instrumentalities over which the employer has no control. The opposite contention would doubtless be irresistible if the failure to "remedy" defects were mentioned as the sole ground of liability. But the declaration of an alternative liability for the negligent failure to "discover" defects seems to be hardly susceptible of any other interpretation than that it was intended to extend the employer's responsibility beyond the cases in which the right to apply a remedy may be predicated. Such a declaration may fairly be regarded as a recognition of the principle that the application of a remedy is neither the only duty which the law implies, nor the only method by which the master can free himself from the imputation of negligence. On the one hand, where it is in his power to apply a remedy to the defect thus actually or constructively known to him, it may conceivably be, and in fact frequently is, his duty to warn his servants as to the existence of the defect, or to discontinue the use of the defective instrumentality until it has been restored to a safe condition. On the other hand, where it is not in his power to apply a remedy, the duties of warning or discontinuance become imperative, and by performing them he fully discharges his obligations to his servants. It is clear, therefore, that there are certain obligations to which he is subject in respect to instrumentalities which are out of his control, and that the negligence which consists in the shall be entitled to maintain an action against such company.

"Sec. 2. That any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, made by any employee of said company to waive the benefit of the aforesaid section, shall be null and void."

Commencing with the often-cited case of Priestley v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 1, what is known as the "fellow servant law" had been developed until it seems to have become to be a hardship on the employees of railroads, where there were so many employees whose rights depend on the action of some other employee; and Acts 1897, chap. 56, was passed to relieve such employees from what appeared to be a hardship, and oppressive upon them. And, while there had not been uniformity in the different jurisdictions as to what is called the "assumption of risk," it seemed to be well settled by the decisions of this court (see cases cited above) that, where an employee entered into the service of a railroad company using defective machinery, knowing of such defects, or where he continued in the employment, after having such knowledge, without notifying his superiors, and protesting against its continuance, such employee would have been held to have waived such objection, and to have assumed the risk arising from the use of such defective machinery. This, it seems, was considered by the legislature a hardship, and oppressive, as the competition was so great for such employment that employees were deterred from making such complaints lest they might lose their places. So it seems that the legislature undertook to relieve the employees of this trouble, as it deemed it to be a hardship. So the legislature, after providing relief against acts of failure to discover a defect cannot be dissociated from the negligence which consists in the breach of those obligations, for the reason that they arise as soon as the defect is known, and that it is presumed to be known wherever it would have been known if due care had been exercised.

It is submitted, therefore, that the balance of probability is in favor of the inference that the legislature intended to create a responsibility for injuries due to instrumentalities not controlled by the master, provided they are "connected with his business," and that, upon the true construction of the statute, the absence of the power of control merely affects the extent of that responsibility.

Some of the unsatisfactory consequences of the doctrine that the statute does not apply to cases where there is no power of control are pointed out in the dissenting opinion of Knowlton, J., in Engel v. New York, P. & B. R. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 260, 22 L. R. A. 283, 35 N. E. 547: "The employee finds a track of this kind used like other side tracks belonging to the corporation, adapted to the convenient transaction of its freighting business. Ordinarily he has no means of knowing whether the track is owned and maintained by the railroad corporation or by the manufacturer whose freight is brought over it. All he can see or know is that it is connected with and used in the business of the corporation in delivering freight. Whether an additional price is paid for the transportation of its cars or of the cars of other railroads over that track, he does not know, nor is it important for him to know. It is a place specially fitted for the work of his employer, on which his employer sets him at work, and in which the employer presumably has rights for the time being. It ought to make no difference, under the statute, how the employer procures the ways, works, or machinery connected with and used in his business, or by what kind of title he holds them. So long as they are connected with his business and used in it, it is his duty to have them safe, so that his employees may not be unnecessarily exposed to danger. If another owns and furnishes them, and agrees to keep them safe, it is his duty, as between him and his employee, to see that the owner properly does what he agrees to do. It is the general rule of the common law that a railroad corporation is liable for an injury to a passenger, or for loss of freight arising from a defect in a track of another corporation over which it runs its cars, as if it owned the track. As between the two corporations, the only duty to maintain the track in repair under their contract may be upon the owner of the road, but, as between the first-mentioned corporation and a passenger or owner of freight, it is the duty of the carrier to have the track safe, whether it owns it or hires it. . . . The duty of a railroad corporation to furnish for its employees safe tracks, cars, locomotive engines, and other machinery, tools, and appliances with which its business is to be carried on, is similar in kind to its duty to passengers in these respects, although the degree of care required is less. In either case, its duty is the same when the tracks, cars, and engines are hired, or used under a license from others, as when they are owned by the employer. . . . The doctrine contended for by the defendant, as I understand it, comes to this: If a manufacturer, instead of owning the ways, works, and machinery necessary to be used in his business, arranges with another person who owns a manufacturing establishment to furnish it for his use and to keep it constantly in good condition, and if one of his employees is instantly killed by a defect negligently suffered to be in the ways, works, or machinery which he is using under this arrangement, he will not be liable under the statute, because the ways, works, and machinery are not his. The owner will not be liable under the statute for he is a stranger to the manufacturing business carried on there, and the person killed is not his employee. Neither the employer nor the owner of the establishment will be liable at the common law, for the common law permits no recovery for a death resulting from negligence. The widow and children of the deceased employee will therefore be left remediless. It seems to me that such a construction of the statute tends to defeat the purpose of the legislature."

One Ontario case in which the master was held not to be liable, under the statute, for the want of a fence on a public street which was used as an approach to the master's place of business (see Stride v. Diamond Glass Co. [1895] 26 Ont. Rep. 270, supra) seems to have been improperly referred to the analogy of other cases cited in this section. The true ground upon which a servant is precluded from maintaining an action against his master under the circumstances there in evidence is that alluded to in the opinion; viz., so far as regards his right of recovery for injuries which are due simply to the manner in which streets are laid out, graded, and protected, he is in the same position as any other member of the public. His remedy, if any, must be sought from the "fellow servants," enacted as follows: "Or by any defect in the machinery, ways, or appliances of the company, shall be entitled to maintain an action against said company." And by the 2d section of said act it is provided "that any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, made by any employee of said company to waive the benefit of the aforesaid section, shall be null and void." The court has construed this act, holding it to be constitutional, and giving effect to it so far as it applied to fellow servants. Hancock v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 124 N. C. 222, 32 S. E. 679. And we see no reason why we should not do so as to the "assumption of risk." It is agreed that assumption of risk is contractual, either by express terms or by implication; and disputes usually were as to whether the plaintiff contracted by implication or as sumption for dangers not existing at the date of employment. And it would seem by this act that the legislature intended to put an end to such contentions by saying in the 1st section that he shall have a right of action for injuries caused by such defective machinery, and by providing in the 2d section that he cannot waive this right by contract, expressed or implied. This legislation (Acts 1897, chap. 56) seems to be in the same spirit and in harmony with Acts Cong. 1893, chap. 196 (27 Stat. at L. 531). In that statute it is enacted in § 4 that all railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce shall have grab irons upon their cars, etc.; and in § 8 the right of action is given to any employee injured for the want of any of the appliances mentioned in said act,—grab irons being one of those mentioned. And then said section provides municipal body which is responsible for the creation and continuance of those conditions.

b. Structures, etc., in course of erection or demolition.

According to the most recent of the English authorities, these statutes should be so construed as to enable a servant of a contractor to recover for injuries due to abnormally dangerous conditions in the substance of a building which is in course of erection or demolition. The broad principle relied upon is that premises which are in the possession of a person for the purposes of his business are to be regarded as the "works" of such person so long as he is carrying on this business there. Brannigan v. Robinson [1892] 1 Q. B. 344, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 202, 66 L. T. N. S. 647, 56 J. P. 328 (house was being pulled down).

The doctrine of this case is in harmony with two other decisions, though this particular point was not directly raised.

In Moore v. Gimson (1889) 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 169, 5 Times L. R. 177, an insecure wall left standing on premises where there had been a fire seems to be regarded as a part of the works of a party who took a contract for the reinstatement of the building destroyed. The case was decided against the plaintiff on the ground that there was no knowledge, actual or constructive, of the conditions.

Compare Booker v. Higgs (1887) 3 Times L. R. 618, where a wall fell on the servant of a person who, as incident to certain work on the premises, was making a hole through it.

Similarly, it has been held in Ontario that a railway used by contractors engaged in constructing an extension of the line is a part of their plant while the work is going on. Rombough v. Balch (1900) 27 Ont. App. Rep. 32.

The contention that the case of Howe v. Finch (1886) L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 187, 34 Week. Rep. 593, 51 J. P. 276 (see following subdivision), was a controlling precedent against the plaintiff was easily disposed of on the ground that the employer, who was sued there, was the owner, not the builder, of the premises. But, singularly enough, no reference was made to the cases cited in the subjoined note, which are not distinguishable on this ground, and are directly opposed to the conclusion arrived at. The conflict of authority thus disclosed can now be adjusted in England only by a decision of the court of appeal.

In one case it was held that no action lay for an injury caused by the negligence of a co-servant in throwing rubbish down a lift well 57 L. R. A.

of a building under construction, through which, by means of ladders, the workmen were obliged to obtain access to the upper floors, this result not being affected by the fact that the master had not taken precautions to prevent such accident by warning the workmen to cease throwing things down, when it became necessary to use the well as a passage for the workmen. Pegram v. Dixon (1886) 55 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 447, 51 J. P. 198, 2 Times L. R. 603.

In another, a contractor was held not to be liable for maintaining an unusually large well hole in the staircase of a building under construction, through which a brick fell on the plaintiff from an upper story. Conway v. Clemence (1885) 2 Times L. R. 80.

In another, a contractor for the brickwork in an unfinished house was held not liable for injuries caused by the collapse of a staircase erected shortly before by another contractor as the permanent staircase of the house, as he was entitled to rely on the sufficiency of the structure without examination. McInulty v. Primrose (1897) 24 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 442.

In Massachusetts the servant's right to maintain an action under such circumstances has been uniformly denied.

Contractors, by setting a servant to work on the premises of a third person, where there are movable steps leading into a cellar, while going down which the servant was injured, cannot be said to adopt the steps as a way used in their business. Regan v. Donovan (1893) 159 Mass. 1, 33 N. E. 702 (effect of case, as stated in Lynch v. Allyn (1893) 160 Mass. 248, 35 N. E. 550—injury caused by the steps falling).

So, a servant of a contractor engaged in grading the land of a third person cannot recover on the theory that the liability of a bank of earth to fall, when undermined, unless it is properly shored up, is a "defect" within the statute, the descriptive words being applicable to "ways, etc., of a permanent character, such as are connected with, or used in, an employer's business." Lynch v. Allyn (1893) 160 Mass. 248, 35 N. E. 550.

So, it is held that a building in process of construction is not "ways, works, or machinery connected with or used in the business" of a subcontractor helping to build it, so as to render a hole cut in the floor by another subcontractor a defect in "ways, works, and machinery." Belque v. Hosmer (1897) 169 Mass. 541, 48 N. E. 338.

So, a plumber is not liable to an employee injured by the fall of ladders and stagings leading from one floor to another of a building that no employee, by remaining in the employment of such company, shall be deemed to have assumed such risk by remaining in the employment of such railroad company. This is the statute upon which Greenlee's and Trowler's Cases are based. And while we do not base our opinion in this case upon this legislation of Congress, but on the statute of 1897, still we think that this legislation of our state, and the construction we are placing upon it, are supported and strengthened by the act of Congress and the construction put upon it by this and other courts. In 1880 the English Parliament passed what is called the "employer's act," in which the doctrine of fellow servants theretofore existing in England was very much the same as in this state, and was disposed of very much as it was here by the act of 1897. The English act contains a section which provides that an employee shall not maintain an action against his master for injuries received from defective machinery, "ways," etc., unless he gives notice of such defects to the master, or some one superior to him, unless the master already knows of the defect. In the case of Thomas v. Quartermaine, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 685, it was shown that the plaintiff was injured by reason of defects known to the master, and it was contended by reason of these negative expressions used in the statute they absolved the plaintiff from the doctrine of assumption of risk. And one member of the court (Lord Esher) held with this contention of the plaintiff, though the other two members of the court overruled him in this view of the case. But the same question was again presented in Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. p. 325, where the in process of construction, where he neither constructed, managed, nor controlled such ladders and stagings. Riley v. Tucker (1901) 179 Mass. 190, 60 N. E. 484.

In Lynch v. Allyn (1893) 160 Mass. 248, 85 N. E. 550, the court remarked that there is a conflict between Brannigan v. Robinson [1892] 1 Q. B. 344, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 202, 66 L. T. N. S. 647, 56 J. P. 328, and Howe v. Finch (1886) L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 187, 34 Week. Rep. 593, 51 J. P. 276. But this is not necessarily so. It is quite possible, without any inconsistency, to take the view that a wall is a part of the works of the person who has it under his control for the purpose of erecting it, and at the same time not a portion of the works of the person who intends to use it in his business when it is completed. It would be going too far to say that an instrumentality can never be a part of the works of two separate employers at the same time, but the mere statement of the situation presented by cases of this type shows that the user by the owner of the structure and the user by the contractor for its erection are successive and mutually exclusive. It is therefore possible, to say the least, that the legal quality of the structure may be different, according as regard be had to the servants of the owner or to the servants of the contractor.

c. Instrumentalities not yet brought into use, or disused.

The words of the statute are declared to be applicable only to ways, etc., which are "existing and completed," and not to those which are partly finished and not yet used for the purposes of the employer's business. Howe v. Finch (1886) L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 187, 34 Week. Rep. 593, 51 J. P. 276 (where a wall in course of erection fell on a plumber in the defendant's employ).

No action lies for defects in a machine which has been discarded as unfit for use, and is, at the time it causes the injury, being removed from the premises. Thompson v. City Glass Co. (1901) 17 Times L. R. 594 (a portion of the machine fell on the plaintiff). This case was deemed to be the converse of Howe v. Finch (1886) L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 187, 34 Week. Rep. 593, 51 J. P. 276.

The present writer ventures to express the opinion that all the cases cited in the last two subdivisions, except Brannigan v. Robinson [1892] 1 Q. B. 344, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 202, 66 L. T. N. S. 647, 56 J. P. 328, are based upon a narrow and technical construction of the statutes, and that the circumstances under which the right of recovery was denied were fairly within the spirit, if not the letter, of the language used by the legislatures.

VI. What constitutes a defect.

Whenever an instrumentality is "not in a proper condition for the purpose for which it was applied," there is a "defect" in its condition within the meaning of the act. Lord Coleridge in Heske v. Samuelson (1883) L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 30, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 45, 49 L. T. N. S. 474; Approved in Cripps v. Judge (1884) L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 583, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 517, 51 L. T. N. S. 182, 33 Week. Rep. 35, 49 J. P. 100.

Lindley, L. J., in Yarmouth v. France (1887) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 647, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 7, 36 Week. Rep. 251, said: "I take defect to include anything which renders the plant, etc., unfit for the use for which it is intended, when used in a reasonable way and with reasonable care."

This word "defect" implies an inherent defect, a deficiency in something essential to the proper use of the apparatus for the purpose for which it is to be used. Hamilton v. Groesbeck (1889) 19 Ont. Rep. 76.

Compare also the passage from the majority opinion in Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 586, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38, as quoted infra.

"A defect in the condition of the way, or works, or machinery, or plant, . . . means, I should be inclined to say, such a state of things that the power and quality of the subject to which the word 'condition' is applied are for the time being altered in such a manner as to interfere with their use. For instance, if the way is made to be muddy by water, or if it is made slippery by ice, in either of these cases, I should say that the way itself is not defective, but the condition of the way, by reason of the water which is incorporated with it, or from its being in a freezing state, is affected." McGiffin v. Palmer's Shipbuilding & Iron Co. (1882) L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 9, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 25, 47 L. T. N. S. 346, 31 Week. Rep. 118, 47 J. P. 70.

If the whole arrangement of a machine is defective for the purpose for which it is applied, there is a defect so as to bring it within the act, although each part may be sufficient. Cripps v. Judge (1884) L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 583, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 517, 51 L. T. N. S. 182, 33 Week. Rep. 35, 49 J. P. 100, per Brett, M. R.

The words "defect in the arrangement," used only in the acts of Ontario and British Columbia, mean the element of danger arising court was again divided, but where a majority of the lords, who put their opinion upon the statute of 1880, agreed with Lord Esher that the statute did destroy or do away with the implied assumption of risk. We refer to the English statute and those cases from the English courts for the purpose of showing that, while the English courts may not have expressly decided that the English statute did away with the doctrine of assumption of risk, there was a strong tendency of the courts to hold that way. And in the case of Smith v. Baker a majority of the lords who put their opinions upon that statute so held; and, if there could be reason for such a construction upon a statute which did not in terms declare such object, but where the legislative disposed of very much as it was here by the act of 1897. The English act contains a could we escape such a construction where the legislative intent is manifested in express terms, and in the most emphatic manner? We are therefore of the opinion that, whatever might have been the proper rule in this state as to whether the plaintiff assumed the risk of operating this defective tender by remaining in the employment of the defendant, the statute of 1897 (chap. 56) has solved that question, and relieved the plaintiff from the burden of assuming the risk of such defect, if it was on him before.

In putting this construction upon the act of 1897, it must not be understood that the plaintiff is relieved by this act, or the construction we have put upon it, from the responsibility of his own negligence. But, as we have said, the principal "battle" in this case was as to the assumption of risk, and from the position and collocation of machinery in itself perfectly sound and well fitted for the purpose for which it is to be used. McCloherly v. Gale Mfg. Co. (1892) 19 Ont. App. Rep. 117, 121, per Osler, J. A.

It follows, therefore, that, whenever there is such unsuitableness for the work intended to be done and actually done, the liability contemplated by the statute arises, although the appliance is perfect of its kind and in good repair and suitable for other kinds of work. In such a case the employer is in fault because he has furnished appliances for a use for which they are unsuitable, and, in effect, is so ordering and carrying on his work that, without fault of the ordinary workman, the natural consequence will be that the appliance will be used for purposes for which it is unsuitable. Geloneck v. Dean Steam Pump Co. (1896) 165 Mass. 202, 43 N. E. 85.

Whether an appliance was properly constructed in reference to the use for which it was intended, is usually a question for the jury. Prenoble v. Connecticut River Mfg. Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 131, 35 N. E. 675.

A defect importing negligence on the master's part may properly be found to exist where the appliance in question was so constructed or arranged that it was likely to cause undue hazard to a person exercising that degree of care which might be expected, whether regard be had to the special circumstances under which the appliance was to be put into operation, or to the age, skill, and experience of the particular employee who was to operate it.

A sliding door intended to be closed in case of fire is defective unless it can be manipulated with reasonable safety by persons who would naturally be acting as hurriedly as would be the case under such circumstances. Johnson v. Mitchell (1885) 22 Sc. L. R. 698.

This seems to be the actual scope which should be ascribed to the decision in Morgan v. Hutchins (1890) 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 197, 38 Week. Rep. 412, in order to prevent its clashing with Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 581, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38, infra, VIII. to which according to the statement of the court, there was no intention of running counter. A child was there held entitled to maintain an action for injury caused by uncovered machinery. The broad ground was taken that the statute applies where a machine is "defective with regard to the safety of the workmen," even though it is effective for the purpose for which it is used. The Master of the Rolls, who, since the decision in Walsh v. Whiteley 57 L. R. A.

(1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 586, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38, had been created Lord Esher, said: "The argument in the present case is that there is no defect in machinery if the machine in question is in itself a proper one for the work it is to perform. It must be carried to this length,—that if the machine contains a secret defect which causes danger to the workman, but which does not affect the purposes for which it is to be used, then this is not a defect within the meaning of the act. Now this leather-pressing machine cannot be worked without workmen; without labor it is useless as a machine. Surely this fact of itself is something that has to do with the condition of the machine. If its condition be such that the workman cannot do his part with safety, is that, or is it not, a defect in the condition of a machine the working of which is a necessary performance? It seems to me that unless we hold the defect complained of here to be one within the subsection in question, the act might as well have never been passed."

The fact that the instrumentality which caused the injury was less safe than one which was used by a large proportion, or by the majority, of other employers in the same business, is probably regarded by all courts as an element which entitles the servant to go to the jury on the question whether it was defective. As where a common round stick without any holes in it was furnished to be used as a lever for tipping a large ladle of molten metal, the evidence being that it was not safe, and that another kind of device was customary in large foundries like that of the defendant. Flaherty v. Norwood Engineering R. Co. (1898) 172 Mass. 134, 51 N. E. 463.

Whether a piece of iron piping is a proper material to use as a buffer to protect the head of a bolt which is being driven, is a question for the jury, where the evidence is that for several years copper hammers have been made for such work, and that piping is the least desirable of the metals used, because it is so brittle that chips are apt to fly off from it and injure the person holding it. Littlefield v. Edward P. Allis Co. (1900) 177 Mass. 151, 53 N. E. 692.

As to the effect of evidence that the employer had satisfied the standard fixed by common usage, see infra, VIII.

In Ontario it is held that the effect of the provisions in the factories acts, by which the failure to take certain specified precautions is made a penal offense, is that, although an injury due to noncompliance with one of those it was ably conducted on both sides, barring the statute of 1897, and was ably conducted by the learned judge who presided at the trial. The greater part of the record, consisting of prayers for instruction and the judge's charge, is predicated upon the first issue,—the assumption of risk,—which are eliminated by the view we have taken of the case. This being so, there is but little more for us to do. The prayers of the defendant mainly, if not all of them, are addressed to the assumption of risk, and it is not necessary for us to discuss them after taking this view of the act of 1897.

The defendant's fifth prayer for instructions was addressed to the plaintiff's using the drainpipe as a grab iron. This prayer, it seems, the court gave, but added the following: "The drainpipe was not put there for a grab iron, and there is no negligence imputable to the defendant by reason of the weak condition of the drainpipe; but the question is left for the jury to say, upon the second issue, whether or not the plaintiff was negligent in taking hold of it, and whether he acted as a prudent man in taking hold of it. That question is left with the jury upon the second issue." This addition is assigned as error, but we see none. The prayer must have been addressed to the second issue, though it does not so state, and we see no error in referring the question to the jury. As we understand, the question of prudence, and the ideal prudent man, are always a matter for the jury. This seems to have been the ground of the exception that the court did not decide the question, instead of referring it to the jury.

There is one other exception that we think necessary to notice, and that is the provisions does not constitute a cause of action under the statute itself, such noncompliance is evidence which it is competent to consider as tending to show negligence on the defendant's part, in an action brought under the workmen's compensation act. O'Connor v. Hamilton Bridge Co. (1894) 25 Ont. Rep. 12, Affirmed in 21 Ont. App. Rep. 596 (1895) 24 Can. S. C. 598; Thompson v. Wright (1892) 22 Ont. Rep. 127; Rodgers v. Hamilton Cotton Co. (1893) 23 Ont. Rep. 425; McCloherly v. Gale Mfg. Co. (1892) 19 Ont. App. Rep. 117; Godwin v. Newcombe (1901) 1 Ont. L. Rep. 525.

In all these cases the propriety of declining to interfere with the verdicts of juries based on the theory that the maintenance of unguarded machinery was negligence was recognized.

In Hamilton v. Groesbeck (1889) 19 Ont. Rep. 76, the lower court seems to have been of opinion that an unguarded saw was not a defect. If it was intended to lay this down as a matter of law, the doctrine is clearly contrary to that of the decisions just cited. The court of appeal (1891; 18 Ont. App. Rep. 437) declined to consider whether the want of a guard was or was not a defect.

Considering the extreme improbability that any jury will absolve an employer who has been guilty of a breach of the statute, it is manifest that, for practical purposes, the consequence of such a doctrine is to place servants 'n a position not materially different from that which they would hold if the theory had been adopted that damages may be recovered by anyone injured by the violation of a penal act.

The statute is equally applicable, whether the defect is in the original construction of the machine, or arises from its not being kept up to the obligatory standard of safety. See the passage quoted from the majority opinion in Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 87 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 586, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38, infra, VIII.

In Heske v. Samuelson (1883) L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 30, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 45, 49 L. T. N. S. 474, Stephen, J., in commenting on the theory of the county judge that a defect arising from the original construction of a machine was not a defect in the condition of the machinery, said: "The argument for the defendants comes to this,—that if the employer has a machine one part of which is weaker than it ought to be, there is a defect in its condition; but if the whole machine is too weak for the purpose for which it is applied, there is no such defect. Could it be said that if a windlass, fit only for raising a bucket, is used to draw up a number of men, that there is no defect in the condition of the machinery? The condition of the machine must be a condition with relation to the purpose for which it is applied."

The fact that an appliance comes up to the legal standard of safety when it is in its normal condition will not excuse the master if that condition has been so changed as to render it unsafe, and the change is due to the act of an agent who is intrusted with the duty of seeing that it is in proper condition. Tate v. Latham [1897] 1 Q. B. 502, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 349, 45 Week. Rep. 400, 75 L. T. N. S. 694, per Lord Esher.

In a leading English case, Lord Watson remarked that he saw "no reason to doubt that an arrangement of machinery and tackle which, although reasonably safe for those engaged in working it, is nevertheless dangerous to workmen employed in another department of the business, constitutes a defect in the condition of the works within the meaning of the subsection." Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 354, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660.

A servant who is a mere licensee or a trespasser in respect to the locality where he receives the injury complained of cannot, it is manifest, recover damages, even though the conditions which cause the injury may constitute a defect as to other employees. As where a servant who left a dockyard by a path which was not the regular exit, and which the servants were merely permitted to use, fell into a pit. Pritchard v. Lang (1889) 5 Times L. R. 639, following Bolch v. Smith (1882) 7 Hurlst. & N. 737, 31 L. J. Exch. N. S. 201, 8 Jur. N. S. 197, 10 Week. Rep. 387, as to the general principle.

A double reason for his inability to sue will, of course, exist where the servant's presence at the spot where he was injured was not merely unauthorized, but negligent as well.

An unguarded elevator opening is not "a defect in the condition of the way," as regards a workman required to pass through a passage 12 feet wide, well lighted, and with which he is well acquainted, where it is upon the opposite side of the passage from that upon which such workman should pass, and he turns out of his way to look at repairs in progress upon the elevator. Headford v. McClary Mfg. Co. (1894) 21 Ont. App. Rep. 164, Affirmed in (1895) 24 Can. S. C. 291.

measure of damages. As to this, it seems to us that it would have been proper for the court to have explained more fully the rule as to the measure of damages, or the manner of ascertaining them; especially as it seems to us that an improper rule had been insisted upon in the closing argument of the plaintiff's counsel. But we see no intrinsic error in what the court did charge,—that the jury should give the plaintiff "the present cash value" of his injury, taking into consideration pain and mental suffering, not allowing anything as a punishment, or punitive damages. The defendant cites but one authority to sustain its assignment of error as to instructions upon the question of damages,—Pickett v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 117 N. C. 616, 30 L. R. A. 257, 23 S. E. 264,—and we do not think it sustains the defendant's contention. That case is as to a prayer which the court held to be erroneous, but in passing upon the prayer the court suggests almost the exact language used by the court in this case as a proper instruction. It was contended before us in the argument that the jury found their verdict upon the erroneous rule laid down by defendant's counsel, but we have no means, as a court, of knowing that this contention is true. The plaintiff is still living. The verdict does not show that the jury were so governed in finding their verdict. It is far more than the simple calculation of time of expectancy by the plaintiff's yearly earnings. But they were instructed that they might give the plaintiff damages for pain, suffering, etc. This was not error, and we have no means of knowing how much they allowed for this and how much they allowed for his earn-a. Defects in the condition of the ways.

This phrase embraces only those inherent imperfections which render the ways themselves less fit for the use for which they are intended.

Servants injured by the following defects have been held entitled to go to the jury:

A loose plank extending over a hole at a place which the servant has to pass, and so laid as to tip up when he steps on it. Bromley v. Cavendish Co. (1886) 2 Times L. R. 881.

The unsafe adjustment of a plank in a temporary staging across which materials are to be carried. Giles v. Thames Co. (1885) 1 Times L. R. 469.

A plank 8 inches wide and 30 feet from the ground furnished as a means for a servant to reach and repair a defective steam pipe. United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Weir (1892) 96 Ala. 396, 11 So. 436 (complaint averring insufficiency, not demurrable).

A plank of insufficient strength to sustain the weight of the men who have to walk along it. Caldwell v. Mills (1893) 24 Ont. Rep. 462.

A defective track on a railway. Coughlan v. Cambridge (1896) 166 Mass. 268, 44 N. E. 218.

An open ditch across a track along which the servant had to pull a car. Gustafsen v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. (1891) 153 Mass. 468, 27 N. E. 179.

An unprotected aperture in a staircase which the workman had to use in the course of his employment. Wood v. Dorrall (1886) 2 Times L. R. 550.

The narrowing of a space between the wall of a passageway in a mine and cars passing therein, so as to cause the cars to pass dangerously near to the wall. McNamara v. Logan (1893) 100 Ala. 187, 14 So. 175.

The roof to an adit in a mine so defectively timbered as to allow a large stone to fall on a miner. McMullen v. Newhouse Coal Co. (1896) 23 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 759.

A rock on the roof in a tunnel which is so loose that it may fall at any moment. Tutwiler Coal, Coke & I. Co. v. Enslen (1900) 129 Ala. 336, 30 So. 600.

The master's liability is a question for the jury where the evidence is conflicting as to whether a gudgeon pin used to fasten the arms of a derrick to a mast was large enough for safety. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Weems (1893) 97 Ala. 270, 12 So. 186.

That the master is not liable for casual obstructions arising from the use of his ways, see supra, VI., infra, VII.

b. Defects in the condition of the works.

The few decisions specifically referable to this rather vague term alone seem to be confined to the cases previously discussed (see supra, IV. c), in which the liability of masters for the condition of the premises of another person upon which they have contracted to do something is in question.

A roof which proved too weak to support the snow which was allowed to accumulate on it seems to be treated in a Massachusetts case as a defect in the "works," but the point actually decided was merely that an allegation of defective condition was sustained by proof that the weight of snow was one of the causes of the fall. Dolan v. Alley (1891) 153 Mass. 380, 26 N. E. 989.

See also the remark of Lord Watson, quoted in supra, VI., for some cases in which the term occurs in conjunction with others descriptive of various kinds of instrumentalities.

c. Defects in the condition of the machinery.

The cases cited below indicate sufficiently the kind of abnormal conditions which may properly be found by a jury to fall within this description:

Defective pressure, causing a hydraulic crane to work erratically. Bacon v. Dawes (1887) 3 Times L. R. 557.

A band which is constantly slipping off a shaft, thus creating a necessity for a frequent readjustment. Baxter v. Wyman (1888) 4 Times L. R. 255.

A belt which is liable to slip off of a pulley. Ellis v. Pierce (1898) 172 Mass. 220, 51 N. E. 974.

Defective appliances for controlling the speed of a push car, which collided with the plaintiff, knocking him down a high trestle, stated a cause of action. Central R. Co. v. Lamb (1899) 124 Ala. 172, 26 So. 969.

A part of a machine in a paper mill so constructed that the rags, etc., which are fed to it are apt to catch, the result being a frequently recurring necessity to remove them. Paley v. Garnett (1885) L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 52, 34 Week. Rep. 295, 50 J. P. 469.

The absence of a guard to a circular saw provided by the owner of a sawmill, due to its improper removal by the sawyer for his own purposes. Tate v. Latham [1897] 1 Q. B. 502, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 349, 45 Week. Rep. 400, 75 L. T. N. S. 694.

ings. There may have been error in the manner in which the jury estimated the damages. But, if there is, we cannot know it, nor does the record, to which we are confined, disclose the error. Upon the view of the case we have taken, the judgment must be affirmed.

Cook, J., dissents.

Montgomery, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the court. It seems that the general assembly, in Private Laws 1897, chap. 56, has deprived the defendant of its plea of assumption of risk. As is said in the opinion of the court, the effect of that legislation in respect to assumption of risk had not been called to the attention of counsel in the cause or to that of the court; but nevertheless we find, upon an examination of the statute, that to be its plain construction. But the issue on the "assumption of risk" being eliminated does not prevent the operation of the principle of contributory negligence, and it seems to me that the evidence of the plaintiff himself furnishes such clear and convincing proof that his own negligent act was the direct and proximate cause of his injury that his honor should have told the jury that upon his evidence they should respond "Yes" to the second issue. Neal v. Carolina C. R. Co. 126 N. C. 634, 49 L. R. A. 684, 36 S. E. 117. There was a by-law of the company in the following words: "(S) Every employee must exercise the utmost caution to avoid injury to himself or to his fellows, especially in the switching of cars and in all movements of trains, in which work each employee must look after The want of a fence to protect employees from moving machinery. Wallace v. Cutler Co. (1892) 19 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 915 (denying that this result was affected by the fact that the danger was a palpable one).

A loom in which the shuttles are neither fixed so as not to be constantly flying out, nor protected by proper guards. Smith v. Harrison (1889) 5 Times L. R. 406.

Unguarded machinery, which is operated by children. Morgan v. Hutchins (1890) 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 197, 38 Week. Rep. 412; Gemmills v. Gourcock Co. (1861) 23 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 425 (here embossed cogwheels were maintained in such a position that girls of twelve or thirteen years of age were required, in the course of their duties, to place their hands and dress within some 8 or 9 inches of them when in motion).

Unfenced machinery, in a jurisdiction where a penalty is imposed, by a factories act for not having machinery guarded, may properly be found to import negligence. See supra, VI.

In the most recent case in which this doctrine was applied it was held that the absence of a guard is a defect, if the machinery is thereby rendered dangerous to the workman using it, even if the machinery is in itself well constructed and suitable for the purpose for which it was designed. Godwin v. Newcombe (1901) 1 Ont. L. Rep. 525.

Evidence that an injury to a weaver in a cotton mill, while assisting an inexperienced hand, by the shuttle flying out of the loom, was caused by a bolt breaking when the shuttle came in contact with it, is fit to go to the jury upon the question of negligence. Canadian Colored Cotton Mills v. Talbot (1897) 27 Can. S. C. 198.

At the trial of an action against a railroad corporation for the death of an employee caused by the falling upon him of a locomotive, which had been placed on a truck in the repair shop, it is competent for the jury to find that, although the iron was sound where the wheel of the truck broke, yet, by reason of its long use and the increase in the weight of engines, the truck had become unsuitable for the use to which it was put, and that, if the wheel had been of proper strength, it would have withstood the strain caused by meeting the obstruction on the rail. Gunn v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1898) 171 Mass. 417, 50 N. E. 1031.

d. Defects in the condition of the plant.

As the term "plant" carries the very extensive L. R. A.

sive meaning explained in supra, IV. e, the cases involving it cover a great variety of appliances. Some of them might apparently be referred to the instrumentalities discussed in the preceding subdivisions.

The following defects have been held to come under the head of "defects in plant:"

The want of ventilation for the hold of a coal ship, the result being that gas accumulated and exploded when the hatches were removed and the men engaged to unload the coal entered the hold with their lanterns. Carter v. Clarke (1898) 14 Times L. R. 172, 78 L. T. N. S. 76.

A horse intended for a particular kind of work, and so vicious as to be unfit for that work. Yarmouth v. France (1887) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 647, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 7, 36 Week. Rep. 281.

A vicious horse. Fraser v. Hood (1887) 15 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 178.

A horse who is constantly falling. Harston v. Edinburgh Co. (1887) 14 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 621.

The want of some means, either to prevent loose bodies from falling upon men working below, or to protect those men from any of those bodies which may fall. Heske v. Samuelson (1883) L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 30, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 45, 49 L. T. N. S. 474 (piece of coal fell from a lift, the sides of which were not fenced, on to an unroofed platform).

A ladder which, by the direction of the defendant, is used to support a scaffold, and, not being strong enough for the purpose, breaks under the weight of a servant. Cripps v. Judge (1884) L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 583, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 517, 51 L. T. N. S. 182, 33 Week. Rep. 35, 49 J. P. 100.

A bolt so weakened by constant strains that it breaks. Irwin v. Dennystown (1885) 22 Sc. L. R. 379.

A sliding door to be used in case of fire, having no provision for protecting the hands of an employee from being crushed when it is pulled to. Johnson v. Mitchell (1885) 22 Sc. L. R. 698.

An inflammable brattice-cloth allowed to stand in a place where sparks frequently fall on it. Thomas v. Great Western Co. (1894) 10 Times L. R. 244.

Car buffers of different heights, overlapping in coupling so as to afford no protection to the person making the coupling, constitute a "defect in the arrangement of the plant," within the Ontario statute. Bond v. Toronto R. Co. (1895) 22 Ont. App. Rep. 78, Affirmed without opinion in 24 Can. S. C. 715 (construing and be responsible for his own safety. Jumping on or off trains or engines in motion, getting between cars in motion to couple or uncouple them, and all similar imprudences, are dangerous, and in violation of duty. All employees are warned that, if they commit these imprudences, it will be at their own peril and risk." The plaintiff knew of that by-law, and with a full knowledge of what he said himself was an obvious defect in the construction of the tender, to wit, the lack of a grab iron, got upon the tender while it and the engine were in motion, and undertook to lift himself from the cross step up to a higher platform by grasping a drainpipe, which he says himself he had never examined, and that, too, with the engine and tender moving backward, his injury being certain if the pipe should give way. A prayer for instruction by defendant on the point of the plaintiff's using the grab iron for the purpose which he did was directed to the first issue, and refused on that account. But his honor undertook to charge the jury in respect to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and failed to call their attention to the plaintiff's neglect to examine the grab iron, which, in my opinion, was the most important point in the negligent course and conduct of the plaintiff. Especially is that failure on the part of his honor an error when it can be seen from the record that his honor, in speaking to the jury about the time and the circumstances of the seizing of the drainpipe by the plaintiff, misconceived entirely the evidence of the plaintiff on an important and vital point, and, as a consequence, failed to instruct the jury properly as to those conditions. His honor the phrase, "defect in the arrangement of the plant," which occurs in the Ontario act).

A switch not provided with a lock, or securely guarded in any other way. Rombough v. Balch (1900) 27 Ont. App. Rep. 32.

An insufficiency in the number of scrapers supplied for cleaning out a brick-pressing machine. Race v. Harrison (1893) 10 Times L. R. 92, per Kay, L. J.

The failure to supply a boy with proper materials for the cleaning of machinery. Thompson v. Wright (1892) 22 Ont. Rep. 127.

The inadequate manning of cars which are "kicked" on to a side track, the result being that their speed cannot be controlled, and they come into collision with other cars. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davis (1890) 91 Ala. 487, 8 So. 552.

The lack of ventilation in the hold of a vessel. Carter v. Clarke (1898) 78 L. T. N. S. 76, 14 Times L. R. 172.

VIII. Conditions not amounting to defects.

The mere fact that a machine is dangerous to manipulate unless the servant takes certain precautions which any reasonably intelligent man would see to be appropriate under the circumstances will not warrant a finding that the machine is defective within the meaning of the act.

There can be no recovery unless the defect is one which implies negligence on the part of the master, or the agents for whose defaults he is answerable.

In Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 586, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38, the trial judge left it to the jury to say whether a defect in the condition of the machine was indicated by evidence that the accident would not have happened if the disc of the wheel of a carding machine had been solid, and instructed them that to be defective a machine must be such as a reasonable, careful, experienced man, reasonably careful of the safety of his workmen, would not use. The jury found that there was a defect, but the court of appeal held that the evidence did not warrant this conclusion. The following passage shows the position taken by the majority of the court (Lindley and Lopes, L. JJ.): "To determine the meaning of the words 'defect in the condition of the machinery' we must look, not only at § 1, subsec. 1, but also at § 2, subsec. 1. Reading those sections and subsections together, we think there must be a defect implying negligence in the employer. The negligence of the employer appears to be a necessary element without which 57 L. R. A.

the workman is not to be entitled to any compensation or remedy. It must be a defect in the condition of the machine having regard to the use to which it is to be applied or to the mode in which it is to be used. It may be a defect either in the original construction of the machine, or a defect arising from its not being kept up to the mark; but it is essential that there should be evidence of negligence of the employer, or some person in his service intrusted with the duty of seeing that the machine is in proper condition. It must be a defect in the original construction or subsequent condition of the machine, rendering it unfit for the purposes to which it is applied when used with reasonable care and caution, and a defect arising from the negligence of the employer. What evidence is there of this? Is there any evidence of the machine being defective, even in the abstract? It was perfect in all respects. It was not impaired by use. It had been properly kept up to the mark. The only suggestion is that the wheel which might have been solid had holes in it, and that, if the wheel had been solid, the plaintiff could not have put his thumb where he did, and the accident would not have happened. It is also suggested that the wheel was too close to the table, and that had the wheel and table been further apart the accident would not have happened. There was, however, no evidence worth mentioning of improper construction in this respect. But the plaintiff had used the same kind of machine for thirteen years, and had sustained no injury. It is to our mind clear that he would have suffered no injury on the present occasion if he had used proper care and caution. In these circumstances we can see no evidence of any defect in the condition of the machine, even apart from negligence of the employer. It may be that a solid wheel would have been safer, but it would be placing an intolerable burden on employers to hold that they are to adopt every fresh improvement in machinery. We do not believe that such was the intention of the legislature, nor do we think it was intended to relieve workmen from the exercise of that care and caution without which most machinery is dangerous. But in our opinion the defect in the condition of the machinery must be such as to show negligence on the part of the employer. It seems to us that in this case there is not a particle of evidence of any defect arising from the negligence of the employer. It was a machine generally used,—used by the plaintiff for thirteen years without any complaint or mischief arising, perfect and unimpaired and never thought by the plaintiff said: "In regard to a violation of a known rule of the company his [plaintiff's] statement was that the rule was that he should not get on the engine in motion. He says that the engine had not started, but did start after he got up; and he contends that the injury did not result from that, but from his taking hold of the drainpipe, and that that was the natural thing for him to do, and he asked the jury to so find. The plaintiff had testified that the engine and tender were in motion when he got upon the step; that it was going at about a mile an hour when he got on, and about 2 or 3 miles an hour when he fell." There is an exception by the defendant to this misrecital of the evidence and its effect. Certainly, if the injury was caused from the plaintiff's taking hold of the drainpipe, that was the proximate cause of the injury, and as his honor had told the jury that the drainpipe was not made to be taken hold of by the plaintiff, and that they should not consider the drainpipe in any aspect whatever as connected with the defendant's negligence, the plaintiff's use of it for the purpose with which he did use it was an act of negligence so gross that his honor should have instructed them to find the second issue "Yes."

In reference to the rule laid down by his honor as to the measure of damages, I think that it was not sufficiently definite, taken in connection with the rule which counsel of the plaintiff argued to the jury. I know that a trial judge is not expected to controvert every erroneous argument made by counsel in the course of the trial, but after that part of the argument referred to in this case his honor should have in some way himself to be unsafe. It is said there is evidence of the machine being dangerous. So are most machines; so is even an ordinary sharp knife, unless used with care; but that does not make it defective in its condition, nor does it imply negligence in the employer if an accident happens." The following passage from the dissenting opinion of Lord Esher shows the theory adopted by that eminent judge: "Remembering that this is a statute passed to extend the liability of the employer in favor of the workmen and for their greater safety, I do not think that, in considering what is a defective machine, we can confine that consideration to the question of the purpose for which it is used. The defect contemplated by the act is not in my opinion a defect with reference to the purpose for which the machine is employed, but a defect with reference to the safety of the workmen using it; and that defect may be either in the original construction of the machine or in the use to which the machine is put. Upon the findings of the jury, and the true construction of the enactment, I am of opinion that the case is brought within the statute."

The general language of this decision is somewhat qualified by Morgan v. Hutchins (1890) 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 197, 38 Week. Rep. 412, supra, VI. There Lord Esher, referring to the earlier case, made the following remarks: "I think it was assumed by the whole court that, if the machine were dangerous to a workman without any fault of his own, it came within the act. The only doubt that existed in the minds of two of the members of the court was whether the defect had arisen from the negligence of the employer."

The general rule has been enunciated, that machinery is not defective which is fit and proper for the purpose for which it is designed, and there is a reasonable mode, known to the injured servant, in which he could have operated it. Noonan v. Dublin Distillery Co. (1893) Ir. L. R. 82 C. L. 399.

In Thomas v. Quartermaine (1886) L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 417 (1887) L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 685, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 340, 57 L. T. N. S. 537, 35 Week. Rep. 555, 51 J. P. 516, a boiling vat and a cooling vat were placed in the same room in the defendant's brewery. A passage only 3 feet wide in one part ran between them, the rim of the cooling vat rising 16 inches above the passage. Underneath the boiling vat was a board which the plaintiff had occasion to use. To draw it out he had to give it a jerk, and it came away so suddenly that he fell back into the cooling vat. In the divisional court, Willis, J., said: "I can see no evidence of any defect in the condition of either ways or plant. The way, as a passage or gangway, was safe enough, and, as far as appears, wide enough for any legitimate use that it could be put to as a way. There was no defect in the vat as a vessel to hold liquor to be cooled. The defect, if defect there were, was not in the way, considered as a way, nor in the vat considered as a vat, but in the proximity of the vat to the place where a piece of board was kept, which piece of board stuck by some not in the way, considered as a way, nor in the court of appeal it was considered that the finding of the trial judge, sitting as a jury, that there was a defect in the condition of the works, must be allowed to stand, as there was some evidence to support his conclusion."

Accordingly, under the statute, as at common law, an employer is not bound to provide the very best machinery that can possibly be invented. It is enough if he provides that which is reasonably sufficient for the purpose. Robins v. Cubitt (1881) 46 L. T. N. S. 535, per Lopes, J.

Want of reasonable care is not established by evidence which merely shows that a particular safety-catch of a different pattern from that on the defendant's elevator had been used ten years before by others. Black v. Ontario Wheel Co. (1890) 19 Ont. Rep. 578.

The rule that "an employer is not bound to provide against every possible danger, or to supply in all cases the safest and most approved appliances," was applied in Mitchell v. Patullo (1885) 23 Sc. L. R. 207. There the folding doors of a shed on a farm flapped in a horse's face, so that he backed a wagon, and crushed the plaintiff. It was held that the farmer was not in fault for having failed to provide sliding doors.

A defect in apparatus for hoisting ice is not shown by the fact that a gin-wheel was hung so low that the employee's hand was drawn into it and injured by failure to stop the rope soon enough, where it does not appear that it could have been hung any higher in the building, and proper arrangements were made for stopping the rope if the engineer had observed it. Carbury v. Downing (1891) 154 Mass. 248, 28 N. E. 162. The plaintiff did not suggest that the means employed to stop the engine were not sufficient, or that any other should have been provided, but contended that the means for indicating to the engineer the time for stopping the engine, viz., a mark upon the rope to indicate to the engineer when to stop it, was not sufficient. It was held that the jury could explained more fully what he meant by the words "the present net money value of such loss incident to his injury." I think there was error.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Douglas, J., on December 20, 1901, handed down the following response:

This case is now before us on a petition to rehear. It was first argued in this court at the September term, 1900, and was carried over under advisari. At the February term, 1901, it was reargued by leave of the court, and determined, the case being reported in 123 N. C. 534, 39 S. E. 43. We have thus had the advantage of three distinct arguments by able and learned counsel, who have also filed elaborate briefs. With such a presentation of the case, and after careful consideration, we feel compelled to adhere to our former decision. We do so upon an entire review of its merits on account of its importance as a precedent, which, we think, takes it out of the strict operation of the rule invoked by the plaintiff and laid down in Weisel v. Cobb, 122 N. C. 67, 30 S. E. 312, and cases therein cited. The facts are sufficiently stated in the well-considered opinion of the Chief Justice.

The doctrine of fellow servant is generally said to have had its origin in the case of Priestley v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 1, decided in 1837, where the plaintiff had his thigh broken by the breaking down of an overloaded butcher's van, loaded and conducted by a fellow servant. The doctrine, which was rather inferentially laid down in Priestley's Case, was for the first time distinctly enunciated in 1841 in Murray v. South Carolina R. Co. 1 McMull. L. 385, 36 not properly have found that this was an insecure mode of indicating to the engineer when the ice arrived at the top of the run, and that the engine ought to have been inside the building, where the engineer could see the ice and the upper gin-wheel, and decide in that way when the engine should be stopped.

A servant cannot recover as for a "defect," where he was injured by the fall of a bar which was used for fastening trap-doors in a floor, and which, instead of being secured by a chain or otherwise, so as to prevent its falling, was left loose. Pooley v. Hicks (1889) 5 Times L. R. 353.

A draw bar on the car of another railway company, which is of a different height from those on the defendant's, own cars is not a defect. Ellisbury v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1899) 172 Mass. 130, 51 N. E. 415.

It is not, as matter of law, the duty of persons operating coal mines to cut a manway, different and separate from the slope through which coal was brought to the surface, for the ingress and egress of their employees. Whatley v. Zenilda Coal Co. (1898) 122 Ala. 118, 26 So. 124.

Culpability is negatived by proof that the instrumentalities furnished are the same in character and quality as those used under similar circumstances by persons carrying on the same business as the defendant.

An open hook without a catch, to which a bucket is attached for raising and lowering loads, cannot be held to be a defect, where the plaintiff's evidence is that such a hook was always used in work of a similar kind, and no proof is given of the occurrence of any previous accident. Claxton v. Mowlen (1888) 4 Times L. R. 756.

The failure of an ironmaster to fence in about 10 feet of the lower end of a shaft through which ore was raised to a furnace gangway will not render him liable for injuries to a workman struck by a piece of the ore which fell through the opening, if it is shown that it was usual in the trade to leave so much of these shafts unfenced. Murray v. Merry (1890) 17 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 815.

No negligence can be inferred where a scaffold alleged to be defective is the ordinary kind of scaffold used by masons, and as strong as they are usually made. Thompson v. Dick (1892) 19 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 804.

A trap-door without a railing, such as is commonly maintained in factories, is not a "defect." Moore v. Ross (1890) 17 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 796.

A projecting set screw in a shaft, being a common device for the purpose for which it is used, is not of itself a defect. Donahue v. Washburn & M. Mfg. Co. (1897) 169 Mass. 574, 48 N. E. 842; Demers v. Marshall (1899) 172 Mass. 548, 52 N. E. 1066 (1901) 178 Mass. 9, 59 N. E. 454; Ford v. Mount Tom Sulphite Pulp Co. (1899) 172 Mass. 544, 48 L. R. A. 96, 52 N. E. 1065. (In the last case recovery was denied though the screw had been placed on the shaft after the servant had entered the employment.)

Nor is a key-way with sharp edges, in a shaft. Connelly v. Hamilton Woolen Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 156, 39 N. E. 787.

An engineer employed in fitting up the boilers on a steamer in course of construction cannot recover for injuries caused by falling into an open manhole, while threading his way between decks in a dim light, on the theory that the master was bound to protect the manhole. Forsyth v. Ramage (1890) 18 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 21.

In a later case the court explained that this decision was based upon the ground that the risk in question was an ordinary one incidental to the work undertaken, and disclaimed the intention of laying down any such general rule as that a workman on a ship in course of construction cannot recover for injuries due to the danger of the place of work. Jamieson v. Russell (1892) 19 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 898, where the representative of an employee, killed by falling into an open tank, was allowed to recover for the reason that the tank was usually covered and lighted, and that neither of these precautions had been observed on the occasion when the accident occurred.

A workman injured through the slipping of some planks out of the loop in a hempen rope, by means of which they were being lowered to the bottom of a trench, cannot recover on the ground that a wire rope should have been used, where it appears that hempen ropes were ordinarily used for such a purpose. Pack v. Hayward (1889) 5 Times L. R. 233.

In the case of a machine of a simple character, the plaintiff is not entitled to go to trial merely upon averments that the machine was dangerous, and that it was usual to fence such machines. Cameron v. Walker (1898) 25 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 409, following Milligan v. Muir (1891) 19 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 18. As to unfenced machinery, see supra, VII. c, and the majority opinion in Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 686, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. F. 33, as quoted supra.

But in order to be conclusive in the master's

Am. Dec. 268, where a fireman was injured through the negligence of an engineer on the same train. However, the leading case upon the subject is undoubtedly that of Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339, in which Chief Justice Shaw delivered an elaborate opinion, which has been characterized by a distinguished jurist as "the fountain head of the common law of England and America on this subject." The development of the doctrine through judicial construction, and the largely increased area of its application caused by the increasing use of dangerous machinery, with a relative increase in the number of serious accidents, suggested the necessity of its material modification. Some of the states attempted to do so through judicial construction by the introduction of the rule of vice principal, while others had recourse to special legislation.

favor, as a matter of law, the usage appealed to must be, in a reasonable sense, a general one. Evidence which merely goes to show that he conformed to the practice of a few well-regulated concerns of the same description as his own will not justify a court in pronouncing him to be free from culpability. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Jones (1901) 130 Ala. 456, 30 So. 586 (charge held erroneous, which proposed as a standard test the custom of eight railway companies to use ratchet jack-screws for holding up the body of a derailed car); Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Weems (1893) 97 Ala. 270, 12 So. 186 (charge held erroneous which assumed the usage of five railway companies to be a decisive test).

On the other hand, if usage is the controlling factor in the case, a jury will not be permitted to find him guilty of negligence where it is apparent that there is no uniform usage in regard to the subject-matter.

Failure to provide a temporary scaffold or platform around a "bleeder" used for the escape of gas above an iron furnace, on which the master mechanic could stand to repair the bleeder, does not constitute a defect in the ways, etc., where such scaffold was sometimes used in furnaces, but repairs were also made by means of a ladder. Birmingham Furnace & Mfg. Co. v. Gross (1893) 37 Ala. 220, 12 So. 36.

The statute is not construed so as to make the master an insurer of his servants' safety to the extent that he is bound to have his machinery so constructed and arranged as to provide for the contingency that one of the men, whose duty it is to attend to it, may, by negligently absenting himself from his post, cause it to operate in such a manner as to injure another servant. Robins v. Cubitt (1881) 46 L. T. N. S. 535.

An accident attributable to what is merely a condition of the material on which the employees were working, and necessarily incident to the business in which they were engaged, does not constitute a cause of action. Welch v. Grace (1897) 187 Mass. 590, 46 N. E. 387, where the court rejected the contention that the death of an employee, due to the subsequent explosion of a misspent blast which, owing to the character of the rock in which it had been placed, failed to explode in the first instance, may be deemed to be caused by a defect in the "ways, works, or machinery" of the employer.

IX. Defective system, employer liable for.

Under the various employers' liability acts, 57-L. R. A.

Among such statutes that have been most generally cited and most frequently construed we find the English employer's liability act of 1880, and the subsequent acts of Alabama, Massachusetts, Colorado, and Indiana. All of these acts are more comprehensive than our own, inasmuch as they are not restricted to railroad companies; but, on the other hand, they all contain certain conditions which materially affect their application. Our statute, on the contrary, is simply an unconditional abrogation of the kindred doctrines of fellow servant and assumption of risk as applied to railroad companies. It is the act of February 23, 1897, erroneously printed as chapter 56 of the Private Laws of 1897, and is as follows:

"The General Assembly of North Carolina do enact:

"Sec. 1. That any servant or employee of any railroad company operating in this as is also the case at common law, the master is "no less responsible to his workman for personal injuries occasioned by a defective system of using machinery, than for injuries caused by a defect in the machinery itself." In other words, "a master is responsible, in point of law, not only for a defect on his part in providing good and sufficient apparatus, but also for his failure to see that the apparatus is properly used."

Lord Watson in Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 353, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660, where a verdict was allowed to stand which found negligence in the system, where the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a stone from a crane which worked over his head intermittently, while he was engaged in drilling, and was thus prevented from being on his guard to avoid danger, when, in the course of the work, the stones lifted by the crane were swung around over his head.

The absence, in hoisting machinery, of a sufficient safeguard against such a probable occurrence as a slip in the management of the machinery, is a defect in the system. Stanton v. Scrutton (1893) 9 Times L. R. 238.

A master cannot be held liable, as for a defective system, where the evidence is that the plaintiff, a boy, was injured by the sudden starting of a brickpress while he was cleaning out the under part with his hands during a temporary stoppage of the machinery, but it was also shown that he had been warned not to use his hands for this purpose. Race v. Harrison (1893) 9 Times L. R. 567.

One who has contracted to take down a building which has been gutted by fire cannot be held to have adopted an improper method of doing the work where he arranges to remove one of the walls piecemeal by means of a scaffold constructed alongside the wall of the adjacent house. Hence, a workman injured by the fall of the former wall against the latter cannot recover on the theory that the omission to shore the wall to be demolished was negligence, inasmuch as the process of shoring would have been fully as dangerous as that of erecting the scaffold. McManus v. Greenwood (1885) 52 L. T. Jour. 160. The court of appeal reversed the judgment of the divisional court (1886) 2 Times L. R. 588. The question whether the method of demolition adopted was the best, was not discussed, the reversal being put upon the ground that defendant, although he knew that there was imminent danger of the collapse of the wall, and that the workmen state who shall suffer injury to his person, or the personal representative of any such servant or employee who shall have suffered death, in the course of his services or employment with said company, by the negligence, carelessness, or incompetency of any other servant, employee, or agent of the company, or by any defect in the machinery, ways, or appliances of the company, shall be entitled to maintain an action against such company.

"Sec. 2. That any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, made by any employee of said company to waive the benefit of the aforesaid section shall be null and void."

This court has held this act to be constitutional as far as it applied to fellow servants. Kinney v. North Carolina R. Co. 122 N. C. 961, 30 S. E. 313; Wright v. Southern R. Co. 123 N. C. 280, 31 S. E. 652; Hancock

v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 124 N. C. 222, 32 S. E. 679. We see no reason why the remainder of the act is not equally constitutional, as it is necessary to give any practical value to this act itself. It is well settled that the doctrine of fellow servant and assumption of risk rest entirely upon an implied contract; and, if an express contract could be made to take the place of an implied contract, the essential purposes of the act could be practically defeated at the will of the employer. That such statutes are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States has been repeatedly decided. The Kansas statute was sustained in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161, where the court says, on page 210, 127 U. S., page 109, 32 L. ed. and page 1163, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep.: "But the hazardous character of the busiwere ignorant of the conditions, did not give them any warning.

A servant injured by an explosion of gunpowder is not entitled to go to the jury on the question whether the system of work was defective, where the complaint merely alleges that the powder was stored in a magazine five minutes' distance from the work, in small barrels; that, when it was desired to fire a charge a barrel was carried from the store and opened at the place of work; and that while the plaintiff was firing a charge, a gust of wind carried a piece of fuse to a barrel from which powder had been taken, thus causing the powder to explode and injure him. Such allegations indicate rather the occurrence of an accident through the carelessness of the servant himself in not covering the barrel while the charge was being fired. Mulligan v. McAlpine (1888) 4 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 789. The common-law cases on this subject are collected in a note to Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1898; Conn.) 43 L. R. A. 305.

This principle was, strangely enough, quite lost sight of in a case which recently came before the Ontario court of appeal. Slm v. Dominion Fish Co. (1901) 2 Ont. L. Rep. 69. There it was correctly decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover at common law upon a special finding that the master had made no provision for the inspection of appliances like that which caused the injury. But in the course of his opinion Chief Justice Armour took occasion to observe that, if the right of recovery had depended upon the employers' liability act, it would have been necessary to send the case back to another jury to determine whether some employee superior to the plaintiff was aware that the appliances were defective. It is manifest that this theory as to the effect of the verdict is erroneous. The declaration of the jury that the defendant had made no proper provision for the inspection of the appliances in question was clearly tantamount to a declaration that his system was defective in this regard. The finding, therefore, was expressive of a fact which implied personal negligence on the part of the master himself, and it was wholly unnecessary to ascertain whether the particular defect which caused the injury was known to a superior employee.

In many instances, it will be observed, the adoption of a defective system resolves itself into negligence in the exercise of superintendence. Under such circumstances, a default of this kind may be referred to either of the categories which are covered by this and the following provisions of the acts, and another provision which will be discussed in a later annotation.

X. Not discovered or remedied owing to negligence, etc.

a. Generally.

The qualifying declaration in this statute, by which liability is excluded unless negligence is predicable of the failure to discover or remedy the defect which caused the injury, merely embodies, so far as the employer himself is concerned, the common-law doctrine that negligence cannot be imputed to a person who is not shown to have had actual or constructive knowledge of the conditions from which the injury resulted. See note to Walkowiak v. Penock & G. Consol. Mines (1898; Mich.) 41 L. R. A. 33, where this doctrine is analyzed and discussed at considerable length.

The converse proposition which is implied in this doctrine, viz., that a master is culpably negligent if he permits the continuance of abnormally dangerous conditions, which, by the exercise of due care, he might have ascertained, suggests a reason for doubting the correctness of the decision of the Ontario court of appeal (Slm v. Dominion Fish Co. [1901] 2 Ont. L. Rep. 69) which is criticized on another ground in the preceding subdivision. It seems not unreasonable to say that, for the purposes of sustaining the judgment, a court of review would have been warranted in construing the finding of the jury, that the defendant had made no provision for a proper inspection, as being equivalent to a declaration by the jury that the defect in question would have been discovered, if such an inspection had been made. This would be tantamount to saying that the master ought to have known of the defect, and was therefore as culpable as if he had actually known of it and failed to remedy it. If this view be correct, the finding virtually attributed personal negligence to the master, and there was clearly no necessity to obtain the opinion of the jury upon the question whether the defect was known to a superior employee.

The imposition of liability for the defaults of the class of agents here designated may be regarded as being, for practical purposes, a legislative adoption of that doctrine of non-delegable duties which has been evolved, independently of statutes, in most of the American states. See the note to Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (1901; C. C. App. 7th C.) 54 L. R. A. 33, where a complete collection of the authorities will be found.

ness of operating a railway would seem to call for special legislation with respect to railroad corporations, having for its object the protection of their employees as well as the safety of the public. The business of other corporations is not subject to similar dangers to their employees, and no objections, therefore, can be made to the legislation on the ground of its making an unjust discrimination. It meets a particular necessity, and all railroad corporations are without distinction made subject to the same liabilities." This case was quoted and approved in Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Herrick, 127 U. S. 211, 32 L. ed. 110, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1176, sustaining the Iowa statute; in Chicago K. & W. R. Co. v. Pontius, 157 U. S. 209, 39 L. ed. 675, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585; and in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathews, 165 U. S. 1, 41 L. ed. 611, 17 Sup.

Ct. Rep. 243. We have, therefore, no hesitation in holding the act of February 23, 1897, valid in its entirety, and that it deprives all railroad companies operating in this state of the defense of assumption of risk, whether resting in contract, express or implied, and whether pleaded directly or under the doctrine of fellow servant.

Beyond this we cannot go, as we think that the intent of the statute related simply to the contractual relations existing, expressly or by implication, between the plaintiff and defendant; and that the general assembly did not intend to forbid the plea of contributory negligence in the real meaning of the term. Some courts appear to have confused assumption of risk with contributory negligence, by regarding them as equivalent defenses; but they are essentially different in their nature, their origin,

b. Not discovered.

Whether the gravamen of the servant's complaint be the default of the master himself or of his agents, in failing to discover a defect, the existence or absence of culpability is tested by considerations of precisely the same kind as those which are applied in common-law actions.

The servant cannot succeed in his action where neither the employer himself, nor his representative within the meaning of this subdivision, had knowledge, actual or constructive, of the existence of the defect which caused the injury. Graves v. Fuller (1888) 4 Times L. R. 474 (plaintiff nonsuited); Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 586, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38; Morgan v. Hutchins (1890) 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 197, 38 Week. Rep. 412; Griffiths v. London & St. K. Docks Co. (1884) L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 259, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 504, 51 L. T. N. S. 533, 33 Week. Rep. 35, 49 J. P. 100, per Fry, L. J., Followed in Rudd v. Bell (1887) 13 Ont. Rep. 47; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Campbell (1893) 97 Ala. 147, 12 So. 574; Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21, 28 N. E. 1128; Wilson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1887) 85 Ala. 269, 4 So. 701.

The mere fact of age and long use of a stick which broke while being used as a lever will not justify a finding that the employer ought to have known the stick to be defective. Allen v. G. W. & F. Smith Iron Co. (1894) 160 Mass. 557, 36 N. E. 581.

In Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 856, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660, Lord Watson commented thus upon § 2, subsec. 3, of the act, specifically requiring the servant to notify his employer or his superior officer of the existence of any "defect or negligence" which has come to his knowledge: "I think the object and effect of the enactment are to relieve the employer of liability for injuries occasioned by defects which were neither known to him nor to his delegates down to the time when the injury was done. At common law his ignorance would not have barred the workman's claim, as he was bound to see that his machinery and works were free from defect, and so far the provision operates in favor of the employer."

This remark seems to be open to criticism, if it implies that the master was liable at common law for injuries caused by a defect, though he was ignorant of its existence, and his ignorance was not culpable. It is difficult to see how this conception can be reconciled with the 57 L. R. A.

theory, which is fully recognised by the English decisions, that a master is only bound to use ordinary care, and does not warrant the safety of his servants. Weems v. Mathleson (1861) 4 Macq. H. L. Cas. 215; Clarke v. Holmes (1862) 7 Hurlst. & N. 937, 81 L. J. Exch. N. S. 356, 8 Jur. N. S. 992, 10 Week. Rep. 405; Mellors v. Shaw (1861) 1 Best & S. 437, 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 883, 7 Jur. N. S. 845; Ormond v. Holland (1858) El. Bl. & El. 102.

Under the original Massachusetts act, the common-law rule established by Mackin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 201, 46 Am. Rep. 456, that a railway company is not liable for the negligence of its car inspectors, was declared not to have been changed in regard to foreign cars received merely for forwarding. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 13, 30 N. E. 169. Compare also Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21, 28 N. E. 1128.

But this decision is no longer a correct statement of the law since the passage of the amendatory act of 1893, chap. 859, declaring that the mere fact of a car being in possession of a railroad company makes it a part of its "ways, works, or machinery."

And the servant cannot succeed where there was no reason to apprehend the particular casualty which occurred. Booker v. Higgs (1887) 3 Times L. R. 618 (recovery denied for lack of positive evidence on this point, in a case where a laborer was injured by the fall of a bank of earth which he had been ordered by the foreman to excavate by entering a hole in a wall against which the earth lay).

On the other hand, evidence that the defect might have been discovered if the instrumentality had been examined by a skilled person will justify a verdict for the servant. Fraser v. Fraser (1882) 9 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 896 (rope broke).

A judgment for the plaintiff will not be disturbed where he was injured by the breaking of a bolt, not shown to have any latent defect, and the evidence was that, although it had been subjected to usage which tended to diminish its strength, its strength had not been tested, as it should have been, with reasonable frequency. Irwin v. Dennystown (1883) 22 Sc. L. R. 379.

The fact that the machinery which caused the accident was replaced after the accident occurred is admissible as evidence that the master knew that it was defective. Dodd v. Dunton (1890) 16 Vict. L. Rep. 531.

Evidence that defects in a track had exand their results. Contributory negligence, of course, always involves the fact of actual negligence on the part of the plaintiff, while the simple assumption of risk does not of itself imply negligence, which may or may not coexist. A defective machine carefully handled, or a safe machine carelessly handled, may equally result in an accident; but the resulting responsibility would be by no means the same. This is especially true since the act of 1897. As the law now stands, the use of machinery obviously defective will not prevent the plaintiff from a recovery for an injury resulting therefrom, unless the apparent danger is so great that its assumption would amount to a reckless indifference to probable consequences. What is recklessness, depending upon the rule of the prudent man, is, as is said in the former opinion of the court, a matter of fact for the jury, as it necessarily depends upon the peculiar facts of each case. The best definition we can give, applicable to such cases as that at bar, is that adopted by this court in Hinshaw v. Raleigh & A. Air-Line R. Co. 118 N. C. 1047, 24 S. E. 426, that the danger of using the defective machine must be, not only apparent, but so great that there are more chances against its safe use than there are in favor of it. This risk must be considered in connection with the skill and experience of the plaintiff, as a sailor might with entire safety climb up into the rigging, where it would be utter recklessness for a landsman to follow. In all such cases the "personal equation" is an important factor. It is admitted that at the time of the injury the plaintiff had been in the railroad service for thirty years, in the service of the defendant listed for several weeks prior to the accident is relevant on the question of negligence. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Webb (1893) 97 Ala. 157, 11 So. 888.

A finding that a foreman should have seen that a plank which gave way was cross-grained and knotty, and consequently unsafe to walk upon in the position in which it was placed, will not be disturbed. Caldwell v. Mills (1893) 24 Ont. Rep. 462.

The mere fact that no accident has happened for several years does not prove that the master ought not to have known there was danger. "Long immunity from accident does not prove absence of carelessness. It may only prove long-continued habitual negligence." Thomas v. Great Western Co. (1894) 10 Times L. R. 244, Reversing decision of divisional court.

In determining the question whether the instrumentality ought to have been inspected by the defendant or his agents, the fact that it was furnished by a competent contractor, or that an express statement as to its condition had been made by such a contractor under circumstances in which it was apparently justifiable to rely upon his opinion, is, in England, deemed to be conclusive against the inference of negligence.

A master is not liable for injuries caused by the fall of a staging which only the day before had been erected by a contractor. He is not, under such circumstances, bound to inspect the staging himself, or to employ anyone specially to inspect it. Kiddle v. Lovett (1885) L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 605, 34 Week. Rep. 518, per Denman, J. (sitting without a jury). The master had paid a sum of money to the servant, and was suing the contractor to recover the amount. It was held that he could not maintain the action.

No negligence is proved, where a foreman relies upon the assurance of a contractor engaged in reinstating a building which has been partially destroyed by fire, that one of the walls has been safely shored up, and sends his subordinates back to work near it, after having withdrawn them when he noticed the unsafe condition of the fabric. Moore v. Gimson (1889) 5 Times L. R. 177, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 169.

c. Not remedied.

A remedy of a "defect in the condition of the machinery" does not mean putting the machinery in perfect condition for working purposes, but the removal of the source of danger to employees, which may be done by a temporary device, as well as by permanent repairs. Willey v. Boston Electric Light Co. (1897) 168 Mass. 40, 37 L. R. A. 723, 46 N. E. 395 (defendant had argued that it was not liable because the defect could not have been permanently remedied before the accident).

The failure to stop a machine which is not working properly is a failure to "remedy" its defects. Bacon v. Dawes (1887) 3 Times L. R. 557.

Negligence cannot be inferred where a defect came to the knowledge of the master or superior so short a time before the accident that there was not sufficient time to remedy it. Seaboard Mfg. Co. v. Woodson (1891) 94 Ala. 143, 10 So. 87 (complaint demurrable which merely alleges that the defect was "known to the superior officers of plaintiff, and to the defendant").

"When the danger is not constantly present, but recurs at intervals, the defect may be cured by giving the workmen timely warning of its approach." Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 354, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660. Lord Watson said: "The employer may protect himself, either by removing the source of danger, or by making provision for due notice being given. Should he adopt the latter course, he will still be exposed to liability if injury results from failure to give warning through the negligence of himself or of his superintendent."

d. Person intrusted with the duty, etc.

To bring an employee within this description there should be evidence showing that he was charged with the specific duty of keeping the defective instrumentality in proper condition.

The employer has been held liable for the negligence of the following agents:

An assistant roadmaster whose duty it is to inspect cars, and have them run upon the repair track when they are found to require repairs. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davis (1890) 91 Ala. 487, 8 So. 552.

A supervisor and section foreman, in a case where a defect in a switch caused a train to be derailed. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Webb (1893) 97 Ala. 157, 11 So. 888.

A lineman sent out to search for and remedy a defective insulation on an electric wire. Willey v. Boston Electric Light Co. (1897) 168 Mass. 40, 37 L. R. A. 723, 46 N. E. 395.

A carpenter who understands and looks after machinery, although subject to the orders of a superintendent, who is also a salesman. Cop- over four years as yard conductor, and was fully versed in the duties of his position. It further appears that the regular switch engine with a sloping tender was taken away, and a road engine substituted therefor, that had no hand-hold above the platform of the tender. This hand-hold could be used only while he was on the lower step, and yet, if he remained on that step, he could not see the engineer, or signal to him, without leaning outward in an uncomfortable and dangerous position. The proper performance of his duties required him to stand upon the platform of the tender where he could see and be seen; and to get up there he must pull up by catching hold either of the drainpipe or the top of the tender. He swears that of the two he considered the drainpipe the safer, as well as the more convenient. Neither had been provided for such use, and, if he pulled himself up at all, he was compelled to do so by using something intended for another purpose. He had been using this drainpipe regularly for such purpose for three weeks, but had used the one on the other side more because the most of his work was on that side. If the drainpipe had been properly fastened, it would have been safe, and he would not have been hurt. These are the most material points of his testimony, and he is largely corroborated by other witnesses. The plaintiff testifies that, if the drainpipe had been in proper condition, it should have held a thousand pounds. Heilig testified that drainpipes are usually threaded through a nut on the inside, and should support a thousand pounds, if necessary. Lacy, a witness for the defendant, says that drainpipes, when in proper condition are thorne v. Hardy (1899) 173 Mass. 400, 53 N. E. 915.

An employee in charge of the stables of a street-car company using a horse when in an unfit condition to be worked. Harston v. Edinburgh Co. (1887) 14 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 621.

A "fireman" of a mine, whose duty it is to inspect the workings before the miners go to work, and report as to the state of the ventilation. Cowler v. Moresby Coal Co. (1885) 1 Times L. R. 575.

In Canadian Coloured Cotton Mills v. Talbot (1897) 27 Can. S. C. 198, it was held that evidence showing that an employee, who called a "loom fixer" to examine a loom, after being notified that something was wrong with it, had failed to make an examination, justified submitting the case to the jury.

But it is not necessary that he should be discharging the functions of a superintendent. Copthorne v. Hardy (1899) 173 Mass. 400, 53 N. E. 915, where the master was held liable for the negligence of one who attended, under the superintendent's orders, to the adjustment of machinery.

The negligence of a superior employee, not charged with that duty, who attempts, at the request of a servant who is using an appliance, to remedy a defect therein, is not imputed to the master. Thomas v. Bellamy (1899) 126 Ala. 253, 28 So. 707.

Nor is the clause applicable to an employee whose duty it is, under a rule of his master, to examine, for his own security, the appliances he uses. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Graham (1891) 94 Ala. 545, 10 So. 283 (conductor and brakeman denied to be "persons intrusted, etc.").

Still less is the master liable for the negligence of a mere laborer working under or with others, even though it may be a part of his duty at some particular moment, in the progress of the work, to look after and attend to certain instrumentalities. O'Connor v. Neal (1891) 153 Mass. 281, 26 N. E. 857, where the court refused to hold the master liable for the negligence of a painter's assistant, who aided his principal in moving from place to place the planks and barrels from which a temporary scaffold was constructed, and adjusted one of the barrels so carelessly that the scaffold collapsed.

XI. Abnormal conditions resulting from the use of the appliances furnished by the master, how far regarded as defects.

ditions which, in all kinds of industrial work, are temporarily created by the use of the appliances furnished by the master, are not considered to be caused by "defects" within the meaning of these statutes.

"The absolute obligation of an employer to see that due care is used to provide safe appliances for his workmen is not extended to all the passing risks which arise from short-lived causes." Whittaker v. Bent (1897) 167 Mass. 588, 46 N. E. 121, denying recovery for an injury resulting from the temporary dampness of molds used in an iron foundry, which can be ascertained only at the moment when they are set up, the reason assigned being that the molds were small and numerous, the danger transitory, and any further inspection than that of employees setting them up impracticable.

The absence of stanchions on the sides of a trolley is not a "defect," where the placing of such stanchions is the duty of the servants who put on the load. Corcoran v. East Surrey Ironworks Co. (1888) 5 Times L. R. 103, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 145.

The liability of a bank of earth which an employer is engaged in leveling for the purpose of grading the land of a third person, and upon which laborers are at work, to fall when undermined, if not properly shored up, is not a "defect in the ways," etc. Lynch v. Allyn (1893) 160 Mass. 248, 35 N. E. 550.

A defect in the "ways" is not predicable, unless there is some alteration in the permanent condition of the way itself. Obstacles lying on or near the way, which do not in any degree alter the fitness for the purpose for which it is generally employed, and cannot be said to be incorporated with it, are not within the purview of this provision. McGiffin v. Palmer's Shipbuilding & Iron Co. (1882) L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 5, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 25, 47 L. T. N. S. 346, 31 Week. Rep. 118, 47 J. P. 70, denying recovery where a car on which a workman was conveying heavy iron balls struck against a piece of a substance used for lining the furnaces, which had been negligently placed projecting into the roadway on which the car ran, the result being that one of the balls fell on him.

The words "ways, works, and machinery" do not cover a pile of lumber in the yard of a lumber dealer. Campbell v. Dearborn (1900) 175 Mass. 183, 55 N. E. 1042.

To the same effect, see the following cases, where the abnormal conditions were of the nature mentioned in the memorandum of the facts appended to the citations: Willets v. Watt [1892] 2 Q. B. 92, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 540, 66 very secure, and would hold a man's weight, adding, "When first put in, always would." Hill, a witness for the defendant, says that the drainpipe "would hold a man's weight if in proper condition." Taking this evidence as true, and construing it in the light most favorable for the plaintiff, as we are bound to do on a motion to nonsuit or direction of the verdict, can we say, in the light of our own decisions, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law? The question is not whether the defendant had placed the drainpipe there for any such purpose, but whether, when the defendant made it necessary for him to pull up by something, without placing anything there for the purpose, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence per se in catching hold of a drainpipe which was apparently secure, which he had been using for three weeks, and which, if in proper condition, could have supported a thousand pounds. It seems to us there can be but one answer. It was an issue of fact for the jury, and, in the absence of any error in his honor's charge prejudicial to the defendant, we cannot disturb the verdict.

It is well settled that on a motion for nonsuit, or its counterpart, the direction of a verdict, the evidence for the plaintiff must be accepted as true, and construed in the light most favorable to him, as the jury might take that view of it if left to them, as they appear to have done in the case at bar. Avera v. Sexton, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 247; Hathaway v. Hinton, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 243; State v. Allen, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 257; Abernathy v. Stowe, 92 N. C. 213; Gibbs v. Lyon, 95 N. C. 146;

L. T. N. S. 818, 40 Week. Rep. 497, 56 J. P. 772 (temporary removal of the cover of a catch-pit lying in the line of a path along which servants had to pass in the course of their duties); May v. Whittler Mach. Co. (1891) 154 Mass. 29, 27 N. E. 768 (employee stumbled over some small pieces of wood which had been piled against the back of a planing machine, near which he had to pass, and was hurt by his hand coming into contact with the machine); Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton (1892) 97 Ala. 240, 12 So. 88 (car left standing near a railway track), overruling on this point Highland Ave. & Belt R. Co. v. Walters (1890) 91 Ala. 435, 8 So. 357; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bouldin (1895) 110 Ala. 185, 20 So. 325 (oil-box standing near the track, which came in contact with plaintiff's foot while he was standing on the pilot of an engine and threw him off); Carroll v. Willcutt (1895) 163 Mass. 221, 39 N. E. 1016 (the presence of a ledge stone on a scaffolding).

Both on the principle applied in these cases, and also on the ground that the accident was an unexpected one, it has been held that a master cannot be held liable, under the statute, for an injury due to a railway tie with a projecting spike in it, which has been taken up with a view to repairing it, and placed by the side of a road, where the cause of the injury was the fact that a horse, which the plaintiff was leading, was frightened, and, backing against him, knocked him down upon the tie. McQuade v. Dixon (1887) 14 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 1039.

Whether the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of a fellow servant in regard to the mere use of appliances, is primarily a question for the jury. Knight v. Overman Wheel Co. (1899) 174 Mass. 455, 54 N. E. 890.

Especially is the rule applicable when the abnormal conditions would not have existed if the plaintiff himself had done his duty.

A verdict for the plaintiff should be set aside, where his own evidence shows that, if the machine had been properly attended to by himself, the accident would not have happened. Kay v. Briggs (1889) 5 Times L. R. 233.

An employer is not liable for the death of an employee while laying pipe in the bottom of a sewer trench in process of construction by the employer, through the caving in of the walls of the trench, due to insufficient shoring and bracing, where such employee was himself intrusted with superintendence of the shoring and bracing, and paid higher wages because of it. Conroy v. Clinton (1893) 158 Mass. 318, 33 N. E. 525.

This particular situation, however, would seem to be more appropriately referred to the conception of an inability to recover, predicated from the contributory negligence of the injured person.

In cases of this class the only ground on which the master can be held liable is that he was guilty of negligence in not warning his servants of the increased risk to which they would for the time being be exposed. Willets v. Watt [1892] 2 Q. B. 92, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 540, 66 L. T. N. S. 818, 40 Week. Rep. 497, 56 J. P. 772.

The temporary nature of the abnormal conditions complained of will not, however, protect the master, if they amounted to a structural alteration of the appliance in question, and that alteration was made by the employee in charge of it. See Tate v. Latham [1897] 1 Q. B. 502, 75 L. T. N. S. 694, 45 Week. Rep. 400, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 349, holding that the absence of the guard of a saw was a "defect," where it had been temporarily removed by the sawyer.

This decision practically overrules the doctrine of Fry, L. J., that the defects contemplated by the statute are those of a "chronic character." Willets v. Watt [1892] 2 Q. B. 92, 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 540, 66 L. T. N. S. 818, 40 Week. Rep. 497, 56 J. P. 772. (In the report in 61 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 540, the phrase used is "somewhat chronic.")

It was pointed out in the later case (Tate v. Latham) by Bruce, J. (divisional court), this theory is not necessary to sustain the conclusion arrived at. That conclusion, indeed, might well be put upon the ground that no negligence was established, as the catch-pit into which the plaintiff fell had been opened to allow work to be done, and was left unfenced because it was not possible to do the work while a fence surrounded it.

A fortiori, where such a structural alteration was intended to be permanent, the servant will not be excluded from the benefits of the statute simply for the reason that the new arrangements were only completed the day before the accident. Copthorne v. Hardy (1899) 173 Mass. 400, 53 N. E. 915 (shaft attached to the ceiling of a room by brackets and screws held not to produce conditions belonging to that transitory class for which the employer is not responsible beyond furnishing a choice of proper materials or instrumentalities).

Moreover, it would seem that conditions which, in the first instance, are merely temporary in their nature, will, if they are allowed

E. 953, Justice Furches, speaking for the court, says: "This motion is substantially a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence, and, this being so, and the court having no right to pass upon the weight of evidence, every fact that plaintiff's evidence proved or tended to prove must be taken by the court to be proved. It must be taken in the strongest light as against the defendant." In Capital Printing Co. v. Raleigh, 126 N. C. 516, 36 S. E. 33, Chief Justice Faircloth, speaking for the court, says: "The defendant's motion to dismiss the action was equivalent to a demurrer to the evidence, and the plaintiff's evidence will be considered as true, and taken in the most favorable light for him [citing authorities]. An appellate court reviewing a judgment of nonsuit will assume every fact proved necessary to be proved, when the evidence tends to prove it." This same rule applies even in the Federal court, where the judges are permit-to become permanent, be assimilated, for the purposes of the statutes, to defects inherent in the substance of the instrumentalities themselves.

This seems to be the rationale of a Scotch case, in which it has been held that a manhole at the side of a railway in a mine, so obstructed with rubbish that a miner is unable to use it as a refuge when cars are approaching, is a "defect in the ways." Ferris v. Cowdenbeath (1897) 24 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 615.

When the master keeps a readily accessible stock of simple appliances, he is not bound, under the statute, any more than at common law, to see that a servant asks for a new one when that which he has been using is worn out.

There can be no recovery for the death of an employee caused by the breaking of a wooden lever by which a fellow workman was helping to raise a heavy iron door on its hinges, causing the door to swing down and strike an iron lever held by deceased, driving it into his abdomen, in the absence of any evidence that the broken stick was defective, or, if so, that the defect could have been discovered. Allen v. G. W. & F. Smith Iron Co. (1894) 160 Mass. 557, 36 N. E. 581. The court said: "The whole matter was in the hands of the deceased. He was the person in immediate charge of the furnace. If a new stick was needed, it was his business to know it. The primary duty rested on him, not on any superior officer. Again, if a new stick had been needed, it could have been obtained of the carpenter by the deceased at any time. The defendant kept a stock of lumber of the proper size on hand, and the deceased had only to ask for what he wanted. If such a stick can be said to be part of the works or machinery, the defendant's duty to the deceased did not require it to see that he called for a proper one. It was enough that it had proper ones within convenient reach."

One of a number of chains furnished for use as required is regarded, when it is applied to the purpose for which it is designed, as a permanent instrumentality, and not one of those small things which go through a rapid course of wearing out and replacement, as to which the rule is that it may be left to the judgment of the workmen when one of them is to be discarded. The making of a link for such a chain therefore, is not one of those merely transitory adjustments which the master is under no personal obligation to see carefully performed. Haskell v. Cape Ann Anchor Works (1901) 178 Mass. 485, 59 N. E. 1113.

These decisions suggest that the temporary or permanent nature of the defect is not the true differentiating factor in this class of cases, and that the essential questions are rather, (1) whether the abnormal conditions were mere incidents in the progress of the work or structural, and (2), supposing them to be of the latter description, whether they were brought about by the act or volition of the employee who was in charge of the instrumentality to which the injury was due.

XII. Defects in temporary appliances constructed by the servants themselves, not deemed to be chargeable to the employer.

A special application of the principle exemplified in the preceding section is the doctrine enforced in several American cases, that there can be no recovery, under this provision of the statute, where the injury was the direct result of the negligent manner in which the servants themselves constructed a temporary appliance from adequate and suitable materials furnished by the master.

The action has been held not to be maintainable where the cause of the injury was one of the following appliances:

Two ladders selected by employees from a supply furnished by the employer, and fastened together for use in painting a building. McKay v. Hand (1897) 168 Mass. 270, 47 N. E. 104. The court said: "From the description of the ladder which broke, it is difficult to see from the evidence that the defendant was negligent in keeping it among his lot of ladders, and in permitting it to be used; and if the sole negligence was that the ladders were fastened together and improperly placed against the house, that was the fault of the plaintiff and his fellow workman, and it was known to and appreciated by the plaintiff at the time. A ladder may be a sound, light ladder of sufficient strength to be used by itself, but not suitable to be made the butt of two ladders fastened together."

A temporary staging put up for the purpose of erecting a building. Burns v. Washburn (1894) 160 Mass. 457, 36 N. E. 199.

A temporary staging put up by workmen themselves, who are slating a roof. Reynolds v. Barnard (1897) 168 Mass. 226, 46 N. E. 703.

A temporary staging used by painters in painting the walls of a building. Adasken v. Gilbert (1896) 165 Mass. 443, 43 N. E. 199.

The master cannot be held liable, as for a defect, where a scaffold fell owing to the fact that a barrel by which it was supported was placed upon some rubbish of an accidental or ted to express an opinion upon the facts, and where the rule as to a direction of the verdict is not so rigid as with us, as will be shown by the following quotations from a long line of cases: "If the evidence, giving the plaintiff the benefit of every inference to be fairly drawn from it, sustained this view, then the direction to find for the defendant was proper." Kane v. Northern C. R. Co. 128 U. S. 91, 94, 32 L. ed. 339, 341, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 17. "It is only where the facts are such that all reasonable men must draw the same conclusion from them that the question of negligence is ever considered as one of law for the court." Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 427, 36 L. ed. 492, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 683. "In determining whether the plaintiff was so clearly guilty of contributory negligence as to entitle the defendant to a verdict, we are bound to put upon the testimony the construction most favorable to him." Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Lowell, 151 U. S. 209, 217, 38 L. ed. 131, 136, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 284. The inference from the facts must be "so plain as to be a legal conclusion," before the question can be withdrawn from the jury. Northern P. R. Co. v. Egeland, 163 U. S. 93, 98, 41 L. ed. 82, 86, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 977: "We see no reason, so long as the jury system is the law of the land, and the jury is made the tribunal to decide disputed questions of fact, why it should not decide such questions as these [negligence and contributory negligence] as well as others." Jones v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 128 U. S. 443, 445, 32 L. ed. 478, 479, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 118: "The circuit court erred in not submitting the question of contributory negligence to the jury, as the contemporary character on the floor of the room where the plaintiff was at work. O'Connor v. Neal (1891) 153 Mass. 281, 26 N. E. 857.

Neither can he be held liable for an injury resulting from the defective manner in which planks were fastened together by the plaintiff's fellow servants, and temporarily laid by them on the top of walls about 5 feet from the ground. Morris v. Walworth Mfg. Co. (1902; Mass.) 63 N. E. 910.

The employer's liability for injuries sustained by the giving way of a part of a staging is not established where the evidence does not tend to show that they furnished the staging as a completed structure, or that they assumed to exercise any control or supervision as to how it should be built or kept or adapted for work, or that they failed to furnish a sufficient quantity of suitable materials, or that they employed incompetent workmen, but does show that the staging in use in the building had been in the care of the workmen themselves for several months. Brady v. Norcross (1899) 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528.

The gravamen of a declaration showing that the plaintiff, a journeyman painter, was injured owing to the negligence of another painter in failing to fasten properly his end of the hanging scaffold on which they were working, is the negligence of a fellow servant in handling or using an appliance, and therefore no cause of action under the statute is alleged. Ashley v. Hart (1888) 147 Mass. 573, 1 L. R. A. 355, 18 N. E. 416.

Failure to provide a temporary scaffold or platform around a "bleeder" used for the escape of gas above an iron furnace, on which the master mechanic could stand to repair the bleeder, does not constitute a defect in the ways, etc., where such scaffold was sometimes used in furnaces, but repairs were also made by means of a ladder. Birmingham Furnace & Mfg. Co. v. Gross (1893) 97 Ala. 220, 12 So. 30.

This rule is the counterpart of that doctrine which, in common-law actions, prevents recovery under similar circumstances. See note to Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (1901; C. C. App. 7th C.) 54 L. R. A. 136.

The rule under the statute is subject to the same qualification as the common-law doctrine, viz., that it does not protect the master if the defective appliance was one which he was bound to furnish in a completed condition. See Brady v. Norcross (1899) 172 Mass. 331, 52 N. E. 528.

From the case cited, it would appear that the servant has the burden of proving the existence of such an obligation whenever the appliance was one of an essentially temporary description, to be used only for the particular piece of work then in progress.

Another possible qualification of the rule is that the master might be held responsible if the temporary appliance was one constructed by a superintending employee, unless it should be held that proof of negligence on the part of such an employee would not sustain an allegation of injury caused by a "defect," and that, under the circumstances supposed, the complaint must be based on the words of the provision reviewed in the next subdivision.

In the absence of any direct authority on this point, all that can be said is that, in any case where it may be uncertain whether the master can be held liable simply on the ground of the existence of a defect, it would be well to insert an alternative count averring negligence in the exercise of superintendence.

XIII. Duty of servant to report defects.

a. Statutory and common-law doctrines compared.

There is the high authority of Lord Watson for the doctrine that the statute puts the servant in a more favorable position than he occupied under the common law. See Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660, where, in the course of his comments on the clause, he remarked: "I think the object and effect of the enactment are to relieve the employer of liability for injuries occasioned by defects which were neither known to him nor to his delegates down to the time when the injury was done. At common law his ignorance would not have barred the workman's claim, as he was bound to see that his machinery and works were free from defect, and so far the provision operates in favor of the employer." This view has been adopted by the supreme court of Canada. Webster v. Foley (1892) 21 Can. S. C. 580. But with all deference to this very distinguished jurist, it seems open to doubt whether this theory is correct. There is, it is true, no English decision which in terms lays down the rule that a servant who learns of a defect is bound to communicate his knowledge to his master, and that his failure to give such information constitutes a breach of a specific duty which of itself is enough to prevent his recovering for any injury which he may thereafter receive owing to the existence of the defect. But the reason for the lack of direct authority on the point clusion did not follow, as matter of law, that no recovery could be had upon any view which could be properly taken of the facts the evidence tended to establish." Dunlap v. Northeastern R. Co. 130 U. S. 652, 32 L. ed. 1059, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 647. (The italics are our own.) It cannot be doubted, and in fact it does not seem to be seriously questioned, that it was negligence on the part of the defendant to furnish an engine so obviously defective for its intended use, when the defect could have been so easily supplied. In fact, it is questionable whether this case would not come under the rule of continuing negligence laid down in the Cases of Greenlee and Trozler, aside from the act of 1897. Greenlee v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 978, 41 L. R. A. 399, 30 S. E. 115; Trozler v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 903, 30 S. E. 117, 124 N. C. 189, 44 L.

is sufficiently obvious. In all cases decided under common-law doctrines up to the time when Lord Watson delivered this opinion, the circumstances were necessarily such as to bring them within the scope of the principle that the servant's action was absolutely barred, whenever it was shown that he went on working with a full appreciation of a risk resulting from the master's negligence. The natural result was that, although the failure of the servant to report or complain of a defect was mentioned in some of the cases, for example, Skipp v. Eastern Counties R. Co. (1853) 9 Exch. 228, 8 C. L. Rep. 185, 23 L. J. Exch. N. S. 23, this fact was never treated as a material element in the case, the master's defense being regarded as complete without any reference to the question whether the servant had communicated his knowledge. In none of these cases was the evidential significance of the servant's silence considered in any other point of view than as a circumstance tending to show his acquiescence in the conditions, that is to say, as a circumstance, corroborating a presumption already absolute, that the risks in question had been accepted. Such being the state of the authorities, the mere fact that the existence of a duty on the servant's part to notify his master of a defect was never affirmed cannot fairly be adduced as a ground for denying that there was such a duty. When subjected to the test of general principles, the correctness of Lord Watson's theory seems to be equally disputable. It is impossible to adopt it without accepting the conclusion, that, if a jury has, in a common-law action, found that the servant was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to give notice of the defect which caused his injury, and it is clear that the verdict was based on the hypothesis that there was a legal duty incumbent on the servant to give the notice, a court of review would be constrained to set the verdict aside. Such a proposition seems too preposterous to entertain. The extreme improbability of such a verdict even being rendered may be readily conceded, but this practical consideration is immaterial in a discussion of the abstract point of law which is involved.

The general effect of the American decisions in this connection is inconclusive for the same reason as that which has been adverted to in commenting on the English cases. The failure to report a defect is usually treated merely as a cumulative ground for denying the servant's right of recovery, and not as the breach of a specific duty. See, for example, the language used in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh (1893) 57 L. R. A.

R. A. 313, 32 S. E. 550; McLamb v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 122 N. C. 862, 29 S. E. 894. In the celebrated case of Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339, the following significant reservation in the opinion of the court is found on pages 61 and 62, 4 Met., and page 345, 38 Am. Dec.: "In coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff in the present case is not entitled to recover, considering it as in some measure a nice question, we would add a caution against any hasty conclusion as to the application of this rule to a case not fully within the same principle. It may be varied and modified by circumstances not appearing in the present case, in which it appears that no wilful wrong or actual negligence was imputed to the corporation, and where suitable means were furnished, and suitable persons employed, to accomplish

Inasmuch as a servant frequently finds himself relegated to his common-law rights, owing to his having failed to give due notice that the injury was sustained, or to bring the action within the statutory period, the true doctrine on this subject is still a question of more than theoretical interest in England and her colonies, where it has not yet been determined how far the doctrine enunciated in Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660, may, when the question arises, be held to have modified, in common-law cases, the theory of the older decisions that the servant's acceptance of a risk is to be inferred, as matter of law, from his continuance of work with a knowledge of its existence. It is significant that in this case Lord Watson was prepared to hold that, apart from the act of 1880, the plaintiff's remedy was not necessarily taken away by the mere fact that, in the knowledge of the risk and after remonstrance, he continued to work. In Massachusetts it seems to be immaterial, in this point of view, whether the action is brought at common law or under the statute, as the English doctrine that the servant's assumption of risks is a question for the jury where the statute is relied upon has been definitely repudiated in recent decisions. O'Maley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. (1893) 158 Mass. 135, 47 L. R. A. 161, 32 N. E. 1110; Davis v. Forbes (1898) 171 Mass. 548, 47 L. R. A. 170, 51 N. E. 20.

b. Position of a servant who fails to report a defect.

In an action brought under a statute which merely declares that the servant cannot recover unless he reports the defect, it is clear that if he fails to make the report, and goes on working without knowing that the master is aware of the defect, he cannot recover for any injuries which he may thereafter receive by reason of its existence. Thomas v. Bellamy (1899) 126 Ala. 253, 28 So. 707. The doctrine laid down in Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660, is presumably not applicable under such circumstances, though the writer is not aware of any case in which the point has been discussed. In Ontario and British Columbia the position of the the object in view. We are far from intending to say that there are no implied warranties and undertakings arising out of the relation of master and servant. Whether, for instance, the employer would be responsible to an engineer for a loss arising from a defective or ill-constructed steam engine; whether this would depend upon an implied warranty of its goodness or sufficiency, or upon the fact of wilful misconduct or gross negligence on the part of the employer, if a natural person, or of the superintendent or immediate representative and managing agent, in case of an incorporated company,—are questions on which we give no opinion." Does not this contain the germ of the Greenlee Case? If so, what would be the use of raising an implied warranty if the law at once rebutted it by an implied assumption of risk?

We do not think it necessary to add anything more to the opinion of the court as delivered by the Chief Justice, as the remaining principles therein decided are too well settled to need further discussion. It may be that, if we were jurors, we would find the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of fact, and not at all unlikely that the recovery would be less. But we are not jurors, and have no right to assume their functions. The plaintiff has a judgment obtained in a court of competent jurisdiction, which is before us on appeal only as to matters of law. As we find no substantial error in his honor's charge or the conduct of the trial, we cannot disturb the verdict or reverse the judgment on any view we may have as to the mere weight of evidence.

servant is more favorable, the legislature having expressly enacted that the servant is not debarred from recovery merely by reason of his having continued to work with knowledge of the risk. If the extreme unlikelihood that any jury will ever, in a case of this description, pronounce the risk to have been assumed by the plaintiff, is adverted to, it will be apparent that the practical effect of this provision is to render almost nugatory the protection afforded to the master by the clause which makes it the duty of the servant to give notice.

By the express words of the statute, a servant is not bound to give information of a defect where he knows that it is already known to the master. Truman v. Rudolph (1895) 22 Ont. App. Rep. 250.

c. Position of a servant who has reported a defect.

The right of action acquired by a servant who has duly reported a defect in compliance with the statute, and then goes on working, depends largely upon the extent to which the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria, applies. A full treatment of the subject, therefore, would carry us beyond the scope of the present article. But a brief reference to the effect of the cases, in so far as they bear directly on the provision now under discussion, will not be out of place.

In an oft-cited case, Lord Esher expressed the opinion that the effect of this provision was that the servant was always entitled to recover if he gave information of the defect. Thomas v. Quartermaine (1887) L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 685, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 840, 57 L. T. N. S. 537, 35 Week. Rep. 555, 51 J. P. 516. Bowen, L. J., did not refer specifically to this point in his celebrated opinion, but the theory upon which he and Lindley, L. J., proceeded in giving judgment against the plaintiff, viz., that the maxim was, under the circumstances, a bar to the action, necessarily implies a disapproval of the doctrine that the right of recovery became absolute as soon as the servant had made a complaint to the proper person.

In another case, decided in the same year, Lord Esher remarked that it was very difficult to give a sensible construction to the provision, and enunciated a view somewhat different from that intimated in the earlier case, holding the meaning of the words to be that, if the servant did give notice, and the defect was not remedied, he might recover unless he was brought clearly within the maxim. Yarmouth v. France (1887) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 647, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 7, 36 Week. Rep. 283. The 57 L. R. A.

plaintiff's action was held by the majority of the court to be maintainable, and the fact that Lindley, L. J., who had concurred with the views of Bowen, L. J., in Thomas v. Quartermaine, agreed in the judgment, and that he did not give any intimation that his views had undergone a change since the earlier case was decided, shows that he did not intend to go to the length of holding that the servant had done everything that was required to give him an indefeasible right of action when he had given notice of the defect. The subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325, 60 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 683, 65 L. T. N. S. 467, 40 Week. Rep. 392, 55 J. P. 660, also falls short of the extreme theory suggested by Lord Esher in Thomas v. Quartermaine, as it simply decides that the servant does not forfeit his right of action merely because he goes on working after remonstrating against the manner in which the master's appliances are used. The testimony on the record was that one of the plaintiff's fellow workers had, in his hearing, complained to the foreman of the danger of alighting stones over their heads with the crane, and that he himself had told the crane-driver that this was not safe. But in the various opinions delivered these facts were referred to merely as evidence tending to show that the servant was fully aware of the risks he was running. The question whether the servant, by giving notice of the abnormal danger, acquires an absolute right to recover damages for such injuries as he may thereafter sustain from the existence of those conditions, was not discussed.

In Alabama it has been held that, in order to fulfil his statutory duty as to the reporting of a defect, a servant must notify either the master himself or the employee whose specific function it is to see that the instrumentality in question is kept in proper condition. It is not sufficient to notify a superior servant who is not entrusted with that function. Thomas v. Bellamy (1899) 126 Ala. 253, 28 So. 707. The rule is possibly more favorable to the servant in Ontario, though the point has not been directly raised in any case that has come to the writer's notice. In Sim v. Dominion Fish Co. (1901) 2 Ont. L. Rep. 69, Armour C. J. O. said that if the servant's right of action had depended on the statute it would have been necessary to send the case to a jury in order to determine whether a superior employee knew of the defect,—a remark which may, perhaps, be construed as an intimation that a notification to any superior employee would have been sufficient.

Cook, J., dissenting:

The decision of the court is made to turn upon the fellow servant act of 1897, which is quoted in full in the opinion. The construction placed upon that act, in my opinion, is not warranted by its text, or the remedy intended to be provided by the legislature which passed it. So I will first peruse and consider the act in respect of the remedy intended. The rule for construing a remedial statute, as taught by Mr. Blackstone, is that there are three points to be considered,—the old law, the mischief, and the remedy; that is, how the law stood at the making of the act, what the mischief was for which the old law did not provide, and what remedy is provided to cure the mischief. To illustrate his meaning, he instances the restraining statute of 13 Eliz. chap. 10. "By the common law," he says, "ecclesiastical corporations might let as long leases as they thought proper. The mischief was that they let long and unreasonable leases, to the impoverishment of their successors. The remedy applied by the statute was by making void all leases by ecclesiastical bodies for longer terms than three lives or twenty-one years." Applying this rule in construing the act, we find the law (made by judicial construction) to have been: First, that, where an employee of a railroad company was injured by the negligence of a fellow servant, the common employer was not responsible for the injury; and, second, that there was no statute or judicial ruling in this state by which an employee could be prevented from contracting with a railroad company to waive his right of action for injuries resulting from defects in the machinery. The mischief to be remedied was to release a fellow servant from his responsibility for the negligence of a fellow servant; and, second, to secure to the employee the right of action for injuries inflicted on account of defects in the machinery. The remedy applied by the statute is to create a liability upon the railroad company in favor of an employee for injury inflicted by the negligence of a fellow servant, and to declare null and void any such contract or agreement, express or implied, made for the purpose of waiving the right to maintain an action (1) for injury resulting from the negligence of a fellow servant, and (2) for injuries resulting from defects in the machinery. An analysis of the statute shows two propositions: (1) To change the relationship existing between fellow servants, and make them vice principal as to each other with respect to injuries resulting on account of their negligence, carelessness, or incompetency, and to prevent them from forfeiting their right of action by contract. (2) To prevent an employee from waiving his right of action for injuries received on account of defects in the machinery, ways, or appliances; or, in other words, a right of action accrues to a fellow servant, and the right to waive either action by any employee is forbidden. These relations being established by the statute, the liability of the railroad company as to furnishing safe and suitable machinery, ways, and appliances, and the relationship of the employee and his assumption of risks in the performance of his work, remain unchanged. So I do not understand that it is within the purview of the statute to exempt an employee from responsibility for negligence in the use of safe machinery, or to license him to voluntarily assume unnecessary risk or hazard at the expense or upon the responsibility of the railroad company; for, if danger or peril exists in the performance of a service, it becomes obvious first to the employee, and frequently arises suddenly and unexpectedly, and he is under no obligation to the railroad company to incur it. Nor is the railroad company under a legal obligation to be ever present with its employee, and to exercise for him that good judgment and common sense in avoiding hazard while performing service which he assumed to have in accepting employment in a service which he knew to be accompanied with much danger, and liable to various accidents. The railroad company necessarily sees through the eyes of its employees, and a proper performance of its service and duties is dependent upon their eyes, good sense, and judgment. Whether machinery, ways, and appliances are sound or defective depends upon the knowledge and skill of its officers and employees, upon whom there must rest an obligation to make known and have remedied such defects when discovered, as well as to inspect them before and during use for the security of themselves as well as those using them. When once placed in the hands and under the control of an employee, it is through his eyes, above all others, that the company must rely for the detection of defects, and from whom information of the same should be obtained. Nor do I understand that it is within the purview of the statute, either by expression or intentment, to abrogate the doctrine of assumption of risk,—Volenti non fit injuria. From the nature of the employer corporation, it is compelled to operate through and depend upon its officers and employees. Each employee becomes a vice principal as to the service under his absolute control, and, if defects exist in the machinery intrusted to him, or become apparent thereafter, it is his duty to his employer, as well as to himself, to make it known, and to use his best offices to have them remedied. His failure to give information of such defects leads the employer to assume that none exist to the great hazard of its property and service. But, should he continue in the use of such, knowing the defects, and failing to give the employer an opportunity of making the remedy, then he does so knowingly and willingly, and must be considered to have undertaken to run the risks incident thereto.

Defendant company exhibited to the court, as a part of the case on appeal, a photograph of the engine and tender upon which the accident occurred. It appears therefrom, as explained by the evidence recited in the record (the tender when backing being in front, I shall speak of the rear end of the tender as the "front"), that there was a platform upon the "front" of the tender, 6 inches wide, extending the width of the tender across the railroad track, and being about a foot or 16 inches from the ground or sills upon the track. This was a safe place for plaintiff, and was provided with a hand-hold; but it was not a comfortable place to stay and signal the engineer, as he would have to stoop over to see him, or by peeping around the corner. Above this platform or step was a tool box, and, with the lid shut down, was about 2 feet wide, and was a safe place to stand, and perfectly convenient in signaling the engineer. The way provided for getting up on this tool box was a step on the side of the tender, about 2 feet 4 inches from the ground. There was no grab iron there on the tender, and it was on that corner of the tender where the drainpipe extended out. The drainpipe was not used for, and was known to be unfit to be used as, a grab iron; but plaintiff had used the one on the opposite side three hundred times, and this one not so often (two or three times), and had never examined to see if it was sound or securely fastened; but, if it were, it would hold 1,000 pounds. Plaintiff, when injured, was not getting up on the tool box from the side of the tender where the grab iron should have been for that purpose, but was getting up from the platform (provided for his use, and in "front" of the tender) upon the tool box, and in doing so used for his support the drainpipe, which broke out, and he fell backwards upon the track in "front" of the moving tender, and was injured, before he could get outside of the rails, by one of the wheels running over his arm and otherwise doing him harm. Plaintiff was the yard conductor, having under his control the engineer and another employee. He was experienced in the railroad service, and for over two years had occupied the same position, and well knew the safe and unsafe methods of performing his service.

Now, then, with this understanding of the statute, and the burden of plaintiff's case resting upon the fact that there was no grab iron on the side of the tender, and that his injury resulted from the lack of such at that place, I shall briefly consider what I take to be the main question presented in this case: Was defendant company negligent in not putting a grab iron on the side of the tender before delivering the engine and tender to plaintiff for his use in its service? Plaintiff says his injuries resulted from the breaking of a defective drainpipe (used as a substitute for the grab iron) while he was undertaking to mount upon the tool box. He was not mounting from the side of the tender where the grab iron was necessary for that purpose, for, had he chosen that mode,—which was the proper one,—and used the drainpipe, and fallen, his fall would have been outside of the track, and the wheels could not have injured him. But he was mounting from the platform (or step) in "front," with his back to the middle of the track, and undertaking to get upon the tool box from that direction, and in doing so used the drainpipe for his support, which broke out, and he fell in "front" in the middle of the track, and was injured by the moving train before he could get out of the track. Had he undertaken to mount from the side of the tender, this injury could not have occurred; but, having undertaken to mount from the "front," from which position no appliances were required to be fixed for mounting, and in a way not contemplated or suggested by the structure of the machine or the provisions made, his injuries did not result from the neglect of the defendant in failing to put grab irons on the engine, and I think his honor erred in not instructing the jury, as prayed by defendant, "that upon the whole evidence, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, there is no sufficient evidence to go to the jury of any defective appliance, so far as the want of a grab iron is concerned, except that of which the plaintiff accepted the risk of continuing in the service of the defendant after full knowledge of such defect," to which defendant excepted, and assigned as error.

When this case was last before the court (123 N. C. 534, 39 S. E. 43), I simply entered my dissent, because the opinion of the court was filed so late that I did not have time thereafter to complete my opinion, which I was preparing, and was unwilling to delay the case on that account; and now again I find myself, in the press of other business before the court, similarly situated.

Montgomery, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the court. It can serve no useful purpose for me to write anything further in the matter, and I content myself with the dissent entered by me in the case on its first trial, and reported in 123 N. C. 534, 39 S. E. 43.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Missouri, Respt.,

v.

John HAMEY, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

NOTE.—As to the doctrine that the jury in a criminal case are judges of the law, see, in this series, State v. Burbee (Vt.) 19 L. R. A. 145.

As to the determination by jury of the punishment of a convict, see also People ex rel. Bradley v. Illinois State Reformatory Bd. of Managers (Ill.) 23 L. R. A. 139, and Miller v. State (Ind.) 40 L. R. A. 109.

transfer of criminal cases from a division of the appellate court to the court in banc on motion of the losing party when a judge dissents from the opinion applies in favor of the state; and the rule that in such cases the state is not entitled to a review of a judgment of the trial court, except in special cases allowed by statute, is not applicable.

ishment of a convict, see also People ex rel. Bradley v. Illinois State Reformatory Bd. of Managers (Ill.) 23 L. R. A. 139, and Miller v. State (Ind.) 40 L. R. A. 109.

2. The adoption of a new constitution preserving the right of trial by jury "as heretofore enjoyed" does not include the right, which has existed by statute for many years, of having the jury assess the punishment in criminal cases whenever there is an alternative or discretion in regard to it.
3. It was no essential part of a jury trial at common law that the jury should also fix the punishment if they convicted the prisoner.
4. The assessment by the jury of the punishment in a criminal case when the statute imposes that duty on the court does not vitiate the verdict, but the court may ignore it and assess the punishment itself.
5. A defendant in a criminal case cannot complain of error in the admission of evidence which he himself draws out.
6. That the act was accomplished by force will not prevent a conviction under a statute making it a felony to have carnal intercourse with an unmarried female of previously chaste character between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years.

(Sherwood and Marshall, JJ., dissent.)

(March 29, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Buchanan County convicting him of violating the statute against carnal knowledge of unmarried females. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Culver & Phillip, for appellant:

The indictment does not charge the defendant with any offense, and the court therefore erred in overruling the motion to quash the indictment and the motion in arrest of judgment.

The allegation that the defendant "did unlawfully . . . have carnal knowledge of Jessie Champagne, an unmarried female," is equivalent only to the statement that she was unmarried at the time the indictment was written. She may have been unmarried then, though married at the time of the unlawful intercourse.

Bishop, Crim. Proc. 3d ed. § 410, p. 256.

Mo. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1838, is unconstitutional in that it deprives the accused of the right of trial by jury as guaranteed by Mo. Const. art. 2, § 28.

4 Bl. Com. bk. 361.

When the Constitution of 1875 was adopted it was provided that the "right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate."

Mo. Const. art. 2, § 28.

This means, if it means anything at all, the right of trial by jury as enjoyed in this state at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

The duty of the jury in all felony cases, without exception, prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, was to assess the punishment.

Foote v. State, 7 Mo. 502; Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich. 448, 5 N. W. 635.

Nor can it be said that the constitutional provision does not apply to the offense charged in the case at bar because the statute creating it was passed after the adoption of the Constitution. The offense is a felony, and the constitutional provision applies to all felonies.

Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 426; Colon v. Lisk, 153 N. Y. 188, 47 N. E. 302.

Nor can it be urged that, though that portion of the statute which prescribes that the court shall fix the penalty is void, it is separable from the remainder of the section, which, therefore, should be held valid.

State v. Bookstruck, 136 Mo. 353, 38 S. W. 317; Landis v. Vineland, 54 N. J. L. 75, 23 Atl. 357.

The court should direct a verdict for either party where the facts are undisputed and the witnesses unimpeached, or where the verdict, if returned for the opposite party, would be set aside as against the law and evidence,—and this though there be a scintilla of evidence.

Morgan v. Durfee, 69 Mo. 476, 33 Am. Rep. 508; Adams County Bank v. Hainline, 67 Mo. App. 487.

Where the testimony is contrary to the daily experience of common life, or at war with the conceded and indisputable physical facts, neither courts nor juries can, without stultifying themselves, yield to it an iota of probative force or effect, and a verdict based upon such testimony will not be permitted to stand.

The right of trial by jury, vouchsafed by the Constitution, is not limited to the right of trial by jury as known to the common law.

The constitutional guaranty that "the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate" applies as well to all newly created felonies as to those in existence when the present Constitution was adopted.

Mr. Edward C. Crow, Attorney General, for respondent:

The declaration in the bill of rights (Mo. Const. art. 2, § 25), that the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate, means that all the substantial incidents and consequences which pertained to the right of trial by jury at common law are beyond the reach of hostile legislation, and are preserved to their full extent as then enjoyed.

The state Constitutions do not extend the right of trial by jury; they only secure it in cases in which it was a matter of right before.

Assessment of punishment by jury is not an essential element of right of jury trial at common law.

The jury at common law was the trier of fact.

State v. Bangor, 41 Me. 533; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 8th ed. § 934.

The common-law jury trial was intended to be preserved by the Constitution, and it is beyond the power of the general assembly to impair the right or materially change its character.

State ex rel. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. v. Withrow, 133 Mo. 519, 34 S. W. 245, 36 S. W. 43; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 20 Am. Rep. 194; East Kingston v. Towle, 48 N. H. 64, 2 Am. Rep. 174, 97 Am. Dec. 575; People ex rel. Murray v. New York City & County Justices, 74 N. Y. 406.

One of the characteristics of the jury trial at common law was that usually the jury simply determined the fact of guilt or innocence and the court assessed the punishment.

1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 934.

Suppose that in certain classes of felonies the territorial statutes had provided that the courts should assess the penalty, would it be contended that after the adoption of the Constitution the general assembly could not provide by statute that the jury should find the facts and assess the penalty? This very question has been passed upon, and it has always been held that such statutes are constitutional.

State v. Bean, 21 Mo. 269; State v. McQuaig, 22 Mo. 320; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 934; Rice v. State, 7 Ind. 332; State v. Hookett, 70 Iowa, 442, 30 N. W. 742.

It is constitutional to divide the responsibility of the assessment of the punishment between the judge and jury.

State v. McQuaig, 22 Mo. 320; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 934.

Even if the court should hold that the general assembly cannot authorize the court to assess the punishment in this class of cases, yet it is well settled that a part of an act may be constitutional and another portion unconstitutional, and the valid part separated from the invalid and maintained, unless the act shows on its face that the general assembly would not have passed it except as with the invalid portion attached.

State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo. 353, 38 S. W. 317; St. Louis County Ct. v. Griswold, 58 Mo. 199; State ex rel. Crow v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. 152 Mo. 49, 45 L. R. A. 363, 52 S. W. 595.

Delay in making complaint simply goes to the credibility of the testimony.

State v. Marcks, 140 Mo. 662, 41 S. W. 973, 43 S. W. 1095; State v. Wilcox, 111 Mo. 574, 20 S. W. 314; State v. Owen, 78 Mo. 368; State v. Emery, 76 Mo. 348; Seaton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 55 Mo. 416; Withhouse v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 64 Mo. 524.

The evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

This court will not reverse a case on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence, simply because a different verdict might very well have been returned under the evidence.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant was indicted in the criminal court of Buchanan county for a violation of Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1838, which was enacted April 8, 1895 (Mo. Laws 1895, p. 149). That act provides that "if any person over the age of sixteen years shall have carnal knowledge of any unmarried female, of previously chaste character, between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years of age, he shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of two years, or by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than one month or more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court." The defendant was duly arraigned, and entered his plea of not guilty. At the November term, 1901, of said court, he was tried by a jury duly impaneled, which returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty, and assess his punishment at imprisonment in the county jail for a term of one month, and a fine of $500." And, his motions for new trial and in arrest having been overruled, the court sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the county jail for one month, and to pay a fine of $500. From that sentence he appeals. On a hearing of said appeal in division No. 2 the judgment of the criminal court was reversed, but, one of the judges dissenting, the cause, on motion of the attorney general, was ordered transferred to the court in banc, and it has been again argued at length.

1. When the cause was reversed in division No. 2 of this court, it was accompanied with an order of discharge. After the order was made transferring the cause to the court in banc, the defendant filed his motion to strike the same from the files, because, as he alleged, the Constitution did not confer upon the attorney general the right to have said cause transferred after a judgment by division No. 2 in favor of defendant's discharge. The argument is that as the state is not entitled to an appeal or to a review of a judgment rendered in the trial court, except in those instances expressly allowed by statute, it follows that it can have no right to have the judgment of an appellate court reviewed unless that right be expressly given. This contention ignores the amendment to the Constitution of this state which was adopted at the general election in November, 1890. Section 1 of that amendment confers exclusive cognizance of all criminal cases pending in the supreme court upon division No. 2 thereof, provided that a cause therein may be transferred to the court in banc as provided in section 4 of said amendment. Const. art. 6, Amend. 1890. Section 4 provides that, "when a judge of a division dissents from the opinion therein," "the cause on the motion of the losing party shall be transferred to the court in banc for its decision." Here, then, is the express authority in the organic law for removing the cause into the court in banc. It is not, however, an appeal. The provision was designed to give a losing party in either division of the court a hearing, under the conditions specified, by the whole court in banc. It has been uniformly ruled that the state was entitled to the same benefit of this provision as any other party. State v. Marks, 140 Mo. 650, 41 S. W. 973, 43 S. W. 1095. We are unanimously of opinion that the order of transfer made by division No. 2 in this cause conferred jurisdiction of this appeal on the court in banc, and that the judgment of discharge by division No. 2 was thereby vacated, or at least suspended to abide the judgment of the court in banc; and accordingly the motion to strike the cause from the docket is overruled.

Recurring now to the questions arising on this record:

The first proposition advanced by defendant is that Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1838, is unconstitutional, in that it violates §§ 22, 28, and 30 of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri of 1875. Those sections are in these words:

"Sec. 22. In criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person and by counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation; to meet the witnesses against him face to face; to have process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf; and a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county."

"Sec. 28. The right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate; but a jury for the trial of criminal or civil cases in courts not of record may consist of less than twelve men as may be prescribed by law. Hereafter a grand jury shall consist of twelve men, any nine of whom concurring may find an indictment or a true bill."

"Sec. 30. That no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

The first premise assumed by the learned counsel is that "the right of trial by jury at common law meant that one part of the jury's duty was to return into court a verdict, if they found defendant guilty, assessing his punishment as provided by law, or a general verdict of guilty, and thereupon the court fixed his punishment." Citing Bl. Com. bk. 4, p. 361. The text of Blackstone cited does not sustain counsel. On the contrary, that learned author says:

"When the evidence on both sides is closed, and, indeed, when any evidence hath been given, the jury cannot be discharged, unless in cases of evident necessity, till they have given in their verdict, but are to consider of it and deliver it in, with the same forms as upon civil causes, only they cannot, in a criminal case which touches life or member, give a privy verdict. But the judges may adjourn while the jury are withdrawn to confer, and return to receive the verdict in open court. And such public or open verdict may be either general, 'Guilty' or 'Not guilty,' or special, setting forth all the circumstances of the case, and praying the judgment of the court whether, for instance, on the facts stated, it be murder, manslaughter, or no crime at all. This is where they doubt the matter of law, and therefore choose to leave it to the determination of the court, though they have an unquestionable right of determining upon all the circumstances, and finding a general verdict if they think proper so to hazard a breach of their oaths. And if their verdict be notoriously wrong they may be punished and the verdict set aside by attain at the suit of the King, but not at the suit of the prisoner." But the practice heretofore in use of fining, imprisoning, or otherwise punishing jurors, merely at the discretion of the court, for finding their verdicts contrary to the direction of the judge, was arbitrary, unconstitutional, and illegal, and was treated as such by Sir Thomas Smith two hundred years ago, who accounted "such doings to be very violent, tyrannical, and contrary to the liberty and custom of the realm of England." It will be observed there is nothing in this statement that justifies the assertion that at common law the jury had the right to assess the punishment of the prisoner if they convicted him. On the contrary, their verdict was "Guilty," or "Not guilty," and the court fixed the punishment according to the laws in force; and such has been the common understanding of our law writers and courts. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 934; State v. Bangor, 41 Me. 533; United States v. Mundel, 6 Call (Va.) 245, Fed. Cas. No. 15,834; People ex rel. Bradley v. Illinois State Reformatory, 148 Ill., loc. cit. 422, 23 L. R. A. 139, 36 N. E. 78; George v. People, 167 Ill. 447, 47 N. E. 741; Miller v. State, 149 Ind. 607, 40 L. R. A. 109, 49 N. E. 894; Skelton v. State, 149 Ind. 641, 49 N. E. 901.

But, say counsel, whatever the practice may have been or was at common law, when introduced into this state it was soon modified by requiring the jury, if they found a defendant guilty, to assess his punishment within the limits prescribed by law, and that such continued to be the statutory law until the adoption of the Constitution of 1875, when it was provided that "the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate," and hence the statute (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1838) is unconstitutional, because the jury, under said section, is not allowed to assess the punishment, but that duty is imposed on the court. This § 1838 must, of course, be read in conjunction with those general provisions of our statute law which govern in the trial of all prosecutions of felony. Since 1835, at least, the statutes of this state have provided that the courts in certain cases shall assess the punishment. Thus §§ 4, 5, 6, and 7 of article 7 of chapter 138, Rev. Stat. 1845, specify instances in which the court shall assess the punishment. Section 4 of the Revised Statutes of 1845 provides that "where the jury find a verdict of guilty, and fail to agree on the punishment to be inflicted, or do not declare such punishment by their verdict, or assess a punishment not authorized by law or in excess of that fixed by law, and in all cases of judgment by confession the court shall assess and declare the punishment and render a judgment accordingly." Section 5 provides that "if the jury assess the punishment, whether imprisonment or fine, below the limit prescribed by law for the offense for which the defendant is convicted, the court shall pronounce the sentence and render judgment according to the lowest limit prescribed by law." Section 6 provides that "if the jury assess a punishment, whether of imprisonment or fine, greater than the limit prescribed by law for the offense, the court shall disregard the excess and pronounce sentence and render judgment according to the limit prescribed by law in such cases." Section 7 also authorizes the court "to reduce the extent or duration of the punishment assessed by the jury if after it has found the conviction is proper the punishment assessed is greater than under the circumstances of the case should be inflicted." See Rev. Stat. 1845, pp. 883, 884. The same sections are carried forward into the statutes of 1855. See vol. 2, §§ 5-8, pp. 1196, 1197. The same provisions are found in the Statutes of 1865, §§ 5-8, p. 852. The same provisions are found in the revision of 1879. See vol. 1, §§ 1930-1933, p. 323. And also in 1899. See Stat. 1899, vol. 1, §§ 4230-4233, p. 981. And also in the Statutes of 1899 (vol. 1, §§ 2649, 2651, 2652, p. 692). The same provisions are found in the Statutes of 1835. See Rev. Stat. 1835, §§ 4-7, p. 493. These references clearly show that the laws of Missouri have always recognized that it is constitutional to authorize either court or jury to assess the punishment in a felony case. It is to be observed that counsel do not assert that prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1875 it was a constitutional right of defendant to have the jury assess his punishment in that class of felonies in which the punishment ranged from a minimum to a maximum punishment, and vesting a discretion in the jury to fix it within those limits. Certainly there was both under the Constitution of 1820 and that of 1865 a constitutional right of trial by jury, but that phrase was too well understood to admit of such a construction as counsel now places upon the present provision in § 28 of article 2 of the Constitution of 1875. Says Mr. Justice Story in his work on the Constitution (§ 1779): "It seems hardly necessary in this place to expatiate upon the antiquity or importance of the trial by jury in criminal cases. It was from very early times insisted on by our ancestors in the parent country as the great bulwark of their civil and political liberties, and watched with an unceasing jealousy and solicitude. The right constitutes one of the fundamental articles of Magna Charta, in which it is declared. . . . 'No man shall be arrested, nor imprisoned, nor banished, nor deprived of life, etc.,' but by the judgment of his peers or by the law of the land. The judgment of his peers here alluded to, and commonly called, in the quaint language of former times, a 'trial per pais,' or 'trial by the country' is the trial by a jury who are called the peers of the party accused, being of the like condition and equality in the state. When our immediate ancestors removed to America, they brought this great privilege with them as their birthright and inheritance, as a part of that admirable common law which had fenced round and interposed barriers on every side against the approaches of arbitrary power. It is now incorporated into all our state Constitutions as a fundamental right, and the Constitution of the United States would have been justly obnoxious to the most conclusive objection if it had not recognized and confirmed it in the most solemn terms." It will be remembered that this eulogy of Judge Story of "trial by jury" referred to the trial by jury at common law, which did not include the right of the jury to assess the punishment. It will be further observed that neither Mr. Justice Story, nor the framers of the Constitution of the United States or of our own Constitutions, thought it necessary to define what the words "trial by jury" meant. He and they assumed that these words, ex vi termini, meant a trial by twelve men impartially selected from the county in which the alleged crime was committed, who must unanimously concur in the guilt of the accused before he could be legally convicted. A law dispensing with any of these essential requisites, we all concede, would be a denial of the right of trial by jury, and necessarily unconstitutional. Ex parte Slater, 72 Mo. 102. Says Judge Cooley (Const. Lim. 6th ed. 389, 390): "Wherever the right to this trial is guaranteed by the Constitution without qualification or restriction, it must be understood as retained in all those cases which were triable by jury at the common law, and with all the common-law incidents to a jury trial, so far, at least, as they can be regarded as tending to the protection of the accused." In State ex rel. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. v. Withrow, 133 Mo. 500, 34 S. W. 245, 36 S. W. 43, this court, through Sherwood, J., said: "And § 28 of our bill of rights declares that 'the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate,' which means that all the substantial incidents and consequences which pertained to the right of trial by jury are beyond the reach of hostile legislation, and are preserved in their ancient, substantial extent as existing at common law." This language is significant, because Barclay, J., contended that we had adopted the Missouri trial by jury in 1820, and not the English. Now, it is conceded our laws secure to the defendant in a prosecution under this § 1838 a trial by jury, with every common-law incident and protection. These, briefly, were: First. The jury must be twelve men indifferent between the prisoner and the commonwealth. To secure this, challenges must be allowed. Second. The jury must be summoned from the vicinage where the crime is supposed to have been committed. This gives the accused on the trial the benefit of his own good character and standing with his neighbors. Third. The jury must unanimously concur in the verdict. Fourth. The jurors must be left free to act in accordance with the dictates of their own judgment. As the right and duty devolved upon the court at common law to assess the punishment, it is plain this statute does not violate the common-law jury trial, in leaving the punishment to the court. All of these have been accorded to the defendant in this case. The Constitution of 1820 provided "that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," and the Constitution of 1865 retained the same formula. According to Judge Cooley, these words in both of these Constitutions must mean that the right was retained in all those cases which were triable by a jury at common law, and with all the substantial common-law incidents of a jury trial, among which it cannot be maintained was the right to have the jury in a felony case assess the punishment when it was in the alternative, or subject to a scale.

We are thus brought to consider the true signification of the words, "the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate," in the Constitution of 1875. The defendant insists that because for many years prior to 1875 the duty of assessing the punishment had been imposed by our statutes upon the jury when they convicted a defendant, except in those cases in which the law fixed but one punishment, that was one of the rights secured by the Constitution (and such was the view taken in division No. 2 in this case), and hence can never be changed by statute until the Constitution is changed. It will certainly not be contended that prior to the Constitution of 1875 the legislature could not have repealed the general provision which has been in all our revisions from 1845 to the present time, which requires that "in all cases of a verdict of conviction for any offense where by law there is any alternative or discretion in regard to the kind or extent of punishment to be inflicted the jury may assess and declare the punishment in their verdict." There was nothing in the Constitutions of 1820 or 1865 which tied the hands of one legislature so that it could not repeal or modify the acts of its predecessors. It is fundamental, in a system of government like ours, that one legislature cannot pass an irrevocable law. Says Judge Cooley: "The Constitution, in conferring the legislative authority, has prescribed to its exercise any limitations which the people saw fit to impose, and no other power than the people can superadd other limitations. To say that the legislature may pass irrevocable laws is to say that it may alter the very Constitution from which it derives its authority, since, in so far as one legislature could bind a subsequent one by its enactments, it could in the same degree reduce the legislative power of its successors; and the process might be repeated until, one by one, the subjects of legislation would be excluded altogether from their control, and the constitutional provision that the legislative power shall be vested in two houses would be, to a greater or less degree, rendered ineffectual. 'Acts of Parliament,' says Blackstone, 'derogatory from the power of subsequent Parliaments, bind not.'" Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 147; Bloomer v. Stolley, 5 McLean, 158, Fed. Cas. No. 1,559; Kellogg v. Oshkosh, 14 Wis. 624. And again, Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, at page 343, says: "We have said in another place that citizens have no vested right in the existing general laws of the state, which can preclude their amendment or repeal, and that there is no implied promise on the part of the state to protect its citizens against incidental injury occasioned by changes in the law." As the act of the legislature prior to 1875 permitting a jury to assess the punishment in cases when there was a discretion as to kind or length of punishment was a legislative, and not a constitutional, enactment, any subsequent legislature could repeal or amend the same, unless the contention of defendant is correct, that, by the addition of the phrase "as heretofore enjoyed," the people have imposed a constitutional prohibition upon any change in our criminal practice so long as the present Constitution shall survive.

What force and effect are to be attributed to this change in the Constitution in 1875? Fortunately the question is not altogether a new one. In 1870 the people of Illinois adopted a new Constitution, in which they provided that the right of trial by jury, "as heretofore enjoyed," shall remain inviolate. In 1897 the supreme court of that state was called upon to construe the effect of adding the words "as heretofore enjoyed" to the Constitutions of 1818 and 1848, which provided that the right of trial by jury "shall remain inviolate," as did our Constitutions of 1820 and 1865. The construction was invoked in George v. People, 167 Ill. 447, 47 N. E. 741, as to the constitutionality of the act of the general assembly of that state approved June 15, 1895, entitled "An Act in Relation to the Sentence of Persons Convicted of Crime and Providing a System of Parole." Laws 1895, p. 158. Section 1 of said act required the court to impose the sentence, whereas previous to and at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1870 there was a general provision in the Criminal Code of that state which provided that in all cases where the punishment shall be confinement in the penitentiary, if the case is tried by a jury, the jury shall say in their verdict for what time the offender shall be confined, etc. Rev. Stat. 1845, § 168, p. 182, 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. (Ill.) § 629, p. 1409. The prisoner in that case, as has defendant in this, had been tried by a jury of twelve chosen from the county in which the offense was committed, and they had unanimously pronounced him guilty, but, under the act of 1895, had not fixed or assessed his punishment. The court sentenced him according to the act, and on appeal the identical question here raised was presented to the supreme court. There, as here, it was earnestly contended that "the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate" secured to defendant the right to have the jury assess his punishment; but that court held that "the right of trial by jury was the same under the Constitution of 1870 as it was under those of 1818 and 1848." Touching the argument now made, the court said: "It is, however, said that the words 'as heretofore enjoyed' relate to those enjoyed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of 1870. The definition given by Webster of the word 'heretofore,' is, 'in times before the present; formerly.' The word 'heretofore,' as used, evidently relates to the past and, in order to determine the true meaning of the words 'the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed,' it is necessary to go back to the common law of England. When this is done it will be found that the right of trial by jury constitutes certain specified things, which cannot be dispensed with or disregarded on the trial of a person charged with a felony. A jury of twelve men must be impaneled, and any less number would not be a common-law jury. The jury must be indifferent between the prisoner and the people. They must be summoned from the vicinage or body of the county in which the crime was alleged to have been committed. The jury must unanimously concur in the verdict. (This latter is one of the old requirements of the common law.) The final decision upon the facts is to rest with the jury, and the court cannot interfere to coerce them to agree upon a verdict against their convictions. Cooley, Const. Lim. 394. These are some of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution. But under the common law a prisoner on trial for a felony has no constitutional right to have his term of punishment fixed by a jury. At common law the jury returned a verdict of guilty or not guilty, and the punishment was fixed by the court, and governed by the laws in force. 2 Bl. Com. bk. 4, p. 361. It is therefore plain that the rights of the defendant which are guaranteed by the Constitution were not infringed upon or taken from him. In Kelly v. People, 115 Ill. 583, 56 Am. Rep. 184, 4 N. E. 644, a conviction for a second offense was sustained, where the law itself fixed the time the prisoner should be punished by confinement in the penitentiary. If the language, 'the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate,' shall be construed to mean that the system of trial by jury as it existed by statute at the time the Constitution of 1870 was adopted was ingrafted on, and became a part of, the Constitution, as is contended, many embarrassing results never contemplated would follow. When the Constitution of 1870 was adopted the statute provided that juries in all cases shall be judges of the law and fact. Did that provision of the statute become a part of the Constitution, so that it is beyond the power of the legislature to change it? At the time the Constitution of 1870 was adopted the statute required the court, in the trial of both criminal and civil cases, to instruct the jury in writing; oral instructions being prohibited. If the legislature should now pass an act providing that all instructions should be oral, would such an act be unconstitutional? Suppose the legislature should pass an act adopting a new system of impaneling a jury, entirely different from the one in force when the Constitution of 1870 was adopted; would such an act be unconstitutional? Indeed, since the adoption of the Constitution of 1870 numerous changes have been made in the criminal law relating to jury trials. Are these changes all void, under the language of the Constitution, 'as heretofore enjoyed?' Other examples might be given, but they are not required. It is manifest that the language of the Constitution was never intended to confer upon the jury a constitutional right to fix the term of imprisonment on the trial of a person indicted for a felony." Prior to that case the constitutionality of the reformatory act of 1891 was challenged in People ex rel. Bradley v. Illinois State Reformatory, 143 Ill. 413, 23 L. R. A. 139, 36 N. E. 76. Chief Justice Baker wrote the opinion of the court, and on this point said: "Nor is it true that a prisoner on trial for burglary and larceny, or for any other violation of the criminal law, has a constitutional right to have the quantity of his punishment fixed by a jury. At common law the jury either returned a special verdict setting forth all the circumstances of the case, and praying the judgment of the court thereon, or a general verdict of guilty or not guilty. The punishment was fixed by the court, and governed by the laws in force. 2 Bl. Com. bk. 4, p. 361. And in this state and at the present time the penalties for violations of the Criminal Code are in many cases not fixed by the jury, but by the court. Rev. Stat. p. 413, §§ 446, 447 et seq. The constitutional right of trial by jury is limited to the trial of the question of guilt or innocence, and we think there can be no question of the validity of the sections of the statute to which we have made reference in this connection." That opinion was written in 1894,—twenty-four years after the adoption of the Constitution of Illinois of 1870.

In Miller v. State, 149 Ind. 607, 40 L. R. A. 109, 49 N. E. 894, the reformatory act of Indiana was challenged as unconstitutional. Said the court: "But because the jury are not allowed to fix the amount of the punishment which is to be inflicted, it is contended that the reformatory act deprives the accused of a jury trial, in violation of said § 13 of the bill of rights. This very objection to a similar act, under a similar constitutional provision in the Constitution of Illinois, in People ex rel. Bradley v. Illinois State Reformatory, 148 Ill. 422, 23 L. R. A. 139, 36 N. E. 79, was held not good. It was there said: 'Nor is it true that a prisoner on trial for burglary and larceny . . . has a constitutional right to have the quantity of punishment fixed by a jury [and repeating the extract already copied from 148 Ill., 36 N. E., and 23 L. R. A., supra].' The supreme court of Illinois again decided the same way in 187 Ill. 447, 47 N. E. 741, in George v. People. We therefore conclude that the act does not deprive the defendant of a jury trial, in violation of the Constitution." It is significant that § 19 of the bill of rights of the Constitution of Indiana provided that "in all criminal cases whatever the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts," and when the same point was urged in Skelton v. State, 149 Ind. 641, 49 N. E. 901, the court again ruled in the same way, and added additional reasons against it as follows: "We are unable to see that any of these beneficent provisions of the bill of rights is violated by not requiring the jury to fix the punishment. Our statute, it is true, as we have seen, has heretofore provided that the jury shall, in their verdict, name the punishment to be inflicted. But the Constitution makes no such requirement; and that which the statute has done the statute may undo, provided it remain within the bounds fixed by the Constitution. The last act of the legislature controls in case of conflict. Indeed, aside from any statutory requirement, the fixing of punishment cannot be considered as any necessary part of the trial of a cause. When the verdict or finding has determined the existence of the crime charged, the trial is ended, and the punishment to be thereafter inflicted is the sentence which the court pronounces under the law then in force. The fixing of such punishment seems to be a proper function of a court, rather than of a jury,—a matter of judgment, rather than of finding a verdict. Certainly the leaving of this duty to the court, instead of to the jury, as the act in question does, is no invasion of the sacred right of trial by jury. Article 6 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States secures the same right to jury trial in all criminal prosecutions; but it has never been held that the practice in the Federal courts, according to which the court, and not the jury, fixes the punishment, is an infringement of the right of trial by jury guaranteed by the Constitution. Neither is the provision in question a violation of the Constitution, which provides that, 'in all criminal cases whatever, the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts.' Ind. Const. art. 1, § 19. The law, when applied to the facts found, determines the guilt or innocence of the accused, and, in case of guilt, determines the crime committed. Of all this the jury has supreme control, under the Constitution. But the sentence is the judgment of the court as to what, within the statutory limits, ought to be the proper punishment for the crime of which the defendant has been convicted. We do not think, therefore, that the verdict provided for in the new statute is any violation of the Constitution. The right of trial by jury—the right to have the innocence or guilt of the person charged with the crime determined solely by a jury of his peers—is as fully guarded under the present as under the former statute."

The exact formula, "The right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed," used in the Constitution of Illinois of 1870 and in the Constitution of Missouri of 1875, we have not found in any other state Constitution. That of Pennsylvania, adopted in 1874, more nearly approaches it. There the language is (§ 6, art. 1), "Trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate." That of New York (§ 2, art. 1) is: "The trial by jury in all cases in which it has been heretofore used shall remain inviolate." There is, however, practically no difference in their meaning. In Byers v. Com. 42 Pa. 89, Strong, J., said: "It is insisted that this act is repugnant to that clause in the declaration of rights in the Constitution which guarantees 'that trial by jury shall be as heretofore and the right thereof remain inviolate.' The objection is based upon a misconception of what that right of trial by jury was which is protected by the Constitution. The founders of this state brought with them to their new abode the usages to which they had been accustomed in the land from which they emigrated. Among them was trial by jury. . . . Its extent and its privileges . . . were perfectly understood, and in bringing it with them the founders of the commonwealth doubtless intended to bring it as they had enjoyed it. None of the frames of government or Constitutions under which we have lived have contemplated any extension of the right beyond the limits within which it had been enjoyed previous to the settlement of the state or the adoption of the Constitution. No intention to enlarge it appears in the laws agreed upon in England in 1682. Our first Constitution—that of 1776—declared that ‘trials by jury shall be as heretofore,’ the Constitution of 1790 and the amended one of 1838 adopted substantially the same provision. . . . All looked to preservation, not extension. It is the old right, whatever it was,—the one previously enjoyed,—that must remain inviolate alike in its mode of enjoyment and in its extent.” After discussing various cases, such as suits in equity, and various acts to punish petty offenses, in which the right of trial by jury never existed in England, the judge proceeds: “These acts were in force in 1776. In view of them the first Constitution was made, and it declared, not that trials by jury shall be in all cases, but as theretofore. And when that gave place to the later Constitutions they undertook to preserve only that right which had been enjoyed.” In that case the attention of the court was directed to the character of cases in which the right could be demanded, not the incidents of the right itself. In Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich. 443, 5 N. W. 335, it was the essential incident of a right of trial by jury of the vicinage or county which the statute denied, and, of course, it was unconstitutional. In Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 426, it was ruled that felonies were triable by a jury, and new felonies denounced and defined after the adoption of the Constitution must be so tried, “because they belong to the class of cases in which at the adoption of the Constitution such a trial was used.” But no case which our examination has enabled us to find has announced the doctrine that the fixing or assessment of the punishment in a criminal case by the jury was an essential element of a jury trial; but the common law was clearly otherwise, as the authorities already cited, we think, conclusively establish. In every case to which we have had access, when the prisoner has been adjudged to have been denied an essential incident of jury trial it appeared either that there was a denial of his right to trial by jury of the county or vicinage, or that he was denied a jury of twelve, or the jurors were not impartial, or was denied by statute a jury in cases which were so triable at common law.

We reject the argument that the common-law method never obtained in this state as to jury trials. The common law was adopted in 1816 in Missouri. 1 Terr. Laws, p. 436, chap. 154. In Vaughn v. Scade, 30 Mo. 604, Judge Scott says: “The term ‘trial by jury’ was well known and understood at the common law, and in that sense it was adopted in our bill of rights. Of course, the nonessentials of that institution, such as concern the qualifications of jurors, the mode of summoning them, and many other such matters, were left to the regulation of law. The Constitution is preserved in retaining the substance of that form of trial, as it was known and practised among those from whom we have derived it. The subject has undergone examination in other tribunals, and we find them concurring in those views. They unite in declaring that, where there is a constitutional guaranty of the right to a trial by jury, twelve is the number of which the jury must be composed.” When, therefore, the text writers and courts speak of the beneficial incidents of jury trial, they must be understood as referring to those essentials which have already been mentioned, to wit, twelve impartial jurors, indifferent between the state and the prisoner. They must be summoned from the vicinage or county in which the crime is charged to have been committed. They must unanimously agree on their verdict, and must be left free to act in accordance with their oaths and judgment. These were the essentials which the Constitution was designed to preserve, not to extend; and it was the right to a trial by a jury thus organized, and with these incidents, which the framers of the Constitution and the people intended should remain inviolate. When we consider that the guaranty of a jury trial in the Constitution of the United States has never been construed as permitting a jury to assess the punishment, but that the invariable practice has been to require the judge to fix the punishment within the limits of the law, and a large number of our sister states whose Constitutions contain this same guaranty also devolve that duty upon the judges, it is absolutely certain that it was no essential part of a jury trial at common law that the jury should also fix the punishment if they convicted the prisoner. The testimony is too overwhelming to the contrary. If it was not an essential, then, as Judge Scott says in Vaughn v. Scade, it was left to the legislature to determine whether it would require the jury or the judge to assess the punishment where alternative or discretionary punishments are prescribed by law. The jealousy of the English people and our forefathers, and our own, against committing the trial of disputed facts and the determination of the guilt or innocence of an accused to the court, did not extend to the assessment of the punishment, which is prescribed within fixed limits, and would govern either judge or jury in assessing it. The well-merited eulogies upon jury trial are not based upon this right of a jury to fix the amount of punishment, but upon that far greater prerogative of weighing the evidence and passing upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant. Lord Camden, Erskine, Maynard, and Blackstone, who so eloquently commended “trial by jury” as the great birthright of the Englishman,—as “his fence and protection against all frauds and surprises and against all storms of power,”—knew nothing of the system in this state, and some of our sister states, requiring the jury to assess the punishment. Their commendation was of the enlightened common-law system of jury trial, which had been perfected after years of experience, and after English juries had finally triumphed over despotic power and servile judges. It never could have, in our opinion, been intended to tie up the hands of the people themselves, through their chosen representatives, so that no beneficial changes and regulations of the trial by jury could be made as subsequent experience might dictate, as long as the essentials are preserved. As was said in Beers v. Beers, 4 Conn. 535, 10 Am. Dec. 186, it is within the reasonable intendment of the Constitution, so long as the recognized essentials of a common-law jury trial are preserved, to adopt new methods, if the public interests demand such changes; and there is nothing in the Constitution of 1875 which requires the general assembly to forever perpetrate the statutes requiring juries to fix the punishment, where alternative punishments are prescribed. As said by the attorney general, the Constitution is not a grant of powers to the general assembly, but it merely contains certain limitations and restrictions upon it; and, if there is no provision in it that prohibits the general assembly from imposing upon the courts the duty of assessing the punishment prescribed within the limits of the law, then it has the constitutional power to so direct, and the guaranty of the right of "trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed," in and of itself does not prohibit it, as those words simply preserve the right of trial by jury which our former Constitutions had also secured to us.

But I am referred to the decision in Creve Cœur Lake Ice Co. v. Tamm, 138 Mo. 385, 39 S. W. 791, in which division No. 2 of this court held a compulsory reference to a referee for the examination of a long account was not an infringement on the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed. An examination of that case will show that the decision proceeded on the view that inasmuch as the supreme court of this state, as early as 15 Mo. 144, in Nhepard v. Bank of State, had ruled that such a reference did not violate the right of trial by jury guaranteed by the Constitution of 1820, and then the people of this state, with full knowledge of that decision, continued the same language in the Constitution of 1865 and the General Statutes of 1865, and this court in 1874, prior to the adoption of our present Constitution, in Edwardson v. Garnhart, 56 Mo. 85, had held it was not to be presumed, in these circumstances, that by the adoption of the Constitution of 1865 the people intended to change the construction placed by this court on the same statute under the Constitution of 1820, a fortiori the Constitution of 1875 was not intended to do away with compulsory references in proper cases under that statute; and we said: "This, then, was the state of the law when the Constitution of 1875 was framed and submitted to the people of Missouri for adoption. As then understood and construed by the court of last resort in this state, neither the Constitution of 1820, nor that of 1865, prohibited the courts from referring cases without the consent of either party, in the cases mentioned in the statutes. The right to a jury trial then was modified to this extent by this power to appoint referees. . . . These references had been sanctioned by the statutes and the opinions of the supreme court many years before that Constitution was framed, and when the people adopted it they ratified the provision as to jury trial as it had been enjoyed previously thereto, that is to say, they adopted it with the construction already placed upon it; otherwise the words 'as heretofore enjoyed' are utterly meaningless." We submit, that opinion rests upon sound legal grounds. It has been uniformly and consistently ruled that where judicial construction has put a certain meaning on the words of a statute, and then the legislature, in a subsequent act in pari materia, uses the same words, the presumption arises that the legislature intended to express the meaning previously put upon them. McNichol v. United States Mercantile Reporting Agency, 74 Mo. 457; Sanders v. St. Louis & N. O. Anchor Line, 97 Mo. 26, 3 L. R. A. 390, 10 S. W. 595. And especially is this so when revisions of the laws and Constitutions have intervened, and the language construed has been retained. Sanders v. St. Louis & N. O. Anchor Line, 97 Mo. 26, 3 L. R. A. 390, 10 S. W. 595. Outside of the reference to the state of the law at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and to show that it had been the same with regard to references since the admission of the state into the Union, the decision throws no light upon the question for decision.

We hold that the construction put upon the words "as heretofore enjoyed," by the supreme court of Illinois and approved by the supreme court of Indiana and Pennsylvania, is the correct interpretation, and that the act in question (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1838) is not unconstitutional because it permits the court, instead of the jury, to assess the punishment. A verdict of guilty, without assessing the punishment, under our laws, which permit the jury to fix the punishment, is not a failure to find a part of the issue. State v. Foster, 115 Mo. 451, 22 S. W. 468; State v. Robb, 90 Mo. 30, 2 S. W. 1. In State v. Foster, 115 Mo. 450, 22 S. W. 468, it was said: "Among the causes thus alleged in that motion is one claiming that to the jury alone belonged the fixing of the penalty for the crime of which defendant was found guilty. This contention is without foundation." The jury having failed to assess the punishment, it belonged to the court to assess it, and render judgment accordingly. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4230. Wynn v. State, 1 Blackf. 28, confirms this view. In that case the jury returned a verdict "fining defendants $10 each," and it was reversed because the jury did not find them guilty, which, said the court, "is a total neglect of the whole subject-matter put in issue." So that if they had found them guilty they would have responded to the whole issue. Without that finding no judgment could be imposed. So, in State v. Foster, 115 Mo. 450, 22 S. W. 468, had the jury failed to find defendant guilty, the court would have been powerless to punish him; but, having done so, their verdict was ample to sustain the judgment which we affirmed. The office of the jury at common law is to find the truth of disputed facts, not to find the law. That is written for the guidance of court and jury alike. When the jury in a case of felony bring in a verdict of guilty, there is no room or occasion for any waiver by the defendant. The law of this state, which has never been questioned, provides that in such case the court shall assess the punishment and render the judgment. State v. Foster, 115 Mo. 450, 22 S. W. 468. His attempted waiver, in the circumstances suggested would not in the least affect the power of the court to assess his punishment.

It only remains to be added that this statute has been twice construed by this court,—once in State v. Knook, 142 Mo. 515, 44 S. W. 235, in which it was sustained without a suggestion of unconstitutionality, and the defendant sentenced to the penitentiary, and State v. Hall, 164 Mo. 528, 65 S. W. 248, in which the Knook Case was approved.

It needs only to be said that, in the determination of a question of the constitutionality of a law, it is a settled rule for the guidance of the courts that the acts of the legislature are presumed to be constitutional, and it is only when they manifestly infringe on some provision of the Constitution that they can be declared void for that reason. In case of doubt every possible presumption not directly inconsistent with the language and subject-matter is to be made in favor of the constitutionality of the act. Phillips v. Missouri P. R. Co. 86 Mo. 543; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 61 S. W. 171; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 216. With the highest courts of our sister states maintaining the constitutionality of laws like this, it certainly cannot be said to be removed from doubt, even if we do not accord them the meed of unanswerable argument.

2. The act is a general, and not a special, law. It operates equally upon all who violate its provisions, and establishes one mode of punishment for all such. It operates in every county of the state. State ex rel. Crow v. Atna Ins. Co. 150 Mo. 113, 51 S. W. 413.

3. The fact that the jury assessed the punishment does not vitiate the verdict. The court could ignore it and assess the punishment itself, and must be held to have done so by adopting it and rendering judgment. This identical case came before the court of appeals in Harvey v. Com. 23 Gratt. 941, and it was ruled that, although it was the duty of the court to assess the punishment, and it had directed the jury to do so, and the jury had fixed the punishment, yet it did not vitiate the verdict, or the judgment of the circuit court.

4. I find no error in the admission of Mrs. Irwin's testimony as to the declarations of the prosecutrix to her. This was drawn out by the defendant himself, and he cannot complain of error committed at his own instigation and of his own seeking.

5. In the divisional opinion much time is devoted to discussing whether defendant was or was not guilty of rape, and the conclusion was reached that he was not. As he was not indicted for rape, the conclusion absolves the jury and criminal court of having convicted him of a crime of which he was not guilty, and for which he was not indicted. The indictment is bottomed upon § 1838, which prescribes that if a person over sixteen years of age have carnal intercourse with an unmarried female of previously chaste character, between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years, he shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and punished as therein prescribed. It is apparent that within the ages mentioned the female is incapable, under the law, of consenting to the defilement of her person. But it is argued by the able counsel for defendant that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that if they believed defendant had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix against her will and consent, and that such intercourse was had by means of force and violence, and prosecutrix resisted having such intercourse, they should acquit defendant, and instructing that sexual intercourse by a man over sixteen years of age with an unmarried female of previous chaste character, who is between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years, would render him guilty, under this law, whether said act was accomplished by force, or with or without her consent. The learned criminal court unquestionably followed the decision of this court in State v. Knook, 142 Mo. 515, 44 S. W. 235, in which case this statute first received a construction by this court. In that case, as will be seen by a reference to the statement of the facts on page 520, 142 Mo., and page 235, 44 S. W., a young lady had gone to sleep in her own room, in the residence of the defendant, who was her uncle by marriage, and during the night was aroused by the presence of the defendant, who was attempting to get on top of her. "He grabbed her hands and held them over her mouth to prevent her screaming. With his knees he forced her legs apart, and had sexual intercourse with her." On another occasion he entered her room while she was dressing, and told her if she screamed he would kill her, and again forcibly had connection with her. In that case the criminal court instructed the jury that "sexual intercourse with an unmarried female of previously chaste character who is between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years is a violation of the law, with or without her consent." The defendant in that case requested the court to give the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence that the defendant had carnal knowledge of the prosecutrix against her will, and only accomplished the act by the use of force, then the defendant is not guilty of the offense charged, and you must acquit him,"—which the trial court refused. Speaking of this action of the court, this court said: "The instruction asked by defendant was properly refused, for several reasons. In the first it is not the law, as asserted in defendant's first instruction, that, if 'force' be used, this exonerates the force user, when charged with the crime mentioned in the act of 1895, supra." Obviously the criminal court did not err in this case, unless that opinion was erroneous. We cannot agree that there was no evidence of force in that case. Indeed, there is a striking similarity in the character of force used in the two cases. Was the decision in the Knoek Case improperly decided? Clearly the statute itself makes no distinction between sexual intercourse with and without consent, or with and without force. In respect to the matter of consent, it is not a new character of legislation in this state. Thus § 3480, Rev. Stat. 1889 (now § 1837, Rev. Stat. 1899), provided that "every person who shall be convicted of rape, either by carnally and unlawfully knowing any female child under the age of fourteen years," etc.; and it has been uniformly ruled that "carnal knowledge of a female child under fourteen years of age is rape, under this statute, whether accomplished with or without force, or with or without the consent of the child." State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 599, 19 S. W. 86; State v. Meinhardt, 73 Mo. 563; State v. Houa, 109 Mo. 654, 19 S. W. 35; State v. Baskett, 111 Mo. 272, 19 S. W. 1097; State v. Duffey, 128 Mo. 557, 31 S. W. 98; State v. Baker, 136 Mo. 74, 37 S. W. 810; State v. Burries, 126 Mo. 565, 29 S. W. 842. If, as we have so often held, it is competent for the legislature to provide that carnal knowledge of a female child under fourteen shall be rape, irrespective of consent or force, why could it not provide that if a man of over sixteen years of age shall have carnal knowledge of an unmarried female of previously chaste character, between fourteen and eighteen years of age, he is guilty of a felony, "irrespective of force or consent on her part?" But the argument is that the carnal knowledge under § 1838 is merged into the higher crime of rape when the evidence discloses force. 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 7th ed. § 786, says: "The doctrine of merger is applicable to two classes of cases,—the one, where a criminal act falls within the definitions of two or more separate offenses; the other, where offenses are so graded that the less culpable are included in those involving a larger guilt, as shown at § 780 in our last chapter. The general rule is, as there explained, that the prosecuting power may select for conviction any one of these offenses, and the defendant cannot object, though his guilt covers also a larger or different one. . . . Merger in the criminal law occurs where the same act of crime is within the definition of a misdemeanor and likewise a felony, or of a felony and likewise of treason, and the rule is that the lower grade of offense merges in the higher." That is, an act cannot be both a felony and a misdemeanor,—a doctrine which applies only where the identical act constitutes both offenses." Again, in § 791, same volume, he 57 L. R. A.

says: "Subject to whatever exception may be found in the doctrine of merger, . . . a criminal person may be holden for any crime of whatever nature which can be legally carved out of his act. He is not to elect, but the prosecuting power is. If the evidence shows him to be guilty of a higher offense than he stands indicted for, or of a lower, or of one differing in nature, whether under a statute or at the common law, he cannot be heard to complain,—the question being whether it shows him to be guilty of the one charged." In Com. v. McPike, 3 Cush. 181, 50 Am. Dec. 727, the defendant was held to have no just ground of objection to a conviction under an indictment for manslaughter because the facts proved he had been guilty of murder. Our statute expressly permits this in all cases in which there are degrees of crime, and the finding is of a less degree than that charged in the indictment, and a verdict for manslaughter or murder in the second degree will not be disturbed because the evidence shows defendant guilty of murder in the first degree.

But here we are confronted with State v. Woolaver, 77 Mo. 103; State v. Strattman, 100 Mo. 540, 13 S. W. 814, and State v. Lingle, 128 Mo. 528, 31 S. W. 20, all of which follow State v. Ellis, 74 Mo. 385, 41 Am. Rep. 321, in which it was ruled, on an indictment for incest, that, if it appeared that the sexual intercourse had been effected by force, it was rape, and the conviction for incest could not stand. None of these cases, except State v. Ellis, discussed the principle on which this ruling was based, but simply followed it. In that case it is put upon the ground of merger; that rape was the higher crime, and incest the lesser, and the latter was merged in the rape. The correctness of that decision is not challenged. In all of those cases, except the Ellis Case, it was ruled that, before the jury could acquit on the ground that the crime of rape had been shown, the jury must believe that if the defendant were on trial for rape it would be their duty to convict him of that charge; and in each this court held the conviction of the less offense proper, notwithstanding in each the female prosecutrix had testified she was "forced," this court saying that the evidence fell short of making out a case of rape. In State v. Ellis this court cited the following authorities: People v. Harriden, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 344 (a nisi prius case; a prosecution for incest by a father with his daughter); and the trial judge ruled that the statute against incest applied only to cases where the connection was by mutual consent, and, if the connection was accomplished by force, to such an extent as to render defendant guilty of rape, incest was not sustained. And to the same effect is Noble v. State, 22 Ohio St. 541, in which it was also held that emission was an essential in incest,—a doctrine nowhere else recognized in this country. In Croghan v. State, 22 Wis. 444, in a prosecution for seduction, it was held error to instruct the jury that "if the woman ultimately consented to the illicit intercourse the crime was seduction [and not rape], although she consented partly through fear," etc. The court held the woman must be tempted, lured, and led astray through influence and persuasion employed by her seducer until she freely consented, in order to constitute seduction. That the instruction was erroneous as to the proof in seduction, we have no doubt. De Groat v. People, 39 Mich. 124, was decided upon the ground that in incest both parties must consent, under the statute of that state, and as there was evidence of force, it could not be incest. In State v. Thomas, 53 Iowa, 214, 4 N. W. 908, it was held rape and incest could not be charged as a compound offense under the statute of that state; Beck and Day, JJ., dissenting. Whereas in Com. v. Goodhue, 2 Met. 193, the indictment was for rape, and the conviction for incest; the latter being included in the former. In each of these cases it will be seen that the basis of the opinion is that, whatever other crime defendant might be guilty of, he was not guilty of the particular crime of incest or seduction, as the facts would not sustain the statutory definition of those offenses; and the decisions are not referable to the technical doctrine of merger, as defined by Bishop and other law writers. Those cases do not determine that one criminal transaction may not present combinations which leave an election in the state in dealing with the offender. Thus, robbery is larceny aggravated by the fact that the goods are taken from the person of the owner by violence or putting in fear. Bl. Com. bk. 4, p. 243, says: "Open and violent larceny from the person or robbery (the rapina of the civilians) is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting him in fear." In Bonsall v. State, 35 Ind. 462, it was ruled that where one is indicted for larceny, and the evidence shows he might have been indicted for robbery, and therefore the state has arraigned him for a less aggravated crime than that of which he is really guilty, he cannot complain. In Hickey v. State, 23 Ind. 21, the defendant was indicted and convicted for grand larceny, but the proof showed he had committed robbery; and it was argued in his behalf that the conviction was erroneous, but the supreme court held otherwise, saying larceny was included in robbery, and as a general rule "a criminal person may be holden for any crime of whatever nature which can be carved out of his act," citing 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 419, 536, 682; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 410, 675, 707, 966, 973, 993; Lewis, Crim. Law, 450, 455, 466; People v. McGowan, 17 Wend. 386. Applying this principle to the statute before us, and granting that the defendant might have been indicted and convicted for rape, a crime of the most atrocious character, which involved a forcible violation of the person of the prosecutrix,—how can the defendant complain because the state has elected to prosecute him for a violation of her person under this statute, in which it is unnecessary to prove a forcible deflour-

ing of the prosecutrix? In what does it differ from a prosecution for larceny when the proof shows robbery, or for manslaughter when the proof shows murder, or for murder in the second degree when the proof shows murder in the first degree?

Upon mature consideration, we are fully satisfied that the construction given this statute in State v. Knock, 142 Mo. 515, 44 S. W. 235, was correct, and that the criminal court correctly ruled that proof of force did not entitle the defendant to an acquittal, every essential of the crime being otherwise proved; and it follows that State v. Ellis, 74 Mo. 385, 41 Am. Rep. 321, and the cases named which have followed it, should on this point no longer be followed.

As to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury: The testimony of the witnesses was heard by the jury. The jury had an opportunity of seeing them and observing their demeanor on the stand, and it was their peculiar province to weigh their testimony, and believe or disbelieve it. They believed the prosecutrix, and did not believe the defendant's witnesses. The verdict has been approved, also, by the judge of the criminal court, who also had the advantage of seeing the witnesses and observing their manner. We discover no such evidence of prejudice or partiality as would justify us, at this distance, in rejecting the verdict of the jury, and the judgment should accordingly be affirmed.

Robinson, Brace, and Valliant, JJ., concur in toto. Burgess, Ch. J., concurs in the opinion as to the law of the case, but thinks the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further trial upon the ground of the want of substantial evidence to sustain the verdict.

Sherwood, J., dissenting:

This appeal comes from Buchanan county and was taken because defendant was convicted under an indictment bottomed on the violation of the prohibition contained in § 1838, Rev. Stat. 1899, and his punishment assessed at one month's imprisonment in the county jail, and the payment of a fine of $500. The cited section, enacted in 1895, is the following: "If any person over the age of sixteen years shall have carnal knowledge of any unmarried female, of previously chaste character, between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years of age, he shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of two years, or by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not less than one month or more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court." Laws 1895, p. 149. Immediately above the section quoted is § 1837 of the same revision, which reads in this way: "Every person who shall be convicted of rape, either by carnally and unlawfully knowing any female child under the age of fourteen years, or by forcibly ravishing any woman of the age of fourteen years or upward, shall suffer death, or be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than five years, in the discretion of the jury." The section last above mentioned has, with some modifications as to punishment, been on our statute books ever since § 23, p. 170, Stat. 1835, was enacted, and probably before that time. In 1879 § 1253 was enacted, and there an amendment occurred, which so amended § 23, p. 780, Gen. Stat. 1865, as to suffer the awarding of the penalty of death, and also added the words "in the discretion of the jury." Such amendment made the law as it is to-day. But as far back as § 10, p. 639, 1 Rev. Stat. 1855, an offender whose offense was punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not less than any specified number of years, and no limit to duration of such punishment declared might be imprisoned during his natural life, or for any number of years not less than those prescribed. Gen. Stat. 1865, § 10, p. 826; Rev. Stat. 1879, § 1660; Rev. Stat. 1889, § 3955; Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2375. So that those words, "in the discretion of the jury," seem to have added naught to the force and effect of the given section. The pertinency of these prefatory observations, and the citation of the above sections, will appear in the following investigation.

Defendant makes assertion that § 1838 is unconstitutional, in that it deprives defendant of the right of trial by jury as guaranteed by § 28, art. 2, of our state Constitution, which declares: "The right of trial by jury [as heretofore enjoyed] shall remain inviolate." The bracketed words show the difference between a corresponding section and article in the Constitution of 1865 and the section above quoted, and the words added to the latter. It has been ruled respecting these words that whatever was the status of that right at the time the Constitution of 1875 was adopted was the status referred to in that instrument. State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo., loc. cit. 358, 38 S. W. 317, and cases cited; Creve Coeur Lake Ice Co. v. Tamm, 138 Mo. 385, 39 S. W. 791, and cases cited. In Michigan the provision of the Constitution of that state similar to our own is this: "The right of trial by jury shall remain." Const. art. 6, § 27. Under that provision a statute was challenged, as to its constitutionality, which authorized persons charged with cutting timber on state lands to be tried in some county other than that in which the offense was committed. Discussing that statute in the light of that constitutional provision, Judge Cooley characterized the act as not only tyrannical and oppressive, but manifestly in conflict with one of the plainest and most important provisions of the Constitution. Proceeding further, that jurist observed: "The right is to remain. What right? Plainly the right as it existed before,—the right to a trial by jury as it had become known to the previous jurisprudence of the state. Underwood v. People, 32 Mich. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 633. The right is not described here. It is not said 57 L. R. A.

what shall be its incidents. It is mentioned as something well known and understood, under a particular name; and by implication, at least, even a waiver of its advantages is forbidden. If the accused himself cannot waive them, plainly the legislature cannot take them away. The next section of the Constitution repeats the guaranty of this method of trial 'in every criminal prosecution,' and nothing is better settled on the authorities than that the legislature cannot take away a single one of its substantial and beneficial incidents." Swart v. Kimball, 43 Mich., loc. cit. 448, 5 N. W. 635.

At common law the jury impaneled to try a criminal cause could, when finding against the defendant, either bring in a verdict of guilty, whereupon the court fixed the punishment, or else make a special finding of facts, and leave the result of determining the fact of guilt, and also of fixing the duration or amount of the punishment, to the court. To use the language of Blackstone in regard to the verdict in such cases, where he says: "And such public or open verdict may be either general, 'Guilty' or 'Not guilty,' or special, setting forth all the circumstances of the case, and praying the judgment of the court whether, for instance, on the facts stated, it be murder, manslaughter, or no crime at all. This is where they doubt the matter of law, and therefore choose to leave it to the determination of the court, though they have an unquestionable right of determining upon all the circumstances, and finding a general verdict, if they think proper to so hazard a breach of their oaths; and, if their verdict be notoriously wrong, they may be punished and the verdict set aside by attain at the suit of the King, but not at the suit of the prisoner." 4 Bl. Com., Lewis's ed. 361. And under the common law a defendant on trial for a felony had no constitutional right to have the measure of his punishment fixed by a jury. 2 Hale, P. C. 310. Not only was a prisoner at common law denied the right of having the measure of his punishment determined by a jury, but, even when the jury found a verdict in favor of the accused, such verdict was liable to be set aside, if, in the opinion of the trial judge, it was "notoriously wrong," and the jury were punished and their verdict set aside by attain at the suit of the King, but not at the suit of the prisoner, in case of his conviction. Such was the right of trial by jury in its sum total, in its tout ensemble as it was known, practised, and existed at common law. Was there any change in this state in regard to that right, and in the methods of its practice as known and practised at common law? Yes; changes most radical were effected at least as early as the Statutes of 1835, which provided: "Where the jury find a verdict of guilty, and fail to agree on the punishment to be inflicted, or do not declare such punishment by their verdict, or assess a punishment not authorized by law, and in all cases of judgment on confession, the court shall assess and declare the punishment, and render judgment accordingly." Rev. Stat.

1835, § 4, p. 493; Rev. Stat. 1845, § 4, p. 883; 2 Rev. Stat. 1855, § 5, p. 1196; Gen. Stat. 1865, § 5, p. 852. And the statutes since 1825 have fixed the punishment to be awarded for murder in the first degree. 1 Rev. Laws 1825, § 3, p. 282; Rev. Stat. 1835, § 3, p. 168; Rev. Stat. 1845, § 3, p. 344; 1 Rev. Stat. 1855, § 3, p. 559; Gen. Stat. 1865, § 3, p. 778. That punishment is death, and has so continued down through every subsequent revision. That punishment is assessed by the law, and with its assessment neither jury nor court have any hand or concern whatever. And for this reason it is a matter wholly irrelevant to the present discussion to examine what the court could do under the territorial laws in regard to fixing the punishment in murder and rape cases. Such investigations savor too much of the last year's bird's nest theory. As well might we go back to the French laws that prevailed in this country prior to the "Louisiana purchase." The common law, in its right of trial by jury, has never prevailed in this state, so far as our Reports and statutes show; certainly not since 1835. Since that period such a verdict as a special verdict in a criminal case, as above described, or the setting aside of a verdict by attainat at the suit of the state, when in favor of a defendant, because "notoriously wrong," and the punishment of a jury for returning such wrong verdict, have never been known in this state. And yet those things were part and parcel—were but incidents and concomitants—of the right of trial by jury as known and practised at common law.

With matters in this statutory posture; with the duties of a jury in returning a verdict, and of the court when such verdict should be returned, firmly and explicitly established by positive law; and with our jurisprudence in regard to such matters settled by not infrequent decisions of this court, — the Constitution of 1875 was adopted. What does that Constitution say touching the point in hand? It says: "The right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate." Enjoyed where, when, or how? Enjoyed as it existed at common law? Enjoyed as it existed in England? Enjoyed as it existed when this state was a territory? The bill of rights does not thus declare. Had it been intended that that right was to be measured and defined by its definition and limitations as known and existing at common law, then the framers of our bill of rights were singularly unfortunate in their use of language. Had they designed to perpetuate the right as it existed at common law, they would have so declared in terms too plain to be misunderstood. They said "as heretofore enjoyed." Enjoyed where? Why, here in Missouri, and not in any foreign country. Enjoyed as it had been laid down in our statutes and expounded in our frequent decisions prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1875. That is what was meant, and only that. And this court has so decided in State v. Bookstruck, 136 Mo., loc. cit. 358, 38 S. W. 57 L. R. A.

317. For sixty-seven years the right of trial by jury has been enjoyed in this state as pointed out in our statutes and practised in our courts, and now at this late day we are gravely told that, in spite of nearly three quarters of a century of statutory definition and judicial practice and exposition, the legislature could, at a word, wipe out all these statutory provisions, wipe out the 28th section of the bill of rights, and restore to full vigor the common-law right of trial by jury, with all its crudities, injustice, and barbarisms. I do not believe it.

In Creve Cœur Lake Ice Co. v. Tamm, 138 Mo. 385, 39 S. W. 791, touching the right of trial by jury, quotation is approvingly made from Eduardson v. Garnhart, 56 Mo. 81, where Judge Vorles said: "It is not to be presumed that the provision of the Constitution relied on was intended to change the law as it then existed, and had been practised in the state for a quarter of a century. The object of the framers of the Constitution must have been to preserve the right of trial by jury as it then existed and had been practised in this state, and not to establish a new rule of practice on that subject." This, then, was the state of the law when the Constitution of 1875 was framed and submitted to the people of Missouri for adoption. As then understood and construed by the court of last resort in this state, neither the Constitutions of 1820 nor that of 1865 prohibited the courts from referring cases without the consent of either party, in the cases mentioned in the statutes. The right to a jury trial then was modified to this extent by this power to appoint referees. These references had been sanctioned by the statutes and the opinions of the supreme court many years before that Constitution was framed, and when the people adopted it they ratified the provision as to jury trial as it had been enjoyed previously thereto; that is to say, they adopted it with the construction already placed upon it; otherwise the words 'as heretofore enjoyed' are utterly meaningless." And it was further said in that case, in concluding the opinion: "As the statute itself is an exception to the right of trial by jury, we shall not extend it by loose construction." If the language just quoted is good law as to a reference case, why not equally good and equally applicable to the case at bar. If not, why not? I take it, then, as twice decided by this court, the Constitution of 1875, upon its adoption, had the effect to perpetuate and place beyond legislative interference any beneficial or favorable incident pertaining to the right of trial by jury as it existed at the time that Constitution was adopted. Among those substantial, favorable, and beneficial incidents pertinent to such right was the coincident right to have the jury assess the punishment in all cases of felony. And, of course, the constitutional provision and guaranty that "the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed shall remain inviolate," would apply as well to all newly created felonies as to those in existence when the present Constitution was adopted. This point has passed into precedent. Thus in the court of appeals of New York it is said: ". . . 'Trial by jury in all cases in which it has heretofore been used shall remain inviolate forever' is broad enough and efficacious enough to secure it. The expression 'in all cases in which it has heretofore been used' is generic. It does not limit the right to the mere instances in which it had been used, but extends it to such new and like cases as might afterwards arise. For instance, felonies were triable only by juries. I do not doubt that all new felonies must be tried in that way, and that by force of this section. . . . The other section does require it, as well in new felonies as in old, because they belong to the class of cases in which at the adoption of the Constitution such a trial was used." Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y., loc. cit. 426. See also Colon v. Lisk, 153 N. Y. 188, 47 N. E. 302.

The attorney general, however, says: "It must be remembered the Constitution of Missouri is not a grant of power to the general assembly, but a restriction; and, if there is no provision in it that prohibits the general assembly from providing for the court assessing the punishment, then the general assembly has the power to do so." But this assertion overlooks the well-settled rule of constitutional construction on this point. An eminent jurist and author says: "Another rule of construction is that, when the Constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition, or to extend the penalty to other cases. On this ground it has been held by the supreme court of Maryland that, where the Constitution defines the qualifications of an officer, it is not in the power of the legislature to change or superadd to them, unless the power to do so is expressly or by necessary implication conferred by the Constitution itself. Other cases recognizing the same principle are referred to in the note. . . . We are not, therefore, to expect to find in a Constitution provisions which the people, in adopting it, have not regarded as of high importance, and worthy to be embraced in an instrument which for a time, at least, is to control alike the government and the governed, and to form a standard by which is to be measured the power which can be exercised as well by the delegate as by the sovereign people themselves. If directions are given respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power should be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only; and we impute to the people a want of due appreciation of the purpose and proper province of such an instrument when we infer that such directions are given to any other end,—especially when, as has been already said, it is but fair to presume that the people, in their Constitution, have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms, corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, and with a view to leave as little as possible to implication." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 78, 79, 93, 94. Touching the same topic, Denio, Ch. J., says: "But the affirmative prescription and the general arrangements of the Constitution are far more fruitful of restraints upon the legislature. Every positive direction contains an implication against anything contrary to it, or which would frustrate or disappoint the purpose of that provision. The frame of the government, the grant of legislative power itself, the organization of the executive authority, the erection of the principal courts of justice, create implied limitations upon the lawmaking authority as strong as though a negative was expressed in each instance." People ex rel. Wood v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 544. These authorities distinctly show that the doctrine of "affirmative specification excludes implication," and that that and the similar rule or maxim of Expressio unius, etc., apply alike to constitutions and to statutes; and so this court has held in Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Graham, 147 Mo., loc. cit. 257, 48 S. W. 910. To the like effect, see Ex parte Joffe, 46 Mo. App., loc. cit. 365, and cases cited.

But it is contended that, even if that portion of § 1838 be held invalid which authorizes the court to assess the punishment, yet that this part may be separated from the rest of the section, and the section, being thus expurgated, could still stand as a valid enactment. In some instances this may be done. Discussing this point, this court said: "Now, nothing is better settled than that part of a law may be declared constitutionally invalid, and yet another portion properly separable therefrom, and therefore unexceptionable in every particular. This may be so even though the sound and unsound are in one section together. This is always the rule unless the parts, sound and unsound, are so mutually related, so blended together, as to constitute an entirety, making it evident that, unless the act be carried into effect as a whole, it could not have received the legislative sanction. Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 34, and cases cited." State v. Bockstruck, 136 Mo., loc. cit. 353, 38 S. W. 317. A similar view was expressed in Landis v. Vineland, 54 N. J. L. 75, 23 Atl. 357. In that case an ordinance created an offense, and prescribed the penalty for its violation. That portion of the ordinance prescribing the penalty was held to be void, and the question presented to the court was whether the residue of the ordinance, declaring what should be an offense, was also invalidated. The court said: "The principle to be applied is that, if part of a law be void, other essential and connected parts are also void; but where that part which is bad is independent, and not essentially connected with the remainder, the latter will stand. . . . In applying this principle the question to be decided is whether it is clear that if the void part of the enactment be obliterated the residue will still express that which the legislature intended to become law, and which is enforceable as law.

In the present case the mayor and counsel ordained that certain acts should be visited with a fine not exceeding $10. Is it clear that they intended that such acts might be visited with a fine of $20? Is it clear that, if they had understood that the penalty might amount to $20, they would have defined the prohibited conduct in the same terms? I think not. The misconduct and the penalty denounced by them must have been connected in their minds as essential parts of a single law. If the court should substitute the statutory penalty for that fixed in the ordinance, a law would be framed which the legislative power has not expressed its intention to enact." Touching this subject an eminent author and jurist observes: "If they are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant the belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and if all could not be carried into effect the legislature would not pass the residue independently, then, if some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected must fall with them." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 211, 212. And in a note to the above the same author very acutely remarks: "It must be obvious in any case where a part of an act is set aside as unconstitutional that it is unsafe to indulge in the same extreme presumptions in support of the remainder that are allowable in support of a complete act when some cause of invalidity is suggested to the whole of it. In the latter case we know the legislature designed the whole act to have effect, and we should sustain it if possible; in the former we do not know that the legislature would have been willing that a part of the act should be sustained if the remainder were held void, and there is generally a presumption more or less strong to the contrary. While, therefore, in the one case the act should be sustained unless the invalidity is clear, in the other the whole should fall unless it is manifest the portion not opposed to the Constitution can stand by itself, and that in the legislative intent it was not to be controlled or modified in its construction and effect by the part which was void." Cooley, Const. Lim. 212. An instance of holding the whole act invalid because of the invalidity of a portion of it occurred in Texas. There a statute made the same provision for taxing telegraph messages sent to points within and to points without the state, and, as it was void as to the latter, it was held wholly void. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, 62 Tex. 630.

In the case at bar it is by no means either clear or probable that the legislature would have enacted the section in dispute unless the clause giving the court the right to assess the punishment had been inserted. Including the various degrees, our Criminal Code of this state defines and punishes over 300 felonies, and in every one of them (except where the punishment is fixed by law, as in murder in the first degree) it is the duty of the jury to assess the punishment; 67 L. R. A.

and the only instance known to our laws where the court has a discretion to assess the punishment is where a violation of § 1838 is prosecuted to a conviction. In every other instance the punishment is to be assessed by the jury, if they agree. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2648. And if they find a defendant guilty, and fail to agree on the punishment or to declare it in their verdict, or assess a punishment not authorized by law, then, and then only, can the court assess and declare the punishment. Id., § 2649. In other cases, where the jury agree, but bring in a verdict below the limit of legal punishment, there the court must raise the punishment to the lowest legal limit. Id., § 2650. Or if the jury in their verdict assess a punishment higher than the legal limit, there the court must fix the punishment at the highest legal limit. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2651. Under Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2652, the court is authorized to reduce the punishment assessed by the jury. These sections have been on our statute books ever since 1835, and perhaps for a longer period, and come down to Gen. Stat. 1865, and are still the law. These statutes heretofore quoted constituted the sum total of the right of trial by jury as understood and practised when the Constitution of 1875 was adopted; and they explicitly delimited the respective provinces of court and jury as to assessment of punishment in criminal cases, and such delimitations became, to all intents and purposes, part and parcel of that Constitution upon its adoption. Considering the fact that, of all the felonies punishable under our statutes, the one denounced in § 1838 is the only one where, the jury not having failed to agree, the court has to fix the punishment, it seems beyond rational belief that the legislature should have so drawn that section, thereby causing it to differ from all our other penal statutes, unless upon the hypothesis of having their intent, aim, and purpose concentrated on the sole design of carrying the act into effect as a whole, whereby the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed should be so far modified that for their discretion should be substituted the discretion of the court, unless, also, as suggested in Landis's Case, 54 N. J. L. 75, 23 Atl. 357: "The misconduct and penalty denounced by them must have been connected in their minds as essential parts of a single law." Considering the litigated section in every possible way, both on reason and authority, the section should be held invalid for the reasons heretofore stated, and that such invalidity, taking its origin in the clause which confers unwarranted discretion on the court, permeates with its poison the whole section, and causes it to fall under the ban of the Constitution.

And just here I wish to make a few additional observations: The assertion has been made that "the change in the tribunal or agency which shall assess the punishment which the law prescribes in no manner deprives the defendant of any of the substantial rights secured by the right of trial by jury as at common law, or as enjoyed under the laws of this state prior to 1875." But this is mere assertion. The one-man power has always been carefully guarded against and restricted both in the civil and criminal statutes, practice, and jurisprudence of this state. But we are not here to inquire whether the allowing of a judge to assess the punishment in a criminal case would be just as fair to the defendant as if assessed by a jury. The question is, What has § 28 of the bill of rights ordained in this regard? But even were we to look at the bill of rights, as contemplated in the assertion just quoted, still the odds would be against the correctness of that assertion. Speaking of the one-man power, and the danger of its unrestricted exercise in determining matters of mere fact by a judge, Judge Cooley, quoting from Blackstone, says: "In settling and adjusting a question of fact, when intrusted to any single magistrate, partiality and injustice have an ample field to range in, either by boldly asserting that to be proved which is not so, or by more artfully suppressing some circumstances, stretching and warping others, and distinguishing away the remainder." 3 Bl. Com. 380." Upon this Judge Cooley remarks: "These are evils which jury trial is designed to prevent." Cooley, Const. Lim. 392, note. Our legislators and our Constitution framers were doubtless aware of the mentioned danger,—of the one-man power,—and therefore carefully guarded every avenue against its stealthy approaches and its insidious advance. Again, the assessment of the punishment to be inflicted is part and parcel of the issue joined between the state and the prisoner. If the verdict omits to find a part of the issue, to wit, the punishment to be assessed, it is as fatal to the validity of the verdict as is the failure to find the accused guilty. Wynn v. State, 1 Blackf. 28, and cases cited; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 1012. So that if, in spite of positive statutory law in existence on our statute books, and practised daily and adjudicated in our courts for forty years, in regard to the right of trial by jury,—a practice sanctioned by its adoption by the Constitution of 1875,—the legislature can take away from the jury the power to find a part of the issue, to wit, the punishment to be assessed, and still that law be constitutional, no reason can be given why a law would not be equally constitutional which should take away from the jury the power to find the other part of the issue, to wit, the guilt of the accused, and leave that, also, to be determined by the court. This is so, and you cannot deny it. Moreover, to further illustrate the point of the assessment of the punishment being a part of the issue, suppose that the jury in an ordinary case of felony should bring in a verdict of guilty; could the prisoner waive the assessment of the punishment by the jury, and successfully call upon the court to assess the same? Certainly not. If, then, the accused could not waive the assessment of the punishment by jury, then, according to Judge Cooley, plainly the legislature could not take it away. Stuart v. Kimble, 43 Mich. 448, 5 N. W. 635.

Having discussed the chief constitutional question involved in this cause, it is proper to take up for examination that feature of the cause which constitutes the main ground on which defendant's appeal is bottomed, to wit, the entire insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. The prosecutrix, as will presently more fully and at large appear, testified to a clear case of rape. Defendant, upon this, and at the close of the testimony, asked this instruction: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant had sexual intercourse with the prosecuting witness, Jessie Champagne, but that such intercourse was against the will and consent of said Jessie Champagne, and was had by means of force and violence used by said defendant, and that said Jessie Champagne resisted having such intercourse, then you will acquit the defendant." Comparing § 1837, supra, with its associate section, 1838, we find that they respectively define totally distinct and independent crimes,—the first, a crime of force, violence, or intimidation, or a combination of all these three; the second, the ordinary instance and illustration of the "irrepressible conflict" where mutual desire seeks and finds its outlet and gratification. But this, the law, where the parties are of a certain age, taboos. There is neither likeness nor similitude between the crimes described in the two sections,—neither as to their ingredients nor their punishments. The highest punishment of the first is death; its lowest, imprisonment for five years; while the highest punishment which can be inflicted under the second is imprisonment for two years; the lowest, one month's imprisonment and a fine of $100. These considerations clearly show that the crime designated in § 1838 is not one of the lower degrees of the crime described in § 1837. If it could be justly thus regarded, it would be only upon the theory that § 1838 applies to all cases of carnal knowledge by a man over sixteen with a chaste unmarried female between the ages of fourteen and eighteen years, whether with the consent of such female, or forcibly and against her will, and that such man, though proved guilty of rape, could be convicted of mere carnal knowledge. And if the offense described in 1838 could be regarded as one of lesser degree than that described in 1837, then it would follow that a man could be indicted under that section, and, on proof of mere carnal knowledge, convicted under § 1838. Nay, more; counts for rape and for carnal knowledge could be united in the same indictment, and a conviction occur as the evidence might turn out to be, while our statute only allows such counts to be united "when by law an offense comprises different degrees," and there the "indictment may contain counts for the different degrees of the same offense." Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2524. Furthermore, if mere carnal knowledge, as designated in § 1838, is one of the degrees of the crime of rape,—if that word is a mere generic term for all sexual offenses,—then a far more comprehensive and far-reaching result would follow than that already announced, because then an indictment could contain counts for rape; for carnal knowledge; for defiling a girl under one's protection, by carnally knowing her (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1845); for seduction (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1844); and for incest (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2172). But such a theory would require great temerity to attempt to maintain it. Especially so as this court has expressly decided that, where rape is proved, incest ceases. State v. Ellis, 74 Mo., loc. cit. 386, 41 Am. Rep. 321, and cases cited. Especially so, as this court has three times decided, in State v. Woolaver, 77 Mo. 103, State v. Stratman, 100 Mo. 540, 13 S. W. 814, and State v. Lingle, 128 Mo. 523, 31 S. W. 20, that, under § 1845, if force be used, there can be no conviction of the offense therein mentioned. Now, if proof of force defeats the indictment under § 1845, and defeats it under § 2172, why does it not logically do so under § 1838? This question suggests the only reasonable answer that can be returned, and that is that it does.

Again, we have statutes declaring, in effect, that a party cannot complain, and is not entitled to a reversal, because not convicted of a higher offense than that with which he is charged, or where he is found guilty of an offense necessarily included in that charged against him. State v. Gates, 130 Mo., loc. cit. 357, 32 S. W. 971, and cases cited and statutes cited. Now, evidently, this court did not consider in Ellis's Case, 74 Mo. 386, 41 Am. Rep. 321, that the crime of incest was necessarily included in the crime of rape, nor that the latter was a higher degree of the same offense, because, had it done so, it must, as of course, have affirmed the judgment of conviction; and the same remark applies to the Woolaver, Stratman, and Lingle Cases, above cited, where this court would evidently have reversed the judgment of conviction had the crime of rape been proved. Tested by these considerations, and tried under these rules, it is difficult to see how a like conclusion can fail of being reached in the case before us. If consent prevents rape, and convicts of incest, or if rape predominates, and prevents conviction of incest, or if rape, intervening, where a guardian defiles his ward by carnally knowing her, prevents conviction under § 1845, how can it with any show of reason be said that having carnal knowledge under § 1838, by means and through instrumentality of rape, authorizes a conviction under that section? How can carnal knowledge obtained without consent defeat prosecution in the two classes of cases before mentioned, and yet fail to do so under the provisions of § 1838? The theory of the state on this point, reduced to its last analysis, renders it possible for the grand jury or the prosecuting attorney to elect under which section (1837 or 1838) the accused shall be prosecuted for the very same act. If the case is pretty strong against him, indict him under § 1837. If the case be regarded weak, indict under § 1838, and then all you have to prove is the carnal knowledge; and if, in doing so, you prove a clear case of rape, this amounts to no defense. Men who are tried for crime must not be too nice as to the number of the section under which they are indicted. What does it concern them whether the last figure of the number of the section is a 7 or an 8? Further, under this head: If the theory of the state be correct, and if it be true that the offense mentioned in 1838 is not one of the degrees of the offense mentioned in 1837, then the state has the option, for the same act, to indict under either section, and, if defeated on the first one, may indict under the second, and vice versa, and a judgment of acquittal would be no bar to a second prosecution under the other section. And just here this additional thought occurs, and presents itself in the form of this query: If the accused must be apprised by the indictment of "the nature and cause of the accusation" (Const. art. 2, § 22), how is this right preserved where he is indicted for one thing, proved guilty of another, and still convicted under the groundless and unproved charge? These remarks bring into view State v. Knook, 142 Mo. 515, 44 S. W. 235, on which the state relies. I am abundantly satisfied, since pursuing the above train of thought in the light of the authorities and statutes cited, that that case, on the point of force being immaterial under § 1838, was erroneously decided, and should no longer be followed. But the error on that point was harmless, since no force was there in evidence, and so the remark was of the obiter variety, but which sometimes is as damaging as a direct out and out ruling. The instruction above mentioned should therefore have been given.

We come now to the predominant reason which induced this appeal, to wit, the utter insufficiency of the evidence to warrant a conviction. The testimony of the prosecutrix, on which alone this prosecution rests, is, in its substance and practical totality, the following: The story of the occurrence, as told by Jessie Champagne, the prosecutrix, is this: At the time of the assault, June 7, 1899, she had passed sixteen years of age. While she was yet an infant, her mother died, and she was reared by Mrs. Mary Irwin, the mother-in-law of the defendant, with whom she lived from the time she was three years of age in a two-room cottage on the farm of Sylvester Hamey, the defendant's father, near Lake Contrary, in Buchanan county. In another house, situated in the same yard, on the same farm, and only 30 yards distant from where Mrs. Irwin and the prosecutrix lived, the defendant, with his wife and three children (the oldest eleven and the youngest three years of age), the defendant's father, and the prosecutrix's father, resided, and were actually present in that other house at the time of the supposed outrage. The defendant was thirty-six years old, and had lived on this farm all his life. The prosecutrix had known him intimately since she was a child. One evening in June, 1899, after supper, Mrs. Irwin went over to the defendant's house to help Mrs. Hamey wash her dishes. It was about 8:30 o'clock, dusk, and getting dark. The prosecutrix was alone in the house. She stood in the front room, combing her hair. Someone entered, "grabbed her around the waist," and kissed her. She jerked herself free, and, turning, recognized the defendant. She ran towards the door, but before she could escape he caught her again, and dragged her to a bed in the room. He threw her upon the bed, and forced a pillow over her mouth. She struggled in vain to free herself. She tried to halloo, but, for the pillow, she could not. Presumably holding the pillow with one hand, and controlling her hands with his other hand, in some manner not clearly explained by the witness, he raised up her clothes, and while she resisted with all her power he ravished her. When he "let her up," the defendant said, "My God, Jess! don't tell my wife," and went over to his own house. The prosecutrix testified that she was a pure, innocent girl; that she had never had intercourse with any man, nor did any man ever attempt to have intercourse with her; and yet she admits that at the time she was raped the doors to her home and to the defendant's home were open; that at the time her foster mother, her father, the defendant's father, and his wife, were in the house in the same yard, not 90 feet away; and though it nowhere appears that "she was under restraint or the influence of threats, or that she apprehended any violence from the accused," she did not, after the pillow was removed from her mouth, and the defendant had departed in peace, halloo or make any outcry, or exhibit the anguish that might with all propriety have been expected from one so pure and innocent; but, on the contrary, she testified that, when defendant left, she went out on the front porch and sat down to cool off. She says she waited there for her foster mother to return, and that "I kept intending to tell her, but I didn't," and the prosecutrix admits that she made no complaint to her, nor to her father, nor to the defendant's wife, nor to any other person, then or at any other time; giving no excuse for her failure to tell her mother; giving as her only excuse for her failure to tell her father, who was only 30 yards away, that she did think she would, but she was ashamed to; and giving as the excuse for failure to complain to the defendant's wife, "Well, I don't know; did not think she would believe it, anyhow." She further testified that she never told her foster mother as to what had occurred; never told a soul until after the child was born, and then she told her foster mother. And she never told her until the latter asked her, "Jessie, who was the cause of this?" And Jessie said "John Hamey." This answer was given in response to the state's question, "Who was the cause?" over defendant's objection and exception on the ground that the answer would be hearsay. After the alleged rape, and down at least to the cornfield incident, three months after the child was born, the same bearing, attitude, and friendly actions which had existed and were customary between defendant and Jessie before the episode of the bed and the pillow in her room on the night in June continued to exist without a break in their uniformity. The wife of the defendant testified, corroborating Mrs. Irwin, the state's witness, that, during all the time that elapsed from the alleged assault until defendant's arrest, she and the defendant and her father-in-law and Mrs. Irwin and the prosecutrix visited each other, and that she never saw any change whatever in the conduct, relations, or feelings that had existed between the prosecutrix and the defendant before the crime. Defendant's family, consisting of a wife and three children, from three to eleven years old, with defendant's aged father, his mother-in-law, the prosecutrix, whom defendant had known all her life, and her father, all continued to live in the same yard together, with no discontinuance whatever in their former amicable relations. They all, including Jessie, continued to visit each other as before, and were, in fact, as one large family. Meanwhile, with all these friendly relations still in statu quo ante, and after the requisite time had elapsed, when signs of motherhood began to be largely and more largely developed, Mrs. Irwin, the foster mother, remarked to Jessie, "It looks funny that you are sick all the time," and she replied, "Oh, ma, you always say something." This conversation occurred along late in the fall, after the affair in June. It furthermore appeared from the testimony of the prosecutrix that, although she and the defendant continued to live within 90 feet of each other, she never spoke to him, nor he to her, about the connection which had taken place between them, until about three months after the child was born. Then, one day, about a year after the incident, the defendant and her father were plowing in the field, and prosecutrix went to defendant there, and asked him to support her child. The two were alone. Responding to this request, defendant denied its being his child; that he had nothing to do with it, and wouldn't support it; and further said, "Oh, no, Jessie, you can't come that." Thereupon the defendant asked Jessie whether she had told her father about the matter, and, when she replied that she had not, defendant suggested that they go and tell him. They went together. The defendant told the father that the prosecutrix had said that he was the father of the child, but that he had nothing to do with it. He refused to pay any money, and then she had him arrested. The witness did not testify, nor is there any evidence in the case, that, as a result of the outrage committed upon her, she was lacerated, or that she bled, or that her person was scratched or showed any marks of violence, or that any of her clothing was disordered or torn, or that she cried, or gave any signs of the physical condition and mental agitation which, by all the immutable laws of nature, must follow upon a rape of a resisting virgin, and such as would naturally be expected from a woman so fully wronged. This is the state's entire story. No other witness was introduced to prove, by fact or circumstance, the guilt of the defendant. In addition to that, the prosecutrix was contradicted by defendant (who established an excellent reputation) as to what had occurred in her room in June, 1899, and contradicted by Mrs. Irwin and defendant's wife in many important matters, aside from her testimony as to the June occurrence, and contradicted by other witnesses as to the other important statements of hers. It will have been observed that the prosecutrix had never, by word, sign, or syllable, indicated to a single human being that she had been ravished. She never even said so when she went to defendant in the cornfield. She only asked him to support her child. Now, if defendant had really ravished her, it would have been the most natural thing in the world for her to have indignantly gone to him, and charged that he had forcibly despoiled her of her virtue, pillaged her of her chastity, and accomplished her ruin. Instead of that, however, she says nothing of outrage committed and chastity lost. At that time she appears to have been unaware of either loss of virtue or of honor outraged. Her only concern was of a financial nature,—to receive funds to support the child; and, when defendant denied its paternity and refused it support, she had him arrested. And not until she went on the witness stand in court did she declare she had been ravished. And in this case at no time does prosecutrix even so much as intimate that she was threatened by defendant if she told what had occurred, or that she was in any way intimidated by him.

It is believed that no instance can be found in the books where a prosecutrix has been allowed to testify against an accused party, charging him with rape upon her, after so long and unexplained a delay has occurred with every opportunity to make complaint, and without a single excuse to urge or offer for the delay, nor why complaint was not made at an earlier period, and without a single circumstance of fear, threat, or intimidation to prevent a prompt and full disclosure. More than that, the prosecutrix stands without a particle of corroboration, either as to immediate complaint made, the torn and disordered condition of her hair or clothing, scratches or bruises on her person, or that she was in tears or great mental distress, or even that the ravisher fled for it. And on top of that she is contradicted by Mrs. Irwin, her foster mother, as to whether prior to the assault she "kept company" with other young men; Mrs. Irwin affirming, prosecutrix denying. In this she was contradicted, also, by John McComb and Ernest Bally, who testified on behalf of defendant that they did "keep company with her," and had had sexual intercourse with her, prior to the time of the alleged assault by the defendant. And these two witnesses are corroborated by Mrs. Irwin, who also testifies that the prosecutrix did "keep company" with McComb, and that Bally was her frequent companion 57 L. R. A.

and sweetheart. In another important matter the prosecutrix was impeached. She testified that prior to the alleged assault the defendant "would never keep his hands to himself;" that he would pinch her, and feel of her bosom, and attempt to kiss her in the presence of his wife, and, when she would remonstrate with him, his wife would say, "Oh, you are too touchy." In this she was contradicted not only by defendant, but also by defendant's wife. The defendant, in order to establish that prosecutrix was not a female of "previous chaste character," introduced three witnesses,—Charles Dodd, John McComb, and Ernest Bally,—who testified that they had had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix before June 7, 1899. Each of them gave time, place, and circumstances under which the prosecutrix had submitted to their desires. All three of them had resided near Lake Conrary for a number of years. At the trial there were present a large number of representative citizens, who had lived in the same vicinity for years,—witnesses as to the reputation of the defendant,—who must have known Dodd, McComb, and Bally. Yet no attempt was made by the state to attack the character or impeach the testimony of any of them; and their testimony is not contradicted, except by the prosecutrix herself, who contented herself with the mere statement that she had never had sexual intercourse with any of them.

It is thought proper to give here some instances where the courts have held the evidence wholly wanting in the elements which go to make up the crime of rape. Thus, in Topolanek v. State, 40 Tex. 160, the court said: "It would seem that the defendant was convicted alone on the testimony of the female alleged to have been injured, unsupported by other evidence, and not corroborated by circumstances. She says she told no one of what the defendant had done, for several weeks, leaving it to be inferred that she had given information to someone after that time; but what it was is not disclosed. Whatever the disclosure may have been, or whoever may have been the party, that party is not named in her testimony, and not called as a witness to corroborate her statement. It was several weeks after the offense is said to have been committed, and long after she had opportunity to complain. No complaint is made until March 1, 1873, more than three months after the wrong is said to have been done, and about three months and a half before her child was born. Her long silence is perhaps intended to be explained when she says the defendant threatened her life and the life of her father if she told anyone of what he had done. But it does not appear that she had any good reason for fear on account of such threats, if made. She was twenty-one years old, resided with her father, and was under his protection. Though she was legally competent as a witness, these circumstances diminish the credit to be given to her testimony, and leave the question of the defendant's guilt in so much doubt that the jury were not authorized to render any other verdict than that of not guilty. And though the court cannot express any opinion as to the weight of the evidence, nor sum up the testimony on the trial before the jury, as they are the exclusive judges of the facts, yet on a motion for a new trial it is the duty of the court to set the verdict aside when it is contrary to the law and the evidence. 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, 1149; 3 Greenl. Ev. 212; Paschal's Dig. arts. 3059, 3137, cl. 9." Commenting on the above case, Henderson, J., among other things, said: "In this case, however, instead of only three months elapsing between the alleged offense and the complaint made by the prosecutrix, more than seven months had elapsed, and only when her condition exposed her did she state anything in regard to the matter. This long silence, and the circumstances under which she made the accusation, should go very far to discredit her, and to suggest that the act of carnal intercourse, if it was with the defendant at all, was with her consent. The excuse she gives, that she feared the appellant would kill her father, under the circumstances of this case, must appear very flimsy indeed. The appellant was shown not to live in the family, and not to have authority or control over her; and this statement of hers, as a reason for her long silence, does not comport with the integrity of a virtuous female, who has been outraged, and who is jealous of her honor. If we look to the circumstances of the outrage itself, as narrated by her, they likewise appear shadowy. There was no attempt at flight, though she was on horseback. No evidence of any injury or struggle. She appears to have unresistingly submitted to being lifted from her horse, and, after the outrage was accomplished, to be lifted back again, by the destroyer of her innocence, to have accepted his escort to her home, and to have gone with him on two sleigh rides a few days afterwards; and all this without any suggestion that he had demeaned himself towards her in any other wise than in a manner which met her approval. Under all of the facts of this case, it occurs to us that the lower court should have unhesitatingly granted a new trial in this cause. Although a stricter rule prevails here with reference to a new trial than in the lower court, yet, from the record in this case, we cannot permit this verdict to stand. Under the laws of this state, rape means 'the carnal knowledge of a woman, without her consent, obtained by force, and such force as might reasonably be supposed sufficient to overcome resistance, taking into consideration the relative strength of the parties and other circumstances of the case.' And the proof of this must be made to appear beyond any reasonable doubt,"—citing cases. Price v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 143, 35 S. W. 988. In State v. Chapman, 88 Iowa, 254, 55 N. W. 489, the indictment was for rape; verdict for assault with intent to commit rape. The prosecutrix was nineteen years of age, had known defendant for three years, and was going with him, on foot, to her home, about 6 miles distant.

They were seen by two witnesses walking down the railroad track together. She testified that he proposed they go across the fields, to make the route shorter. She hesitated, and finally consented. While crossing the fields, he made improper proposals to her. She walked away and left him. He called her back to talk further, and she came. He renewed his proposals. She refused. They bantered. He threw her down, and, against her wishes, had improper relations with her. She endeavored to free herself and escape. The court says: "Her failure afterwards to make known the occurrence until her delicate situation made it necessary to tell her mother, . . . and her entire conduct after the affair, . . . presents a state of facts so inconsistent with her forcible defilement . . . that we think the verdict without sufficient support." In State v. Connelly, 57 Minn. 482, 59 N. W. 479, the defendant was convicted of the crime of rape upon a girl of the age of seventeen years. The defendant was a priest, and resided in an adjoining house. She testified that while she was on the porch of her own house the defendant called her over, to give her some pictures to put in her prayer book; that he took her upstairs into his bedroom; that he gave her some whisky, in which he put some stuff out of a little bottle; that she drank it, got weak, and began falling over a little; that he picked her up, and put her on the bed, and ravished her; that she resisted all she could, and hurrahd; that he accomplished his purpose by force; that he threatened to kill her if she told, and took his revolver from the bureau and pointed it at her at the time. This was March 9th. She told no one until May 25th following. The court says: "But a more vital question is whether the evidence was sufficient to warrant a conviction. There is no rule of law which forbids a jury to convict of rape on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix, provided they are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the truth of her testimony. But the courts have always recognized the danger of convicting on her uncorroborated evidence. . . . Where the testimony of the prosecutrix is uncorroborated, and bears some intrinsic evidence of improbability, courts have sometimes refused even to submit it to the jury." In Territory v. Webb, 2 N. M. 147, 156, it was ruled that "under the rules governing the judicial administration of the criminal laws of this territory, this court can only review and determine errors of law appearing upon the face of the record. . . . It is quite beyond the scope of its duty to determine the credibility of witnesses testifying in the lower court, the weight of their testimony, aside from the law of the evidence, or the reconciliation of conflicting testimony;" but they have also held in the same case and in the same connection that "cases, however, might arise wherein there might be some evidence to sustain every material allegation of the indictment, yet at the same time the evidence might be so very slight as to justify an appellate court in reversing a judgment rendered thereon." In Owens v. State, 35 Tex. 361, the court says: "Cases not infrequently come to this court, where a new trial has been refused, . . . when the weight of evidence is clearly against the verdict, or is so weak as to leave every correct and sound mind in doubt of the guilt of the accused. In all such cases the district court should grant a new trial, and, unless this is done, this court will be compelled to relax its rules, and reverse every judgment which we find rendered on lame and unsupported verdicts." In Mares v. Territory (N. M.) 65 Pac. 165, it was held that the disclosure of the assault made four months after its occurrence was of no value whatever as a corroborating circumstance; and the court, speaking through McMillan, J., said: "There is not in the whole case any corroborating evidence, nor a single corroborating circumstance; and the probability of the commission of the alleged offense is so far outside of the domain of reason that there was absolutely nothing for the consideration of the jury except the bare, improbable statement of the prosecutrix. It is not probable that an employee in a butcher shop located on a busy thoroughfare, and having large windows, uncurtained, giving a full view of the shop from the sidewalk, would, in the daytime, and at an hour of the day when people are accustomed to come to the shop to trade, assault and ravish a customer. It is not probable that a female twenty-two years of age, in such a place, while being pushed 15 to 18 feet towards an adjoining room by a man about to ravish her, would not make an outcry and resist, if she desired to protect her virtue. It is not probable that a woman of the mature age of the prosecutrix, who was with her mistress in the daytime, and her mother at night, would allow such an assault to go uncomplained of to one or the other until she was ill from miscarriage, four months after the alleged occurrence, if she were an innocent victim. It is not probable that a female having a miscarriage, and charged by her mother with wrongdoing, would not lay the offense at the door of another to shield herself. It is unnecessary to notice any of the errors assigned against the verdict of conviction, except the twenty-first, to wit, 'The verdict is against the law,' and the twenty-second, to wit, 'The verdict is against the evidence,' it appearing from the record that there is not sufficient evidence to justify the conviction. The complaint made to her mother by the prosecutrix four months after the alleged assault, and wrung from her at a time when she was ill from miscarriage, has no value whatever as a corroborating circumstance. 'A disclosure in the case of rape has no value whatever unless it is the natural result of the horror and sense of wrong which would prompt any virtuous female to make an outcry at the first suitable opportunity.' People v. O'Sullivan, 104 N. Y. 481, 58 Am. Rep. 530, 10 N. E. 880. In 1 Hale, P. C. 632, it is said: 'Complainant must make fresh discovery and pursuit of the offender; otherwise it carries a presumption that her suit is but malicious and feigned.' In 1 East, P. C. 445, it is said that the evidence of the complainant 'is confirmed if she presently discovered the offense and made pursuit of the offender,' and that her evidence is discredited if she concealed the injury for any considerable time after she had opportunity to complain." And the judgment in that case was reversed. See also Monroe v. State (Miss.) 13 So. 884. In that case the headnote is as follows: "On a trial for rape of an eleven-year-old girl, the evidence relied on to convict was the testimony of the girl herself. The alleged crime occurred at noon, at a farmhouse, and no complaint was made to the neighbors; and there was a horn at hand, generally blown as a signal of an unusual occurrence, but not blown on the occasion of the alleged crime. There was no sign of struggle, and no suggestion of any choking or blows to disable, and no tearing of the girl's clothes. She stayed at home till night, and then told her brother of the alleged rape, who said he was going 'to tell ma,' and she then went to meet her mother, and told her. Held insufficient to sustain a conviction." There Campbell, Ch. J., said: "No error was committed by the court in the trial of this case, but, in our opinion, the verdict should not be permitted to stand. It is true that conviction of this detestable crime may be had on the uncorroborated testimony of the person raped, but it should always be scrutinized with caution; and, where there is much in the facts and circumstances in evidence to discredit her testimony, it is not sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty. 1 Hale, P. C. 635 et seq.; Innis v. State, 42 Ga. 473; People v. Hulse, 3 Hill, 309; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 958. The observations of the court in People v. Hulse, 3 Hill, 309, are just and appropriate, and commend themselves to our judgment. There is much in the testimony of the girl charged to have been raped by the accused to throw doubt on her testimony. There is not a single corroborating circumstance to support her statement, and much to suggest its falsity. . . . [No sign of any struggle was shown.] There was no suggestion of any choking or blows to disable, or bruising the arms or wrists, or tearing the clothes of the girl, or the bedclothes, or any circumstance, even the most trivial, to support her testimony. The rape occurred at 12 o'clock noon, and, although it was on a plantation, she made no complaint to any neighbor. Although there was a horn at hand, the blowing of which was a signal of something unusual having occurred at the house, it was not blown for this unusual occurrence. The girl waited at home until about night, when, having told her little brother, she says, who said he was going 'to tell ma,' she went to meet her mother, and told her. The strong probability is that the account of the affair given by accused is correct, and that the girl consented, and having been detected by the little brother, or from some other cause, she determined to tell. We regard her testimony as incredible." 71

Acting in the light of these authorities, and, indeed, of the experience of common life, and of the ordinary instincts and promptings of human nature, we hold that a verdict based on such evidence as above offered by the state should not be permitted to stand; that evidence is contrary to all rational belief and all prior observations of human action in like circumstances. But even if rape were proved in the present instance, as that is not the crime charged in the indictment, for that very reason no verdict under § 1838 should be permitted to stand.

Summarizing the foregoing rulings, we hold: First, § 1838 unconstitutional; second, that a man indicted and tried under § 1838, and proved guilty under § 1837, cannot be convicted under § 1838, unless his right, under § 2 of the bill of rights, to be notified by the indictment of "the nature and cause of the accusation" against him, is wholly disregarded; third, that no man should be convicted of rape on such improbable, discredited, and unreasonable evidence as that offered by prosecutrix.

For these reasons, the judgment should be reversed, and defendant discharged. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 2718.

The foregoing, which, with some few things added, was the opinion of division No. 2 (Burgess, Ch. J., concurring therein; Gantt, J., dissenting), has ceased to be the opinion of the court; and, because of this, I herewith file the original as my dissenting opinion, in which Marshall, J., concurs.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

HORNER-GAYLORD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

W. C. FAWCETT et al.

(50 W. Va. 487.)

*1. A deed of trust, executed in good faith to secure a bona fide debt, on a stock of goods, and extending to cover after-acquired property, duly recorded, is not fraudulent per se, or prima facie fraudulent, as to subsequent creditors with notice, in equity.

*2. A subsequent execution creditor has a plain, adequate remedy at law as to such after-acquired property; but equity will afford him no relief, as such deed as to such property is void at law, but will be sustained in equity.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Harrison County in favor of defendants in an action brought to set aside certain deeds of trust, and to apply the proceeds of the property to the satisfaction of plaintiff's execution. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Lewis C. Lawson for appellant.

Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Horner-Gaylord Company appeals from a decree of the circuit court of Harrison county in a suit in chancery wherein it was plaintiff, and W. C. Fawcett and others were defendants.

ord is the demurrer to the bill. The bill alleges, in substance, that C. D. Robinson, the owner of a one-half interest in a bookstore at Clarksburg, Harrison county, on the 14th day of July, 1896, executed a deed of trust thereon to Sherman Denham, trustee, to secure Earnest B. Morris the payment of three certain obligations, bearing even date therewith, for the sum of $316.66½, due and payable in six, twelve, and eighteen months respectively, with interest from date; that on the 20th day of July, 1896, said Robinson executed to said Denham, trustee, another deed of trust on the other undivided half interest in said store, purchased by him on that day of J. H. Horner, to secure said Horner the payment of four certain obligations, for $300 each, due and payable in six, twelve, sixteen, and twenty months with interest from date; that Earnest B. Morris assigned some of his said notes to S. O. Davis, and J. H. Horner assigned some of his said notes to Lynn S. Horner; that some of said notes had upon them as surety F. E. Robinson, and others I. N. Dean; that one of said notes was assigned to Flora E. Horner; that afterwards said Robinson sold said store to defendant W. C. Fawcett, or to Fawcett, Morris, & Co.; that on the 30 day of October, 1898 (but not properly acknowledged until the 15th day of October, 1898), said Fawcett assigned said store to J. L. Alexander to secure his various creditors according to priority, and his general unsecured creditors pro rata (plaintiff being included in the latter class), which assignment was not recorded until the 11th day of October, 1898; that said trustee sold the store, and received therefor $1,300, part of which he disbursed on the prior trust debts, and the remainder he still holds in his hands; that on the 3d day of October, 1898, defendants Stuart Bros. & Co. obtained a judgment against W. C. Fawcett for the sum of $55.34, with interest, and $2.25 costs, had an execution issued thereon, and levied on a part of the store goods alleged to belong to Fawcett, Morris, & Co.; that on the 8th day of October, 1898, complainant obtained a judgment against Fawcett, Morris, & Co. for $106.87, and $3.05 costs, on which execution was issued and levied on said day, at 8:30 p. m., on the property of Fawcett, Morris, & Co., to wit, books, stationery, show cases, fixtures, etc., being part of the property afterwards sold by said trustee, Alexander, who took possession thereof on the 10th day of October, 1898; that after said executions were so levied a controversy arose as to whether the constable making the levy, or the trustee, should take possession of and sell such property, and finally, said trustee agreeing to pay such executions out of the proceeds of the sale of such property, he was permitted to take and sell the same, but after such sale was made such trustee refused, at the instance of the beneficiaries under such prior deeds of trust, to pay off said execution; that Fawcett, after his purchase, put $1,000 additional in such store, and the greater part of the goods sold accumulated by purchase after the execution of the deeds of trust given thereon by C. D. Robinson. Plaintiff further claims that said executions, having been issued and levied before the acknowledgment and recordation of the general assignment, are entitled to priority over the same; that the beneficiaries under the two first deeds of trust are claiming the whole of the fund arising from the sale of such store, and which is insufficient in amount to fully satisfy the same, and have directed the trustee not to pay said executions, but to pay the same on their prior claims; that said prior deeds of trust are void and ineffectual, as against said execution liens, as to the property levied on aforesaid. Plaintiff prays that a sufficient amount of the funds in the hands of said Alexander be applied to the satisfaction of its execution; that the rights and interest of the parties hereto be ascertained and determined, and the proceeds of said property be administered under the direction of the court; that the Denham, trustee, deeds of trust be set aside and declared null and void for uncertainty and other reasons apparent upon the same, and for general relief. Afterwards the plaintiff was permitted to amend its bill at the bar of the court by making parties thereto I. N. Dean, F. E. Robinson, and Flora E. Horner, with proper allegations touching their interests. The demurrer being again interposed to the bill as amended, the court overruled it.

The bill, taken as a whole, amounts to simply this: that the plaintiff, having an execution lien by levy on certain property, prior in right to all other liens, except the lien of two deeds of trust, void on their face, and which did not cover the property levied on, permitted such property to be sold by the trustee, Alexander, on condition that he would pay off such executions out of the proceeds of such sale, and which after making the sale he refused to do, and therefore plaintiff instituted this suit to compel him to do so. Plaintiff sues to enforce the lien of an execution on personal property, and not as a beneficiary secured under the assignment for an accounting by the trustee. No accounting was necessary. The suit is hostile to the trust, for it seeks priority over the same, and independent thereof. If the prior deeds of trust are valid liens on the property, they take the whole fund, as conceded in the bill, and this suit would be wholly unnecessary and unavailing. If, on the other hand, they are void on their face, and do not cover the property, they are just as void at law as in equity, and they afford no justification for the interposition of a court of equity. In short, if the allegations of the plaintiff's bill are true, it had a plain, adequate remedy in a court of law, and there was no necessity for the intervention of a court of equity. Admitting all its pretexts, it merely demands the money on its execution lien, which the trustee had in hand and refused to pay because of a void claim upon him by other parties, and the only reason given for this appeal is because the money was not so applied. No person can file a bill of interpleader but the stakeholder, and he cannot do so if he is fully advised of the claims of both parties, so that he is able to determine to which of the parties he should pay the funds in his hands. 11 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 461. A person claiming in opposition to a trust or trustee cannot call upon the trustee to account. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 278. The whole claim of the plaintiff, as set out in its bill, is in opposition to the trust, and not under it. It seeks to deprive the trustee of the property by a prior lien, and has no right to demand an accounting from him merely to get such priority settled. The plaintiff did not file this bill because it had a lien on the equity of redemption under the two prior Denham trusts, for the property had already been sold, and the proceeds were insufficient to satisfy such trusts; thus establishing the equity of redemption to be wholly valueless. Nor did it file it as a beneficiary under the Alexander trust, for its whole claim is in opposition thereto, and such beneficiary cannot maintain a bill to interfere with a trustee in the proper discharge of his duties as such. Righter v. Riley, 42 W. Va. 633, 26 S. E. 357; 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 885. Plaintiff's bill is peculiarly in its own interest, and not in behalf of the beneficiaries under the Alexander trust. Nor does it claim that the trustee has been derelict in administering such trust. It does claim that he has in his hands the proceeds of property not subject to such trust, but subject to its prior execution lien. 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 887. Its remedy at law for the real purpose and not fictitious pretexts of the bill is complete, full, and adequate. 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 911; Id. 679; Freeman, Executions, 3d ed. § 426, pp. 2296, 2297.

Admitting, however, that the plaintiff had the right, ordinarily, as a beneficiary under the Alexander trust, and not in opposition thereto, to file its bill for an account of the funds thereunder, still it was demurrable. It shows on its face that the funds were insufficient to satisfy the two prior Denham deeds of trust, and that, therefore, as residuary beneficiaries, there was no fund applicable to their debt in any event, and an appeal to equity was wholly useless and unnecessary. While the prior deeds might have been void per se as to existing creditors at the time of their execution, they were good and valid as between the grantor and grantee, and all subsequent purchasers from the grantor having notice thereof. Fawcett had complete notice, and acceded to the terms, and became the paymaster thereof. The deeds were on record, and were notice to all persons of the condition of the stock of goods, and that the title was in the trustee, Denham, with the equity of redemption in Fawcett, with the privilege of sale, so long as he did not impair the security of the trust created thereby. Fawcett's trustee, Alexander, could acquire no greater right to the goods than Fawcett himself possessed, which was the mere equity of redemption. Fawcett having permitted his new purchases to take the place of his sales under the prior trust deeds, his trustee has no right to object thereto, as he receives the goods subject to all the prior legal burdens imposed thereon by his grantor. As is said in 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 46, 47: "The assignee takes only such rights in the assigned property as the assignor had at the time of the assignment, subject to all existing equities." "The assignee takes subject to the liens and rights of the assignor's vendors." 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 879. Beneficiaries take no greater rights under the assignment than their trustee. By virtue of the rights or lien acquired under the Alexander trust, they cannot attack the prior equities of the Denham trust beneficiaries as to the after-acquired property placed among the stock by Fawcett; for had he at any time refused to permit such after-acquired property to take the place of the property sold, and become subject to the prior trusts, they would immediately have shut him up and closed out the store. So it must be presumed that he acceded to, and thoroughly acquiesced in, the conditions of the Denham trusts; and his trustee, Alexander, and the beneficiaries under such trust, are estopped from asserting anything to the contrary. It would be inequitable to permit them to do so. As creditors independent of such trust, they might have acquired liens by execution or otherwise upon such after-acquired property, and forced the sale thereof, and in this manner tested the validity of the clauses in the Denham trusts extending such clauses to cover such acquired property. It is plain from the allegations of the bill and the deeds that they were executed in good faith, with no intention to defraud the creditors of Robinson or his vendee, Fawcett, but were merely intended to secure the purchase money for such store, and at the same time permit the possessor thereof to continue business so long as the trust debts were secured. If the deeds of trust attacked had been voidable or void both at law and in equity, an entirely different case would have been presented, from where the deeds are void at law, but good in equity. By coming into equity the execution creditor loses his remedy at law, and benefits the trust debtor, who might otherwise have been compelled to file the bill himself to preserve his equitable rights, which he could not have asserted at law.

The real question which this record presents is as to whether the prior deeds of trust are void as to the after-acquired property sought to be included under their provisions in a court of equity. At law they are. And the plaintiff, had it sought its remedy in a court of law, would have found it adequate and complete, and the deeds of trust would have presented no bar to its recovery. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 979; Gregg v. Sanford, 76 Am. Dec. 723, note [24 Ill. 17]; Moody v. Wright, 46 Am. Dec. 712, note [13 Met. 17]. But in refusing its plain legal remedy and coming into equity, it must do equity. The deeds of trust bear evidence on their face that they were executed for the purpose of securing the purchase money for the stock of goods,—being in the nature of a conditional sale,—and were intended to cover the after-acquired stock, so as to keep them safe and secure. They were duly recorded. Plaintiff's debt was after-contracted, and it had notice, so far as the record shows, actual and constructive, of these prior deeds of trust. They are not attacked for fraud in fact, but simply because of the provision on their face as to the after-acquired property, of which plaintiff had notice. While the law would avoid them, equity sustains them, as both prior in right and time to plaintiff's execution lien. In 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 982, the rule in equity is stated to be that "while it is declared that a mortgage of future-acquired property does not pass any immediate title to such property, yet, as 'equity considers that as done which ought to be done,' such a mortgage creates an equitable lien, which will attach to the subject-matter immediately upon its coming into existence, and create a valid title therein, as against the mortgagor and third parties with notice, without any further act on the mortgagee's part." The deeds of trust in controversy were but mortgages, with power to sell upon the happening of certain events; and, as far as the bill shows, there were no existing debts at the time they were taken and recorded. They are not governed by the numerous cases where existing creditors have attacked such deeds as fraudulent per se, from Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. (Va.) 411, to Landeman v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 702, 2 S. E. 203, but are governed more nearly by the cases of Conaway v. Stealey, 44 W. Va. 163, 28 S. E. 793; Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 266, 35 L. ed. 171, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565; Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, 630, Fed. Cas. No. 9,673; Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. 117, 16 L. ed. 436; Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. 459, 20 L. ed. 199; Dunham v. Cincinnati, O. & O. R. Co. 1 Wall. 254, 17 L. ed. 584; United States v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. 12 Wall.

362, sub nom. New Orleans & O. R. Co. v. Mellon, 20 L. ed. 434,—and numerous state cases, reference to which will be found in 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 982; Gregg v. Sanford, 24 Ill. 17, 76 Am. Dec. 731; Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 17, 46 Am. Dec. 717.

These deeds were not fraudulent in their inception, but are free from all fraudulent intent; their object being to secure the purchase money, and at the same time furnish the grantor the means of satisfying it. The provisions as to the after-acquired property are perfectly consistent with the object of their execution. Their recordation was notice to all persons dealing with the grantor, and subsequent creditors dealt with open eyes; and at any time, by levying on the equity of redemption, they could have compelled a sale of the stock. They were not made with the intent to, nor do they, hinder and delay creditors in the collection of their debts. Equity limits both the lien of a judgment on real estate, and the lien of an execution on personal property, to the actual interest of the debtor at the time such lien was acquired, and will sell only such interest. A creditor who becomes such with full knowledge of the equities of others has no right to complain of such equities. The reasoning of Justice Brewer in the case of Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 266, 35 L. ed. 171, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 565, is unanswerable and conclusive on this question.

The demurrer to the bill should have been sustained, and the bill dismissed; but, as this is an error of which the appellant has no right to complain, the decree is affirmed.

Brannon, P., concurring:

I must say that I am reluctant and hesitating to concur in this decision; but I have only some doubt, and not a fixed conviction, such as to warrant a dissent. It is plain that, if the two prior deeds of trust are valid, the plaintiff has no ground on which to base its suit, for the simple reason that there is no money to go on its demand; but my doubt arises from the fact that I question or hesitate about those deeds of trust, as regards their validity, not because they cover after-acquired property, but because they contemplate the continued possession of the goods in the debtor, and contemplate his power to sell them by continuing the business. They do not expressly so authorize him, but they plainly so imply, and that is sufficient. Clafin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434; Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585. The power to replenish, under these authorities, clearly implies continued possession and power of sale in the debtor. Those authorities and others will attest that such a deed of trust is "fraudulent on its face, is void in toto, and cannot stand as security for the debts therein attempted to be secured." Gardner v. Johnston, 9 W. Va. 403; Adlington v. Etheridge, 12 Gratt. 436; Shattuck v. Knight, 25 W. Va. 590; Landeman v. Wilson, 29 W. Va. 702, 2 S. E. 203. Certainly that is the law as to existing creditors, but some members of the court firmly insist that it is only the law as to existing creditors, and that, as there are no other creditors in this instance whose debts existed at the date of those trusts, the said rule does not apply. I see force in this position,—so much force that at present I am not fully convinced that it is not the proper position. Nevertheless I see that those authorities say that a deed of trust containing such features as those mentioned is fraudulent per se as to creditors, not prima facie fraudulent, and subject to be sustained by proof of good faith, but conclusively taken to intend fraud as to creditors; and we all know that a conveyance that is fraudulent as to existing creditors is so, also, as to subsequent creditors. The beneficiaries under such trusts, though ever so free from intentional fraud, are taken by the law to be participants in fraud as to creditors. Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 592; Clafin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 441. I looked through the cases cited, and others cited in them, to see if they drew the distinction as to existing and subsequent creditors; but, if they do so, I did not find it. The case of Conaway v. Stealey, 44 W. Va. 163, 28 S. E. 793, does not seem to control the case, because in that case the provision for the possession, replenishment, and sale of the stock was not, as it is in this case, on the face of the trust, but an oral agreement outside of the trust.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Dent, J., handed down the following additional opinion:

In Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. (Va.) 433, Judge Cabell says: "As to the other point that the deed under which Lang claims is fraudulent per se, it is one on which I feel some difficulty; and as it is certainly one of great importance, and not necessary to be decided in this case, I purposely abstain from giving any opinion on it, that the question may be considered open for discussion whenever it may again occur before a fuller court." The two other judges (Coalter and Carr) gave their opinions. In Sheppard v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 404, Judge Allen declined to consider the question raised as to the deed of trust being fraudulent per se, because the case turned on the question of the statute of limitations. Judge Baldwin concurred in the opinion of Judge Daniel. In neither of these cases was the question of the fraudulent character of the deeds involved necessary to the decision thereof, and in both, for this reason, concurring judges declined to consider the same; and yet they have been uniformly followed by the courts of this state as settling this principle of law as to when a deed of trust or mortgage is fraudulent per se conclusively. The principle thus admitted to be established is that when a grantor in a deed of trust who secures creditors reserves the possession and the power to sell the property to such an extent as will permit him to defeat the ostensible purposes of such trust, the same is void per se as to existing creditors not thereby secured, independent of any extraneous evidence, and being void as to existing creditors, if there be any such, would also be void as to subsequent creditors; for, it matters not against whom fraud in fact is directed, if it be fraudulent as to one creditor it is fraudulent as to all. Judge Green, in the case of Shattuck v. Knight, 25 W. Va. 596, states the proposition as follows: "If the trustee by the terms of the deed of trust is not to take possession of the personal property until an indefinite future time, and the provision whereby after-acquired property of the grantor is attempted to be conveyed to pay trust debts, and the inference from the character of the property conveyed and attempted to be conveyed, is that the design of the grantor, clearly shown by these provisions, was, when he executed the deed of trust, to hinder other creditors, and at the same time not to devote any of his property then owned by him and conveyed in the deed of trust to the payment of the debts professedly secured by it, but to keep possession of it and dispose of it as he pleased, and to dispose of the proceeds as he chose, then such deed is per se fraudulent on its face. But if in a particular case, because of the character of the property conveyed or attempted to be conveyed, no such inference must necessarily be drawn, then such deed of trust is not per se fraudulent because of such provision." If the provisions of the deed are such as will permit the grantor, at his option, to defeat the same as a security for the debt ostensibly secured, then it is per se void as to creditors hindered thereby; for the certain inference is that it is a mere colorable security to place the property beyond the reach of existing creditors. In the case of Sheppard v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 399, Judge Daniel intimates that, if all the existing creditors had assented to the deed, it would not have been fraudulent per se. At least, he says he is not prepared to so determine. In the present case the creditor secured owned a bookstore and fixtures. He sold it to the grantor on condition that he would secure payment of the purchase money by executing a deed of trust thereon for this purpose. Had he refused to do so, he never could have had possession of the property. By reason of the deed of trust he obtains possession thereof, and not otherwise. The natural inference is that he is to carry on the book business, replenish the stock, pay the expenses, and pay off the indebtedness secured. There were no existing creditors to be defrauded. Hence it is impossible to say, in the language of Judge Green, "that the design of the grantor, clearly shown by these provisions, was, when he executed the deed, . . . to hinder other creditors, and at the same time not to devote any of his property then owned by him and conveyed in the deed of trust to the payment of the debts professedly secured by it, but to keep possession of it, and dispose of it as he pleased, and to dispose of the proceeds as he chose." On the contrary, the primary design of the grantor, participated in by the grantee, was to secure the purchase money, and at the same time permit the grantor to have such control and disposition of the property as would enable him to pay the same. In short, the property was the grantor's only on the condition that he should, out of the proceeds thereof, pay therefor. And even if these were existing creditors, these deeds could hardly be held fraudulent per se as to them, for the reason that it is especially provided therein that "it is expressly understood that the said party of the first part shall not allow said stock of goods to run down and become depleted, and worth less than the aggregate amount of said four obligations; and he shall keep said stock of goods insured in a sufficient amount, for the benefit of said J. H. Horner, to amply protect him against loss of fire. And upon the failure of the said party of the first part to keep said stock of merchandise replenished and insured as aforesaid, then, at the request of the said J. H. Horner, said trustee shall enter upon and take charge of said stock of goods, and sell the same in the manner prescribed by law as aforesaid." By this it is plainly apparent that the grantor could not sell or dispose of such stock of goods in such manner as to defeat the purposes of the trust. He could not sell in bulk, but only at retail, on condition that he would keep the stock a full security for the debts secured, and, in case of failure to do so, forfeit the right of possession immediately. This provision was not contained in the deeds heretofore passed on by the court, and has not, therefore, been construed by it. But in all the cases in which the trust was held fraudulent per se, as is said in Sheppard v. Turpin, 3 Gratt. 398, "the debtor, whilst professing to dedicate his whole property to the payment of his debts then due, reserves to himself a power by which he may, without any violation whatever of the express stipulations of the deed, divert the whole of the property to uses and purposes wholly foreign to the leading object avowed." In the present case, to allow the security to become impaired violates the express stipulations of the deed, and forfeits all right to the property. Not only is this true, but § 2, chap. 74, of the Code, as re-enacted by chapter 4, Acts 1895, especially reserves the right to the debtor to secure the payment of purchase money without infringing on the rights of existing creditors. But the question here is as to whether a deed not fraudulent per se as to existing creditors is fraudulent per se as to subsequent creditors having notice thereof, both actual and constructive. It is well-settled law that a person who contracts a debt with full notice of a deed and its provisions cannot be hindered, delayed, or defrauded thereby. Bump. Fraud. Conv. § 300. In the case of Williams v. Banks, 11 Md. 250, the supreme court of Maryland says: "We have no doubt that subsequent creditors, where there is fraud in fact, have a right to come in;

but we cannot comprehend how a person who at the time of becoming a creditor is aware of the existence of a deed can in any just sense be considered as 'disturbed, hindered, delayed, or defrauded' by it. It seems to us to be a contradiction in terms to say that a person is defrauded by an instrument, when he deals with a perfect knowledge of its existence and of its effect. If our registration laws have any operation, they certainly do, as they were designed, give notice to all the world, so that there may be no deceit practised upon anyone. If registration laws do not give notice to the community which will bind it, then they are of no use whatever, for without registration deeds would be binding inter partes." This language was quoted and approved in the later case of Kane v. Roberts, 40 Md. 590. In Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 381, it is said: "The policy of the registry laws is not consistent with the policy of the rule making void mortgages with power to use and sell mortgaged goods in the usual course of trade, and the latter rule should be made to yield to the more important general policy of the registry laws." Peabody v. Landon, 61 Vt. 318, 17 Atl. 781; Hughes v. Cory, 20 Iowa, 399; Kreth v. Rogers, 101 N. C. 263, 7 S. E. 682. Registry is equivalent to the delivery of possession. Any person has the right to give his property away or place it beyond the reach of subsequent creditors by conveyance, and, if such creditors have notice of such conveyance at the time of the contraction of their debts, they cannot complain thereof as being in fraud of their rights; for they had no right to look to the property encumbered at the time of such conveyance for the payment of their debts, and, having full notice thereof, there can be no fraud as to them. It is entirely different where there is a secret trust as to the grantor, and the conveyance is used merely as a mask to enable the grantor to hold and enjoy his property, and is only colorable as to the debt ostensibly secured thereby, or the creditor at the time of the contraction of his debt has neither actual nor constructive notice, but is misled and deceived by the false appearance of wealth into giving a credit that he would not otherwise extend. And it may be possible that such secret trust may be inferred from a deed where the power of sale and disposal of the proceeds is wholly unrestricted, amounting, in effect, to an entire revocation of such deed. A reservation of this character, being entirely inconsistent with the ostensible purpose of the deed, would render it merely colorable, and not made in good faith to secure the alleged debt used solely for the purpose of deception, and hence to secure to the grantor the illegal—under legal forms—enjoyment of his property in violation of his duty to discharge his just debts. The debt being fictitious, such a deed would be fraudulent in fact, as being contrary to the policy of the law, that a debtor's property should be liable for his debts. To justify such an inference from the face of the deed alone, the power of the grantor to defeat or revoke it must be so plain or absolute as to allow of no other conclusion. Otherwise the subsequent creditor must show the fictitious character of the debt secured by extraneous facts and circumstances. The deeds under consideration are not of this character, but they permit the grantor to sell portions of the property only on condition that such sales do not impair the security for the purchase-money lien, and that the same be preserved intact. Otherwise the right of sale is revoked, and the possession immediately forfeited. For the grantor, therefore, to attempt to defeat the purposes of the deed as a security for the purchase money or debt, is to violate the plainly expressed stipulations therein contained. Hence, it is impossible to infer from these deeds a secret trust in favor of the grantor, but their legitimate purpose is plainly expressed on their faces and in their terms; and this is that they were intended as a bona fide security for the purchase money, and at the same time furnish the grantor the means to honorably and honestly discharge such purchase money without impairing the security therefor; and, being duly recorded, no subsequent creditors could possibly be deceived or defrauded thereby. The subsequent creditor, having notice of the deeds at the time he extended credit, could acquire no greater rights as to the property than the debtor; and this is the right to levy on and sell any portion or all of the property, provided he did not impair the security, or in lieu thereof satisfy the lien. This same conclusion was reached in the case of Conaway v. Stealey, 44 W. Va. 163, 28 S. E. 793, except in that case the power of sale was by parol, instead of being entered on the face of the deed. This cannot affect the principles involved, in any sense, except to be more favorable to the bona fides of the deeds containing on their faces the extent of the reservations made by the grantor. "It matters not whether the agreement that the mortgagor may continue to deal in the property for his own benefit is contained in the mortgage, or exists in parol. . . . It is equally effectual to show the fraudulent purpose for which the mortgage was given, and the fraudulent intent which characterizes it." Potts v. Hart, 99 N. Y. 168, 1 N. E. 605. And for the same reason a reservation which is not fraudulent when made by parol cannot be made fraudulent by being reduced to writing and made a part of a recorded deed. It is only a question of proof, and not one of fraud. So this case and that of Conaway v. Stealey are precisely the same in principle, and the language used in that case is equally applicable here.

Rehearing denied.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

1. The admission of testimony of physicians appointed by the court to examine plaintiff in an action for negligent injuries, as to the result of an examination made after defendant's motion for such examination was withdrawn, is erroneous.
2. The instructions in an action for negligent injuries should confine the jury to a consideration of the acts of negligence alleged in the complaint.

I. Power of court to call witnesses.

In SOUTH COVINGTON & C. STREET R. CO. v. STROH the court appointed two physicians, on motion of the defendant, to make a physical examination of plaintiff. After the plaintiff had testified, the record showed that "the motion of the defendant for the appointment of two physicians by the court to make an examination of plaintiff is withdrawn." After the introduction of defendant's testimony, save a witness who was not in court, the court called one of the physicians. The defendant objected, and both parties declined to examine him, whereupon the court asked him a number of questions, and then the counsel for the plaintiff continued the examination. The court then called the other physician, over the objection of the defense, and required the parties to examine the witness, over the objection of both parties. Counsel for plaintiff then examined this witness. It was held that their introduction by the court, against the protest of the defendant, tended to give undue weight to their testimony, and that, their "examination having been made after the withdrawal of the motion, . . . it was erroneous to introduce them as witnesses in the manner in which it was done." The court cited Boite v. Third Ave. R. Co. 38 App. Div. 234, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1038, and Moses v. Newburgh Electric R. Co. 91 Hun, 278, 36 N. Y. Supp. 149. In neither of these cases cited is the same question passed upon. In the first case the court practically took the examination of plaintiff's witness in his stead, and asked improper questions, that the counsel for plaintiff 57 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenton County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Simrall & Galvin, for appellant:

The instructions do not limit the jury to the negligence charged in the pleadings, nor to that charged in the testimony of the witnesses, but leave them to speculate as to whether or not the falling off or throwing off of the appellee from the car was caused by any negligence, real or imaginary, of the employees of appellant.

The law requires that when a specific would not have been permitted to ask. In the Moses Case the sole question was as to the right to have a physical examination without an affidavit showing that the defendant intended to use it. Stress seems to have been laid, in the STROH CASE, as grounds for reversal, on "the manner in which it was done." It seems that the court of appeals held that the action of the court in this particular showed a bias. If the court intended to say that the trial judge had no right to call for any witness to supply links in testimony or to ascertain the truth of a transaction, it seems that this would be an exceptional case, as the weight of authority is to the effect that a trial judge has the right, in a disinterested way, to direct that witnesses may be called in order to throw light upon the case.

The trial court has the right to suggest that witnesses may be called to throw light upon a doubtful question of fact where it is done in such a manner as not to show bias or prejudice. It is better practice for the judge to try the case as made out by the parties, as it is difficult for him to take any action in the matter of supplying evidence without indicating to the jury his opinion.

In Fullerton v. Fordyce, 144 Mo. 519, 44 S. W. 1053, where the defendants had obtained the appointment of physicians under an order of court for the examination of plaintiff, and had neglected to use them as witnesses, it was held that the plaintiff was properly allowed, over defendants' exception, to introduce and examine those witnesses; and it was further held that the remark of the court in stating: "The supreme court has indicated in this case that it would like to have this court appoint a commission. I have done so in response to that, and I will permit the commission to testify,"—was not prejudicial error. The court said: "By the course adopted defendants secured the advantage of a cross-examination of witnesses who had ascertained facts under an order of court made at their request, and they have no just ground to complain. Neither does it appear that the remarks of the court, on admitting the testimony, could have been prejudicial. The commission was appointed by an order of court, which was a matter of public record. The appointment was made at the request of defendants, for the purpose of eliciting the truth and in furtherance of justice. The information given by the court went no further than to advise the jury that the witnesses had made a physical examination of plaintiff by its direction, a fact which either charge of negligence is made, and the issue made upon that, the fact charged must be proved; and therefore the thing specifically charged is the only thing that can be submitted to the jury.

Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Gunter, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1803, 56 S. W. 527; Louisville R. Co. v. Park, 96 Ky. 580, 29 S. W. 455; Sandy River Cannel Coal Co. v. Caudill, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1175, 60 S. W. 180.

A trial judge had no right, not only to name physicians on his own motion, but, over the objection of both parties, to call said physicians to the stand, and then examine one of them and compel the parties to examine the other.

Messrs. Ernst, Cassatt, & McDougall also for appellant.

Mr. B. F. Graziani, for appellee:

The appellee did not object to Dr. Walters testifying, but refused to make him her witness, for the reason that if she made him her witness, she would be bound by his statements. The appellant had moved for the appointment of the physicians, and the court had appointed them, but the attorneys for the appellant, having questioned these doctors and finding that their testimony would not be favorable as they expected, did not want to be bound by their statements; but appellee's counsel simply declined to examine the witnesses so as to make them her witnesses. Counsel for appellant is in error when he urges that they were the witnesses of the court. The appellant called for their appointment; they were appointed; they made the examination; they testified. What harm was done if the testimony was truthful? The facts were made known to the jury by distinguished medical experts, party had a right to elicit from the witnesses themselves. Surely defendants, at whose request the commission was appointed, should not complain of the information the jury incidentally acquired from the remarks of the court. Parties calling for such an examination must take the chances of the results. The experts who made the examination became the witnesses of the court, rather than of the parties to the action; and if the parties refused to call them the court had the right to do so, in which case greater credit would have been given them than was given by the remarks complained of."

In Hall v. The Buffalo, Newberry, Adm. 115, Fed. Cas. No. 5,927, where depositions had been taken by both parties and were not used by them, the court, on being apprised that they were on file, called for the same, and held that such avenue to the discovery of the truth was not to be closed by either a technical adherence to rule, or the omission of the parties to introduce them in evidence. In this case one of the depositions did not correspond with the evidence of the witness in court, and was inconsistent with an amended answer.

In Moses v. Newburgh Electric R. Co. 91 Hun, 278, 36 N. Y. Supp. 149, where an order was made directing that the plaintiff be physically examined before a referee, and that she be physically examined by a physician before the trial of the action, it was said: "Obviously a party cannot have any intelligent purpose as to whether he will use a certain person's testimony until he knows what it is to be. If it proves favorable to the party by whom it is taken, it will ordinarily be read by that party; if unfavorable, it will ordinarily be read by the other party."

The above case was cited by the court in the STROH CASE, and while it does not throw any light on the right of the court to call witnesses, it is a dictum to the effect that a party obtaining an examination for a personal injury cannot prevent the witnesses being called.

In Sheets v. Bray, 125 Ind. 33, 24 N. E. 357, the court called the parties to the suit as witnesses in the cause. It was claimed that it was an abuse of discretion, because there were several appellees, and but one appellant. It was held that the number of parties should not be considered as evidence that the court was guilty of an abuse of discretion in calling all the parties to the suit as witnesses, to testify to their knowledge of the facts under investigation, by reason of appellant's superior knowledge of the principal facts involved in the case.

S. 410, 4 N. Y. Supp. 537, it was held that the calling of a witness by the trial judge, where the witness was immediately accepted by the plaintiff as his witness, was not reversible error. In this case the court said: "If, as is now claimed, the circumstances under which this was done, and especially the remarks which passed between the trial judge and the counsel for the defendant at the time, tended to prejudice the defendant's case with the jury, the defendant, upon proof of the fact and a case regularly made and settled, should have moved at special term for a new trial as matter of discretion. This was not done. No relief will be granted on a mere general exception."

And in a prosecution for burglary, where the judge recalled the prosecuting witness on the failure of proof that the dwelling house was closed in the night, and the court had the omitted proof supplied under his own examination, it was held that there was no error. State v. Lee, 80 N. C. 483. In this case the court said: "It would not be proper for the judge in the course of a trial to usurp the place and duty of the state's counsel on the one hand, and prescribe the order of introduction of the witnesses, and become active in their examination; nor yet, on the other hand, to take the place of the prisoner's counsel, and assume the duties resting on him in the general conduct of the defense. But it is expected of the judge, in presiding at a trial, in the exercise of a perfect impartiality, to see the law properly administered, and justice done, both as respects the state and the accused. If a fact material to the state, or to the prisoner, be obviously overlooked and about to be omitted, it is usual, in practice and within the scope of the judge's duty, on motion, to allow a witness to be recalled to supply the omitted fact, or, in his discretion, to recall the witness, and have the oversight repaired under his own examination."

And where a judge recalled a witness after he had testified, in order to ascertain whether he had made certain statements in his testimony, it was held not to be error. Lafferty v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 35 S. W. 374. In this case the objection was not to the question and the answer, but to the fact that he was recalled by the judge. This was held not to be error. The court said: "The court may have been in doubt as to what the defendant stated upon the subject. The court did not propose to prove any new fact, but simply to ascertain what the witness had stated about this matter."

The court will not permit a party to an action to ask for the production of certain documents or testimony, and then, when it is ascertained that it is unfavorable to them, refuse its production.

7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 111; Morgan v. Kendall, 124 Ind. 454, 9 L. R. A. 445, 24 N. E. 143.

Du Relle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee alleged in her petition that she was a passenger on one of appellant's cars and signaled the conductor at the corner where she wished to alight, and that he, "standing on the rear platform of said car, placed his hand upon the arm of the plaintiff, and, while pressing plaintiff forward down the steps from said car to the street, signaled her to alight, and while she was attempting to do so the car gave a sudden jerk or pitch, and, by the aid and acts of the defendant's conductor, employee, and agents, and the acts of said car, the plaintiff was thrown violently to the street," whereby she was injured; "and because of said wrongful acts" she had been permanently injured, has suffered great pain, and incurred expenses for medical treatment, to her damage in the sum of $15,000. By an amended petition she averred "that as she attempted to alight from said car the same was negligently moved, jerked, or ran forward, by said defendant, its agents and employees, which caused the plaintiff to fall; and that said acts of said agents and employees were neg-

a witness recalled to restate his testimony, where counsel differed, it was held not to be error. Hayes v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 146, 35 S. W. 983. In this case the court said: "On such occasions, however, the court should avoid expressing an opinion as to what the witness may have previously testified, and leave the witness free to reiterate his testimony untrammelled."

In Rex v. Watson, 6 Car. & P. 653, "Taunton, J., who tried the case, after the examination of witnesses to fact on the part of the prisoners, called back a witness for the prosecution, and asked him several questions; and then, addressing the prisoner's counsel, inquired if he had any question to ask upon it, saying that, although he, as judge, had called back the witness for the purposes of justice, he thought it right that the prisoner's counsel should have the opportunity of cross-examining the witness again."

In an action on a claim against a levy and sale, where the court, after motion for a nonsuit, examined the sheriff as to the person upon whom he served the notice of levy, and directed him to amend the return, it was held not error. Primrose v. Browning, 59 Ga. 69. In this case the court said: "Although the subsequent action of the court was unnecessary to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff in fi. fa., still, there was nothing objectionable in its action, in view of the facts, which would authorize this court to interfere and control its discretion in conducting the trial of the case before it."

In Willitts v. Schuyler, 3 Ind. App. 118, 29 N. E. 273, a wife filed a claim against her deceased husband's estate. The court called her as a witness, and permitted her to testify, although she would have been incompetent under the statute except for the questions of the court requiring her to testify. It was held that this was not an abuse of discretion. In this case the court said: "It is within the power of courts, in the exercise of their discretion, to require witnesses to testify who are rendered incompetent by the provisions of the above section, and there is no legislative restriction or limit upon such discretion, except that it shall be reviewable on appeal. In the case before us there are no indications of an improper use of the discretion confided in the trial court, and we can discover no reason for criticising its action." This was under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 498, which is as follows: "In suits or proceedings in which an executor or administrator is a party, involving matters which occurred during the lifetime of the deceased, where a judgment or allowance may be made or rendered for or against the estate represented by such executor or administrator, any person who is a necessary party to the issue or record, whose interest is adverse to such estate, shall not be a competent witness as to such matters against such estate; provided, however, that in cases where a deposition of such decedent has been taken, or he has previously testified as to the matter, and his testimony or deposition can be used as evidence for such executor or administrator, such adverse party shall be a competent witness for himself, but only as to any matters embraced in such deposition or testimony." This was a suit by a widow against her husband's estate. She claimed an indebtedness by note. The defense claimed that the note was given to induce her to unite in a sale of property, and that if the proceeds were invested in other property the note was to be void. This was denied by the widow, who was allowed to testify. The general statutory rule excluding such evidence cannot be ignored, and this decision will not be received as sound law.

In Reg. v. Holden, 8 Car. & P. 606, it was held that, on a trial for murder, every person who was present at the time of the transaction which gives rise to the charge ought to be called as a witness on the part of the prosecution; for, even if they give different accounts, the jury should hear the evidence, and draw their own conclusions as to the truth. Therefore, where the widow and daughter of the deceased were present at the time when the fatal blow was supposed to have been given, and the widow was examined as a witness, the judge directed the daughter to be called for the counsel for the prosecution, although she had been brought to the assizes for the other side, and her name was not on the back of the indictment.

And in Rex v. Simmonds, 1 Car. & P. 84, Hullock, J., held: "Though the counsel for the prosecution is not bound to call every witness whose name is on the back of the indictment, it is usual for him to do so; and if he does not, I, as the judge, will call the witness, that the prisoner's counsel may have an opportunity of cross-examining him. The witness was then called by the counsel for the prosecution."

In Coulson v. Disborough [1894] 2 Q. B. 316, where the jury desired that a party in court should be placed on the witness stand, and the judge called him and questioned him as to whether he had taken his father's money and given it to plaintiff at the time ligent and careless." The appellant denied the affirmative averments, pleaded contributory negligence, and the trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for $4,000.

Various grounds for reversal are relied on. It will be necessary to consider only two of them. On the day the case was set for trial, the company moved to require appellee to submit to an examination by two physicians, named in the motion, for the purpose of ascertaining the character and extent of the injuries to her, and in order that said physicians might testify with reference thereto upon the trial of the case. This motion, on objection by appellee, was overruled, but the court offered to require the plaintiff to submit to an examination by two doctors to be appointed by the court, and the defendant filed a motion to that effect. The court named Dr. Allen and Dr.

Walters to make the examination. The parties thereupon went into trial. After the plaintiff herself had been examined and one other witness, the record shows that "the motion of defendant for the appointment of two physicians by the court to make an examination of the plaintiff is withdrawn." The plaintiff then continued the examination of her witnesses in chief, rested, and the defendant introduced its testimony in chief, with the exception of one witness, who was not present, and as to whom it asked the privilege of introducing him later in the trial. On the following day the court called Dr. Walters. The defense objected. Both plaintiff and defendant declined to examine him, and the court examined him, asking him a number of questions, after which counsel for the plaintiff continued the examination. The court then called Dr. Allen, plaintiff claimed to have received it, and for which she had been arrested and had brought an action of false imprisonment, and the witness answered both questions in the negative, it was held that the judge properly refused the application of plaintiff to allow them to cross-examine this witness. It was said by Lord Esher, M. R., that, "when a witness is called in this way by the judge, the counsel of neither party has a right to cross-examine him without the permission of the judge." Smith, L. J., said: "A witness called in this way is the witness of the judge, not of either of the parties. It is the function of the judge to try and find out the truth whether he is hearing the case with or without a jury. Neither party can cross-examine a witness so called as of right: the leave of the judge must be obtained."

In Selph v. State, 22 Fla. 537, it was said: "Our conclusion is that the counsel prosecuting for the state cannot be compelled to call all the witnesses who were present at the time of the commission of an offense, or all whose names are on the indictment. We do not deny the right of the presiding judge, when prompted by sound discretion, to call and examine witnesses of his own accord, when the interests of justice demand it, whether the witness be for or against the state, and in such a case to permit counsel on both sides to cross-examine such witness."

But where a defendant in an embezzlement case showed by witnesses a purchase in good faith, and the court said in the presence of the jury: "I am not satisfied with this, let the defendant take the stand,"—it was held that this was improper, and was calculated to prejudice the defense. Lyman v. People, 107 Ill. 423. In this case the court said: "Whether the court was satisfied or not, was not a matter proper to be communicated to the jury. They should have been left free to consider the evidence given by both parties, without any expression of opinion from the court. Undoubtedly the court has the discretionary right—the exercise of which may tend to elicit the truth—to direct that witnesses shall be recalled for further examination, or that other witnesses may be called to the stand to be examined; but the court ought not to state to the jury that it is or is not satisfied with any particular portion of the evidence. Expressions of that character are calculated to have great weight, and if the jury are to be controlled in that way, their services might as well be dispensed with in the first instance."

comment of the court, than against the power to call the defendant to the stand.

II. Power of court to examine witnesses.

a. To elicit facts or supply evidence.

It seems to be a general rule, accepted everywhere, that the trial judge has the right to ask questions of witnesses to elicit facts or supply evidence. Of course this must be done in a fair, impartial way, because the conduct of a judge showing bias or prejudice during the trial is just as erroneous in the examination of witnesses as in any other particular. The authorities all agree, however, as to the power of the court to ask questions of the witness that are necessary to elicit the truth. There are a few cases which, although not denying the power and the right of a court to examine witnesses, indicate that in their judgment it is better practice for the court not to do so on account of the danger of being misconstrued.

A searching examination of a witness by the court, as to the competency of a witness on the matter of valuation, was held not to be erroneous, in Keith v. Wells, 14 Colo. 321, 23 Pac. 391. In this case the court said: "As we have seen, there was a wide difference of opinion among the witnesses in reference to the value of the property, and, under the circumstances, it is fair to presume that the court was of the opinion that the jury were entitled to the fullest information in reference to the competency of the witnesses testifying as to the value; and, as the questions propounded to the witness by the court were calculated to elicit information in reference to the knowledge of Howland on this subject, we are of the opinion that the error assigned is not well taken."

And active participation by the court in the questioning of a party who was a witness was held not to be error, where it was not shown that the party was prejudiced. Baur v. Beall, 14 Colo. 383, 23 Pac. 345. In this case the court said: "The circumstances may have rendered it necessary upon that trial—of which we have no means of judging—in order to arrive at the facts."

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, a witness testified that she saw a person running after the shooting, and she could not tell who it was. The court asked her: "At the time you saw that person running, and not from what you have heard, did you know it was Dave Long?" A. "I took it to be Dave the other doctor who had been appointed to make an examination of the plaintiff, over the objection of the defense, and required the parties to examine the witness, over the objection of both parties. Counsel for plaintiff then examined this witness. From the testimony of the two doctors it appeared that they had examined the plaintiff about half past five on the previous evening, and therefore after the motion to require an examination by physicians appointed by the court had been withdrawn. As the plaintiff claimed to be suffering from prolapsus uteri as a result of her fall, and of a blow and bruise upon the abdomen from her umbrella handle, upon which she fell, the testimony of the two physicians, which showed the organ to be misplaced, and that such displacement might be the result of a fall or blow, tended to support plaintiff's theory of the case, at least to some extent, and could not but have been prejudicial to the defense, for the reason that these physicians were appointed by the court, and introduced by the court against the objections of the defense. They were presumably disinterested, and the fact of their introduction by the court against the earnest protest of the defense tended to give undue weight and prominence to their testimony, in so far as it supported plaintiff's contention. It is not necessary to decide what might have been done had the examination been made before the withdrawal of the motion. That examination having been made after the withdrawal of the motion, we think it was clearly erroneous to introduce them as witnesses in the manner in which it was done. See Botte v. Third Ave. R. Co. 38 App. Div. 234, 56 N. Y. Supp.

Long at the time. I cannot say for certain who it was, now." Long v. State, 95 Ind. 481. In this case the court said: "It is the duty of the presiding judge to see that the truth is developed, and for this purpose he has the right to propound proper questions to witnesses. Of course, he should scrupulously avoid all semblance of partiality. There was nothing in the question, we think, to in any way indicate to the jury that the judge had either any opinion or wish in the matter. It should be observed, too, that the answer of the witness was not such as to materially affect the case either way."

And in an action for damages for fraudulent representations in a land trade, where the court directed a witness to state what the defendant had said to him as to the representation that he had made to the plaintiff in regard to the land, it was held not to be erroneous. Bartlett v. Falk, 110 Iowa, 346, 81 N. W. 602.

And in Cobb v. State (Miss.) 23 So. 1015, where the circuit judge interrogated witnesses for the defense, it was held that there was nothing improper in any of the interrogatories. The court said: "The circuit judge is not a nonentity. It is his duty to see that the course of the trial is according to law, and to elicit the truth. He is not powerless to ask questions, and, where the questions are proper, it is his privilege, and may be even his duty, to ask them."

In a prosecution for rape, where the court questioned the prosecuting witness as to her underwear, it was held that the answer was beneficial to defendant rather than otherwise, and that, if the relevancy or materiality of this testimony was questionable, it was wholly without prejudice. Fager v. State, 22 Neb. 332, 35 N. W. 195. In this case objection was made to the conduct of the presiding judge as to the course pursued by him in the examination of the witness, where leading questions were asked. The court said: "As a matter of practice in this state, we think the rule generally adopted by the judge has been to avoid examining witnesses, and to permit the case to go to the jury as made by the attorneys. This, of course, is subject to the exception above stated, in which case there can be no doubt as to the right and duty of a trial judge. Courts should also see that the examination of a witness is conducted in fairness to both of the litigants, and to the witness. Whether or not a judge has a right to go beyond this, under the provisions of our Criminal Code, might be a serious question."

to be erroneous for the court to examine a witness, after he testified as to dying declarations, and to inquire as to the condition of the mind of deceased at the time he made the declarations. Chalk v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 116, 32 S. W. 693.

And where the court, after a witness had been examined, interrogated him as to his state of feelings towards a party, and brought out the evidence that he had had a quarrel with him, it was held that it was no abuse of the discretion by the court. Lefever v. Johnson, 79 Ind. 554. In this case the court said that there was nothing wrong in the court's asking the witness any question, the answer to which would likely throw any light upon his testimony.

In Riegler v. Tribune Asso. 41 App. Div. 490, 58 N. Y. Supp. 807, it was held not to be error for the court to ask questions of the defendant after he was recalled, which were pertinent for the purpose of eliciting the truth and presenting the facts clearly to the jury.

So, in De Ford v. Painter, 3 Okla. 80, 30 L. R. A. 722, 41 Pac. 96, it was held that the interrogation of witnesses during the progress of the case is not error, and the judge may, in the exercise of his discretion, aid in eliciting material matter suggested by the evidence.

And in Bowden v. Achor, 95 Ga. 243, 22 S. E. 254, it was said that the fact that a presiding judge asked questions of the witnesses because necessary to elicit the truth would not be held error; but that no opinion should be expressed by him upon the facts, nor any expression used calculated to prejudice the rights of either party. In this case the court refused to pass upon this question, as applied to the facts in this case, stating that on a new trial it would likely not occur again.

In a manslaughter case the accused testified that the deceased drew his hand from his pocket, and that witness thought he had a weapon. The court asked: "Did you find any weapon in his hand, or about him?" and he answered, "No." It was held that this was not prejudicial error, and that it was not necessary to do so in view of reversal on another question. McDonald v. State, 89 Tenn. 161, 14 S. W. 487. In this case the court said: "As a rule courts are to try cases as made by parties or attorneys, and not make the effort to supply what may seem to them as missing links in the chain of testimony; to do so would be error."

In State v. Stephens, 70 Mo. App. 554, and State v. Pagels, 92 Mo. 300, 4 S. W. 931, it was held that there is no doubt as to the right of

The instructions objected to seem to correctly state the law applicable to the case, with the exception that they do not confine the jury to the consideration of the acts of negligence specifically alleged in the petition as amended. As said by Judge O'Rear in the opinion in Sandy River Cannel Coal Co. v. Caudill, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1175, 60 S. W. 180: "The jury should be confined to the consideration of such facts of alleged negligence as were the basis of plaintiff's complaint." See also Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Gunter, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1803, 56 S. W. 527. Instruction No. 4 was not prejudicial to appellant, and is not complained of by appellee.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to award appellant a new trial, and for further proceedings consistent herewith.

a trial judge to interrogate a witness if he deems it necessary to supply some omitted or legitimate question, or to fully develop the facts bearing on the case. It was also held that the questions propounded by the court were proper, and not obnoxious to any valid objection.

So, the asking of a pertinent question by a trial judge, to elicit a fact overlooked by counsel, was held not to be error, where it tended to protect the innocent, or prevent the escape of the guilty. Hill v. State, 5 Lea, 725. In this case the court said: "If, too, the trial judge were to show by his active interference in the conduct of the cause that he was not the impartial arbiter he should be, there can be no doubt that it would be our duty to correct his error."

In Wilson v. Ohio River & C. R. Co. 52 S. C. 537, 30 S. E. 400, it was held not to be error where the judge took part in the examination of witnesses. It was further held that Const. 1895, art. 5, § 26, providing that judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but shall declare the law, was materially different from the former powers of a circuit judge. This made no change as to his powers in the conduct of the trial of a case which of necessity must be left in a large measure to his discretion. It was further held that the exercise of this discretion was not a subject of appeal, unless it has been abused, which was not alleged in this case.

In Butler v. Boyles, 10 Humph. 155, 51 Am. Dec. 697, it was said: "A judge may very properly ask question of witnesses; and especially may an arbitrator do so, as the tribunal is less dignified, less formal, and usually unassisted by counsel. That the arbitrator was requested to question the witness, is no proof of partiality. There was nothing secret about it; nothing that showed the existence of an influence in favor of the party making the request."

Where the court asked plaintiff a question, and he testified to new matter, it was held that the defendant was entitled to testify himself in answer thereto. Myers v. McCarthy, 2 Sandf. 399.

See Sparks v. State, 59 Ala. 82, infra, II. h, and State v. Lee, 80 N. C. 483, supra, I.

b. In order that the questions or answers may be understood.

In an action for personal injuries received by a passenger in getting on a train, where the court asked questions of several witnesses in the endeavor to properly understand the facts in evidence, it was held not prejudicial. Schaefer v. St. Louis & S. R. Co. 128 Mo. 64, 30 S. W. 331. The court said: "We do not see why it was not a commendable thing in both the court and the jury endeavoring to ascertain just exactly the situation at the time of the injury."

And where the court put only one question to a witness, for the object and purpose of ascertaining if the witness understood a question 57 L. R. A.

that counsel had propounded to her, it was held that it was the duty and province of the court to see that the witness comprehended the questions asked in order that they might be answered understandingly. Scroggin v. Johnston, 45 Neb. 714, 64 N. W. 236.

And where the questions asked by the court were unobjectionable, and not asked so as to improperly influence the jury, it was held that no error was committed. Cole v. State, 75 Ind. 511. In this case the court said: "The court would not, of course, be warranted in assuming the duties of counsel, but has a right, when the testimony of a witness is not clearly understood, or when, for the purpose of ruling intelligently upon a question, an explanation is needed, or a fuller answer required, to ask questions of the witness. We see nothing in the record before us indicating that the court, in any way, wrongfully prejudiced the rights of the appellant by the questions asked witnesses."

And where the character of an examination by the court indicated that the only purpose of the court was to have the witness's meaning understood, and the answers were but repetitions of what the witness had already stated, though made somewhat clearer, it was held not to be prejudicial error. Pothast v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 110 Iowa, 458, 81 N. W. 693.

The examination of a witness by the judge, in order to bring out more fully the facts about the localities in a murder case, and intended to make more plain what has already appeared, without intending to indicate an impression to the jury, was held not to be error. State v. Hargroves, 104 Tenn. 112, 56 S. W. 857.

So, where the trial judge refreshed his memory as to the testimony of a witness by having him restate his evidence on a certain point, and he also asked him other questions, it was held not error. Sanders v. Bagwell, 37 S. C. 145, 15 S. E. 714, 16 S. E. 770. In this case the court said: "While the practice of the trial judge, taking the examination of a witness into his own hands, is not to be commended or approved, it is a matter of everyday experience in our courts for the trial judge to ask a witness a question. When it is realized what a great responsibility is devolved upon a circuit judge in seeing that justice is properly administered in the court, some latitude must, of necessity, be accorded him."

c. To keep witnesses within bounds.

In Rounds v. Alee (Iowa) 89 N. W. 1098, the court asked pertinent questions calculated to impress defendant with the necessity of what was said, rather than of giving his conclusions. This was held not to be erroneous.

And where the court interrupted a witness by such remarks as, "How do you know?" "Tell what you know?" "Don't tell what you suppose,"—it was held not to be error. Fer- guson v. Hirsch, 54 Ind. 387. In this case the court said: "The court has a judicial discretion in directing the conduct of a witness, the exercise of which very much depends on the character of the witness, his conduct, manner, intelligence, willingness, unwillingness, stubbornness, ignorance, youth, inexperience, etc., all of which the circuit court has a much better opportunity of knowing than this court; and such discretion must be very clearly exceeded before we can revise it by reversing a judgment. We see nothing of the kind in the case before us."

d. Where they are reluctant.

In Varnedoe v. State, 75 Ga. 181, 58 Am. Rep. 465, the court propounded questions to a reluctant witness. It was held that it is the duty of the court to propound such questions as to strip the witnesses of the subterfuges to which they resort to evade telling the truth. In this case it was apparent that the witness held back, and did not fully respond to the questions asked him, and the judge sought to ascertain the cause of his unseemly reticence. The court said: "Had he gone further, and reproved him for his indecorous conduct, he would not have transcended the limits of his duty."

And where the party assaulted in a rape case was an unwilling witness, it was held not to be error for the court to elicit evidence from her that the mother of the accused had hired her to remain away from court. The witness testified that the accused did not know of this. The remedy then was for the defendant to strike from the case the previous answer of the witness. Lockhart v. State, 92 Ind. 452. In this case the court said: "The court had the right, we think, as the attorney for the state would have had, to ascertain from her, if possible, her feeling and purpose in the case. If appellant had hired her to stay away, we know of no reason why the court might not have compelled her to state the fact to the jury. It is not the province of the court to shield the guilty or convict the innocent, but to see to it that exact justice is done to the state and the accused. For this purpose the judge may propound to witnesses of this character all such proper questions as may throw light upon their statements, and especially upon the motives that actuate them."

And where the court questioned witnesses who were showing a disposition to equivocate, and the questions of the prosecuting attorney were not calculated to develop material facts, it was held not to be error. State v. Spiers, 103 Iowa, 711, 73 N. W. 343. In this case the court said: "A trial court should not, as a rule, interfere with the examination of witnesses when the examination is being fairly conducted, unless to rule upon objections and motions. But the trial court is not required to remain silent when unwilling witnesses persist in such a course as will conceal the truth and make the trial a travesty of justice. We do not find that the district court exceeded the power which rightfully belonged to it, in assisting in the examination of witnesses, and in compelling answers."

e. Leading and improper questions.

There seems to be a conflict of authority as to the right of the court to ask leading or improper questions. In some cases the court is held to the same rule as attorneys. Of course, under some circumstances, leading questions may be proper. On the other hand, some cases hold that the trial court may ask any question without regard to the well-recognized rules binding on attorneys.

The same rules in regard to asking leading questions, that apply to counsel, are held to be applicable to a trial judge. Hopperwood v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 15, 44 S. W. 841. In this case the court said: "We would remark, in this connection, that the state furnishes, for the purpose of examining witnesses and conducting prosecutions, a district or county attorney, whose province it is to examine the witnesses; and rarely should it occur that a judge should undertake the examination of a witness. Of course, there may be occasions when it would be necessary for him to interfere, and have a witness restate his testimony, or state more clearly parts of his testimony. But such occasions can rarely occur; and, when they do occur, the judge should interfere in the examination of a witness with great caution."

In a murder case the court interposed, and asked the witness leading questions to show that the deceased had abandoned the quarrel before the homicide. This was held to be error. State v. Crotts, 22 Wash. 245, 60 Pac. 403. In this case the court said: "Again, outside of any constitutional provision, these questions were leading. They would not have been tolerated for a moment, had they been asked by counsel. There can be no principle of law in the administration of justice that will allow a court to ask an incompetent question, any more than counsel. It is true that courts may sometimes ask leading questions; but, under such circumstances, it would be proper for the court to permit counsel to ask leading questions; but they must be asked neither by the court nor the counsel, excepting when the necessity exists therefor, and there was no necessity shown in this case. Courts may frequently indulge in asking questions in furtherance of justice, when there has been an omission on the part of the officers of the state which would tend to bring about a miscarriage of justice; but even then such questions must be competent questions."

And where an improper question was asked by the judge, it was held that the question and answer should be stricken from the case. People ex rel. Lauchantin v. Lacoste, 37 N. Y. 192. The court said: "We do not understand that the court has any greater right to ask, against the objections of counsel, improper questions, than counsel have. And if, against objection, he asks improper questions, it is the duty of the appellate court to correct the error."

But in White v. State, 56 Ga. 385, it was held that the judge may propound leading questions to a witness introduced by the state.

See other Georgia cases, infra, II. h.

In a prosecution for poisoning, a witness testified to statements made by defendant's wife while the defendant was in an adjoining entry. The judge asked his witness: "Did the defendant appear to be listening?" A. "Yes." This was to prove that the defendant was called upon to deny the statements. On cross-examination the witness testified that the defendant was in full sight while the wife was talking. It was held that an objection to a leading question put by the court will not avail. Com. v. Galavan, 9 Allen, 271.

And where the court cross-examined a party by leading questions suggesting answers in his favor, it was held not to be error where the answers did not modify the party's testimony in chief. Sessions v. Rice, 70 Iowa, 306, 30 N. W. 735. In this case the court said: "But the witness gave an answer which left his testimony wholly unmodified. The fact that he refused to change his testimony might be considered as giving it emphasis, but it would hardly be claimed that we could reverse upon such ground."

In a prosecution for murder by poisoning with calomel, where the court asked the witness: "Have you ever seen the body of one who died from calomel, except this one?"—it was held not to be prejudicial error. State v. Milling, 85 S. C. 16, 14 S. E. 284. The court said: "The point of the objection, however, seems to rest upon the last three words of the question,—'except this one,'—which, it is claimed, were sufficient to indicate that the judge who propounded the question had reached the conclusion that the deceased had died from overdoses of calomel. It does not seem to us that this necessarily followed, for a person who had reached no conclusion of his own upon the subject might very well have framed the question in the way in which it was propounded, having reference to what had previously been testified to by the other physician, and not to any opinion of his own. But even if the form of the question could be regarded as sufficient to indicate the judge's own opinion as to the cause of the death, that would not constitute such an error of law as could warrant this court in reversing the judgment."

See State v. Marshall, 105 Iowa, 88, 74 N. W. 763, infra, II. 1; People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752, infra, II. h, and Fager v. State, 22 Neb. 332, 35 N. W. 195, supra, II. a.

1. Suggesting a change in the form of questions.

The fact that the court suggested a different form for a leading question was held insufficient cause for a new trial. Metropolitan Street R. Co. v. Johnson, 91 Ga. 466, 18 S. E. 818.

And where an objection to the form of a question propounded by the commonwealth's attorney was sustained, it was held not to be error for the court to ask the question in the proper form. Lowry v. Com. 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1553, 65 S. W. 434. In this case the court said: "The evidence proved by the witness in response was proper and admissible. In the action of the court there was nothing to suggest bias or leaning one way or the other. It was evidently done to save time, and was not prejudicial error."

So, where questions of the prosecution had been objected to as leading, and the trial judge wrote out certain questions and handed them to the interpreter to propound to the witness, it was held not to be prejudicial error. Malcek v. State, 83 Tex. Crim. Rep. 14, 24 S. W. 417. In this case the court said: "If the conduct of the judge impressed the jury that he (the judge) was a prosecutor, or that he believed the appellant guilty and was aiding in developing his guilt to the jury, this judgment should be reversed, it being a settled rule in this state that the judge's mouth must be closed against any expression tending to show his opinion of the guilt of the accused. Nor will he be permitted by 'his conduct' to exhibit to the jury his opinion that the accused is guilty, nor his opinion as to the truth or falsity or weight of the testimony, nor the credit to be given any witness. Was the conduct of the judge under discussion calculated to impress the jury that he believed him guilty, or that he desired that the accused should be convicted? We think not. The matter sought to be elicited from the witness was important testimony, and it required caution in the questions propounded to him to prevent leading or suggesting to him the answer. The questions 57 L. R. A.

written by the judge accomplished the purpose without being obnoxious to either objections."

g. Cross-examination of witnesses.

The cases as to the right of the trial court to cross-examine witnesses indicate that, while they sustain the right, the court is held to the same strictness as attorneys, and any indication of prejudice or bias will entitle a reversal.

In State v. Lockett, 168 Mo. 480, 68 S. W. 563, it was held that the trial court had the undoubted right to question or cross-examine any witness provided this were done within such bounds as controlled attorneys in similar interrogations.

In Gordon v. Irvine, 105 Ga. 144, 31 S. E. 151, it was held that the judge has the right to interrogate a witness introduced by either party; but this should not be done in such a way as would have a tendency to cast discredit upon the witness. While the form of the question put to the witness in this case by the judge was not entirely proper, yet a new trial would not be granted on this account, when it appeared from the entire evidence that the verdict was manifestly correct. In this case the court said: "The rather rigid cross-examination and repeated pressure upon the witness on a particular point in his testimony might possibly have been calculated to lead the jury to infer that the judge had very decided convictions in his own mind as to what was the real truth of the transaction. The form and character of the question at this particular point of the trial had too much the appearance of the court taking charge of the plaintiff's case. We cannot, therefore, approve the way in which the judge conducted this examination. But, under our view of this case, the verdict is manifestly correct, and we do not think the court's interference by interrogating the witness is so serious as to require a new trial."

Where the judge took the cross-examination of several of the witnesses out of the hands of the lawyer, and conducted it himself, it was held that, while such a course was not commendable, it would not be held error. State v. Atkinson, 33 S. C. 100, 11 S. E. 693.

See Barlow Bros. Co. v. Parsons, 73 Conn. 696, 49 Atl. 205, infra, II. h; Sessions v. Rice, 70 Iowa, 306, 30 N. W. 735, supra, II. a.

h. Showing partiality or prejudice.

In general, it may be said that conduct of the court in questioning witnesses that indicates partiality or prejudice will be held erroneous. This has been held especially where the court took the examination of the witness out of the hands of the attorney and acted as attorney in the case. So, where a judge intimates that a witness is unworthy of belief, or expresses opinions on the replies elicited by him from the witnesses, it will be held erroneous. In Georgia, while it has been held that there is no limit to the power of the court to interrogate witnesses, it is also held that prejudicial comments on the answers of the witnesses will be held error.

In Boite v. Third Ave. R. Co. 38 App. Div. 234, 57 N. Y. Supp. 1134, it was held error for the court to take the examination of the witnesses out of the hands of the plaintiff's counsel, and to bring out plaintiff's case upon points which have not yet been touched upon, where this occurred with every witness of plaintiff, and where the court did not help the defendant to elucidate any facts as he had done for the plaintiff, and where many of the questions propounded by the court were leading.

In Riegler v. Tribune-Asso. 41 App. Div.

490, 58 N. Y. Supp. 807, the court said: "On this motion the appellants lay great stress upon the fact that the opinion failed to discuss the point that a new trial should be granted upon the ground of the decision in Bolte v. Third Ave. R. Co. 38 App. Div. 234, 57 N. Y. Supp. 1134, argued at the February term. That was an exceptional case, the decision of which depended on the peculiar features presented. Upon full consideration of this case, and after a careful examination of the record, we are satisfied that such circumstances and conditions as required the action taken in the Bolte Case did not appear in this. It did not seem to us necessary to discuss the differences that existed."

In Knox v. Fuller, 23 Wash. 34, 62 Pac. 181, the court took the examination of the witnesses out of the hands of the attorney, and indulged in remarks about counsel beating around the bush. This was held to be improper. But the injury in this case was held not to be prejudicial on account of the evidence given. In this case the court said: "Ordinarily such an examination by the court would have its influence on the minds of the jury, prejudicial to the party calling the witness."

In a prosecution for keeping a disorderly house the defendant declined to cross-examine a witness for the state. The judge whispered to the witness and then told him, if he knew any fact or circumstance, not already stated, that would tend to establish the character of the defendant, or of the house, to state it. The witness then made statements in regard to his son visiting the house, and that he and his wife went there to take their son away, and that he heard angry talking in the house between his wife and someone else. It was held that it was not the province of a judge to confer privately with a witness, either in or out of court, to ascertain whether he had knowledge of particular facts, or to suggest to a witness, after his examination, that there were facts other than those to which he had testified within his knowledge. Sparks v. State, 59 Ala. 82. In this case the court said that it is the duty of the judge "to propound to the witnesses such questions as he may deem necessary to elicit any relevant and material evidence, without regard to the effect of such evidence, whether it may benefit or prejudice the one party or the other. The development and establishment of the truth is his purpose and duty."

And where the judge frequently questioned the witnesses, always in the interest of the prosecution, and often by leading questions, it was held that the impression would be given to the jury that the defendant was guilty, and it was held erroneous. People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752.

The action of the trial judge in questioning the witness on immaterial, new matter which tended to prejudice the jury was held erroneous, in Flinn v. Ferry, 127 Cal. 648, 60 Pac. 434. In this case the court said: "It is the duty of the court, in the trial of a case before a jury, to confine the testimony to the issues, and to sustain objections to all proper questions asked by counsel, which would only tend to prejudice the jury against either party. Such questions are none the less erroneous because asked by the presiding judge. In fact, they would generally be much more injurious. We think the questions were improper, and the error such as must have injured the plaintiff's cause."

And, where the court, after the cross-examination, undertook the examination of a witness in the form generally of cross-examination 57 L. R. A.

questions, and commented upon the replies of the witness in the style of censures and upbraiding, indicating with painful distinctness that the judge regarded the witness as unworthy of belief, and did all these in the presence of the jury, it was held to be erroneous. Barlow Bros. Co. v. Parsons, 73 Conn. 698, 49 Atl. 205. In this case it was said: "It is undoubtedly within the authority of a trial judge to ask a question, or repeated questions, of a witness. Sometimes this might be desirable to call out some fact which the jury ought to know; and such judge may, perhaps, indicate his opinion as to the credibility of the evidence, so long as he leaves the question open to the jury. The credibility of any witness, as to the weight to be given to his testimony, is a matter wholly within the province of the jury. Any conduct by a trial judge in the examination of a witness, which in effect imposes upon the jury his own belief as to the credibility of that witness, is not justifiable. Such conduct would be a departure by the judge from his own proper sphere, and an invasion of the province of the jury. We are also of the opinion that, having asked these questions in the manner as shown, the judge should have carefully instructed the jury that any indication of his own opinion as to the credibility of Mr. Merriman was not binding on them. Nothing of that kind was said. There was manifest error."

And where a witness testified to the peaceful character of the defendant, and there was no evidence of the defendant having beaten his wife, and the judge asked the witness: "Have you not heard that defendant once beat his wife with a butcher's file?"—It was held that this question ought not to have been asked by the judge, because it probably produced the impression that he considered the defendant a bad man, as he intimated that he had heard about the defendant beating his wife; and because it intimated an opinion against the defendant. Harris v. State, 61 Ga. 359.

The ruling in this and the next case, taken in connection with the following case, indicates that the trial court in these two cases overstepped the line, by reason of the manner of the examination and the comments on the witness's evidence, showing bias and prejudice.

So where, in a criminal case, the vital issue of fact was whether or not the alleged crime was committed within the period of the statute of limitations, and the judge, while a witness for the state was on the stand, carried him through a rigid examination upon this point, eliciting from the witness answers which failed to establish the time when the crime was committed, the witness giving answers to the effect that it may or may not have been perpetrated within the period of the statute of limitations, it was held error for the judge, when the witness had finally brought the time within the statute, to remark within the hearing of the jury: "That is sufficient." Hubbard v. State, 108 Ga. 780, 33 S. E. 814. In this case the court said: "This, under the circumstances of the case, might be fairly construed as such an expression of opinion on the evidence as, under § 1032 of the Penal Code, imperatively requires the grant of a new trial."

So, where the court said to a witness: "How do you remember dates so well? You have a talent, a gift, that way;" and when another witness, Sam. Webb, was introduced, the court said: "The witness has not got the money that John Carr has. Do you know John Carr? He has a better recollection than you. Which is the elder man, you or he?" and again, when John Carr was recalled, the court said to him: "You have established a reputation for a good recollection, but you cannot tell the price of wheat that year; you ought to keep that reputation up."—It was held that all these questions were out of order, the effect on the jury not being known. Hudson v. Hudson, 90 Ga. 581, 16 S. E. 349. In this case the court said: "The court may often with great propriety ask questions of a witness on the stand for the purpose of bringing out the facts of the case, but should never indulge in remarks to witnesses, or in comments upon their testimony, which may either magnify or diminish its effect upon the jury as to credibility or value."

But in Eppe v. State, 19 Ga. 102, where the court took the examination of the witness out of the hands of the prosecuting attorney and examined him himself, it was held not to be erroneous. In this case the court said: "We know of no limit to the right which belongs to the court, of interrogating witnesses, either in civil or criminal cases, especially the latter. The life or death of a man may hang upon a full development of the truth. The presumption that this liberty will not be honorably and impartially exercised is not to be tolerated for a moment. When they see, therefore, that a material fact has been omitted, which ought to be brought out, it is not only the right, but the duty, of the presiding judge, to call the attention of the witness to it, whether it makes for or against the prosecution; his aim being neither to punish the innocent nor screen the guilty, but to administer the law correctly."

1. Objection and exception to action of trial court.

The weight of authority seems to be that objection and exception must be taken, at the time, to the action of the court in questioning witnesses, or the alleged error will not be reviewed. To this there are some exceptions.

In Huffman v. Cauble, 86 Ind. 591, the court asked a witness, in regard to a settlement, what were his intentions as to settling all accounts between him and the plaintiff. The objection to this was on the ground that there were plenty of lawyers to represent the plaintiff without the aid of the court, and that it tended to prejudice the defendant. It was held that this objection was properly overruled.

And where objections to questions of the court were not specific, it was held that they would not be considered on appeal. Dunn v. People, 172 Ill. 582, 60 N. E. 137. In this case the court said: "It is a task of great delicacy and much difficulty for a presiding judge to so conduct the examination of a witness that nothing, in either the tone or inflection of the voice, the play of the features, the manner of propounding or framing the question, or the course of investigation pursued in the examination, will indicate to the jury the trend of the mind of the questioner. An extended examination of a witness by the court must be unfair unless it partakes partly of the nature of a cross-examination, and though great skill and tact and perfect fairness be employed, there is much danger the impression or opinion of the court as to the truthfulness, candor, and reliability of the witness, and as to the weight and value of his testimony, will be manifested to the jury. . . . It is believed the instances are rare, and the conditions exceptional in a high degree, which will justify the presiding judge in entering upon and conducting an extended examination of a witness."

So, where the court propounded questions to a witness, but they were not embodied in the motion for a new trial, it was held that they would not be reviewed. State v. Nickens, 122 Mo. 607, 27 S. W. 389. In this case the court said: "This contention, however, seems to be without merit. It would be, indeed, strange if the trial judge were not permitted to ask such question of witnesses during the trial as he thought necessary for his own information, or that of the jury, without being subject to unjust criticism. It was not only his right, but his duty, to do so."

Where it was claimed that a judge instructed a witness to "state all you heard and said," and this statement was denied by the court, it was held that the denial would have to be accepted as correct. State v. Robinson, 52 La. Ann. 616, 27 So. 124. In this case the court said: "There is force in the objection of the accused to the method of examination adopted, and it should not be followed. The declaration made by a judge, in his addendum to a bill of exceptions, that there was nothing in which any exceptions or objections could be leveled, is a mere conclusion by him as to matters which it is the object of the bill to have the appellate court itself determine."

But in State v. Marshall, 105 Iowa, 38, 74 N. W. 768, it was held that an attorney need not object to the examination of a witness by the court, but he may move to strike out the evidence immediately upon the conclusion of the judge's examination. In this case it was said: "The authorities are agreed that a judge may ask questions leading in character. . . . But in other respects his examination of a witness is subject to such legal objections as may be interposed when conducted by a party or his attorney."

In State v. Crofts, 22 Wash. 245, 60 Pac. 403, some leading questions were asked before an objection was made. The court discusses at length the delicate position in which attorneys are placed in making objection to the court in questioning a witness, and holds that, notwithstanding the rule that exceptions not made will not be considered on appeal, in a case where the judge places the attorney in such a position, the rule will be disregarded, and holds that an attorney is not compelled to prejudice his case by opposing the court in objecting to all the questions. It was further held that no exception is necessary where a constitutional right was invaded.

2. Summary.

It may be said that the weight of authority is that the court has the discretionary power to call other witnesses to the stand, and examine them, or cause them to be examined, in the interest of truth and justice. Unquestionably, the court may ask questions in order that other questions may be understood by the witness, or that the witness may be understood. So, he may ask questions to keep the witness within bounds, or to draw the facts from a reluctant witness. He may suggest a change in the form of a question. The court may cross-examine witnesses if he does not show partiality, prejudice, or bias. As to leading questions, there is some doubt in permitting the trial court to do that which neither attorney is allowed to do, and there is a conflict of authority on this question. Any action of the court showing partiality, prejudice, or bias in any of these matters will be held erroneous, particularly unfavorable comments on answers by witnesses to questions put by the court. There are some cases that take the ground that in all these matters it is safer ground for the court to try the case as made by the parties or attorneys, and that it is dangerous for the court to take a hand in the proceedings on account of its influence and the difficulty of refraining from showing favor or prejudice. For this reason, some cases suggest that on appeal it is not necessary to apply the rule that exceptions not taken at the time to the action of the court will not be considered, but the weight of authority requires adherence to this rule. I. T.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

LINCOLN SAVINGS BANK & SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY

v.

William G. MORRISON et al.

City of LINCOLN, Intervener, Plff. in Err.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. Misappropriation of a trust fund does not entitle cestui que trust, merely as such, and for that reason alone, to a preference over general creditors of an insolvent trustee.
2. In order to obtain a preference, cestui que trust must show that the estate out of which he claims such preference has been increased to some extent by the misappropriation of the trust property, and he is entitled to a preference to the extent of such increase only.
3. Where a trustee mingles trust moneys with his own funds, cestui que trust is entitled to a charge upon the whole; and, so long as any portion of the mass into which the trust fund has entered remains in any form, it is subject to such charge, and may be followed and claimed.
4. The burden is upon cestui que trust to show that the trust money did in fact increase the estate out of which he seeks a preference, or is represented therein in some form. But it seems that where such money has gone into the general estate of a trustee who afterwards becomes insolvent, there is a presumption that it remains therein at his insolvency; and the courts will not say that it cannot be traced or has wholly disappeared, where the contrary may fairly be inferred.
5. It is presumed that moneys drawn out of a fund wherein the trustee has mingled his own money and that of cestui que trust are his own, and, so long as any portion of the fund so constituted remains, it may be followed, and the charge of cestui que trust thereon may be asserted.
6. But if the whole of such fund, or a greater portion thereof than that representing the trustee's own money, is used by an insolvent trustee in paying his debts, cestui que trust is not entitled to a preference over general creditors for the amount of his money so lost.
7. Property or assets of the insolvent trustee, acquired before, or with the proceeds of property held before, the trust money came into his hands, and not in any way mingled therewith, are not subject to any lien of claim in cestui que trust, and

*Headnotes by POUND, C.

NOTE.—As to preference of claim of cestui que trust to funds in hands of receiver, see also, in this series, Kimmel v. Dickson (S. D.) 25 L. R. A. 309, and Marquette Fire & W. Comrs. v. Wilkinson (Mich.) 44 L. R. A. 493.

As to preference of a claim against the assets of the latter with respect thereto are those of a general creditor only.

8. A change in the form of a portion of a fund in which money of the trustee personally and of cestui que trust has been mingled is not necessarily a withdrawal of such portion. When the trustee retains such portion and dissipates the remainder, the portion retained in the altered form is taken to represent such fund, and may be claimed by cestui que trust.
9. Where a portion of a fund made up of trust money and of individual money of the trustee is invested, and a profit results, cestui que trust, in following the trust money into the investment, may claim such profits as the proceeds of the original fund upon which he had a charge,—at least to the extent of said charge upon the original fund.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment entered in the insolvency proceedings of the Lincoln Savings Bank & Safe Deposit Company, which denied a preference to intervener to payment of its claim out of the funds in the possession of the bank. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Lambertson & Hall, for plaintiff in error:

The law in such a case as this is properly laid down in State v. Midland State Bank, 52 Neb. 1, 71 N. W. 1011, and Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 786, 60 N. W. 115.

All that is necessary for the city to do, in order to recover in this case, is to show that its money was loaned to the Lincoln Savings Bank by its treasurer, and that the Lincoln Savings Bank knew at the time it accepted this money that it belonged to the city of Lincoln, and that it had a large amount of property when it suspended.

Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assn. v. Morris, 36 Neb. 33, 53 N. W. 1037; Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 786, 60 N. W. 115.

sets of an insolvent bank for a deposit creating a trust, see Bruner v. First Nat. Bank (Tenn.) 34 L. R. A. 532, and note; Richardson v. New Orleans Debenture Redemption Co. (C. C. App. 5th C.) 52 L. R. A. 67; and Richardson v. Olivier (C. C. App. 5th C.) 53 L. R. A. 113.

The duty of the bank when it received said funds from the treasurer of the city of Lincoln was to keep them inviolate, separate, and distinct; not to invest them in securities, nor to pay them out to the depositors of the bank, nor to use said funds in any form whatever, but to have them ready for the city of Lincoln whenever they were called for. Can it be possible that the rights of the municipality are no more sacred than those of the individual? In the one case the right of debtor and creditor is established, that of bank and depositor; in the other case the fiduciary relation of trustee and beneficiary; and the abuse of such a trust can confer no rights on the party abusing it, or upon those who claim any privity with him.

2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1258; Snell, Principles of Equity, 155.

As the money was a trust fund and never belonged to the bank, its creditors can have no greater rights in and to said money than the bank.

Messrs. A. S. Tibbetts and L. C. Burr for defendants in error.

Pound, C., filed the following opinion:

This is a petition in error prosecuted by the city of Lincoln, an intervener in a suit brought to wind up the Lincoln Savings Bank & Safe Deposit Company, other phases whereof have been before this court several times. The plaintiff in error by its petition in intervention sought a preference over general creditors for some $5,000,—a balance of moneys of said city loaned to the bank upon certificate of deposit by the city treasurer in contravention of law, and with knowledge on the part of the bank officers as to whose moneys it was. It appeared from a stipulation of the parties and from the evidence adduced that on April 9, 1895, the city treasurer placed $6,095.35 of the city's funds in the bank, taking a certificate of deposit therefor. Afterwards $1,055.35 was paid on the certificate, and a new certificate was issued for $5,000. After said deposit was made, the bank had on deposit, in all, about $240,000, of which $41,699.96 was on hand in cash. On December 16, 1895, the bank suspended. At that time the deposits had fallen to about $150,000, or, to be precise, $92,534.43 had been paid out to depositors between the time when the city's money had been placed in the bank and the date of suspension. No money was loaned and no investments were made during this period, except that on April 16, 1895, the bank bought state warrants of the market value of $36,750, using in payment therefor $1,750 of the cash on hand, and $35,000 borrowed of a bank in New York. The remainder of the cash on hand on April 9, 1895, and such moneys as accrued from collection or sale of paper already in the bank, it used in paying depositors and in running expenses. At the time the bank suspended there was but $200 cash on hand. This sum had been pledged to secure sureties upon a supersedeas bond in a case wherein judgment had been rendered against the bank, and was afterwards applied upon such judgment. A receiver was appointed on January 22, 1896. When he took possession he received $1,562.61 in cash, and "cash items" to the amount of $239.07. He also received $3,334.37 from sale of the warrants above referred to; such sum being the $1,750 originally invested therein, and the profit after repaying the money borrowed to make the purchase. But it appears from the evidence that the cash and cash items which came into the hands of the receiver accrued from loans made by the bank, or from paper which it held, before the city's money was deposited therein. The district court, upon this testimony, found generally for the receiver, and dismissed the city's petition.

Under the rulings of this court in Morrison v. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 57 Neb. 225, 77 N. W. 655, and State v. Bank of Commerce, 54 Neb. 725, 75 N. W. 28, several of the questions raised may be disposed of readily. But the former case does not of necessity involve the questions presented by the case at bar, nor were the facts such as to require an affirmance of State v. Bank of Commerce, 54 Neb. 725, 75 N. W. 28, while the latter case is vigorously assailed by counsel, and we are asked to overrule it, and to reaffirm the rule recognized in prior decisions. Ordinarily we should not feel justified in reviewing a question determined by two recent decisions of this court. Were it a mere matter of these two decisions, so long as we feel satisfied that they are sound, we should do no more than cite them, and proceed to apply them to this controversy. But in several prior cases (State ex rel. Ladenburger v. State Bank, 42 Neb. 896, 61 N. W. 252; State v. Midland State Bank, 52 Neb. 1, 71 N. W. 1011; and especially Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 786, 69 N. W. 115), this court had expressly or by strong implication recognized and adopted a different rule. The cases last cited are sought to be distinguished in State v. Bank of Commerce, 54 Neb. 725, 75 N. W. 28. Counsel have pointed out, however, that the attempt to distinguish the latter case from Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 786, 69 N. W. 115, is founded on an entire misapprehension of the facts there presented; and, in any event, the reasoning in these two cases and the authorities severally relied on therein cannot be reconciled. For this reason we think it expedient to state plainly that this court no longer adheres to the extreme view as to the right of cestui que trust to be preferred on insolvency of the trustee, expressed in the cases of State v. State Bank, State v. Midland State Bank, and Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, but adheres to the position taken in State v. Bank of Commerce, 54 Neb. 725, 75 N. W. 28, and Morrison v. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 57 Neb. 225, 77 N. W. 655, to set forth our reasons for rejecting the one view and adopting the other; and to state as clearly and definitely as we may the rules by which causes such as the one at bar are to be decided.

The origin of the rules now recognized with respect to following trust money which has been mingled with the personal funds of the trustee, or has passed into his general estate, is to be found in the opinion of Jessel, M. R., in Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696. Prior to that decision it was said that money had no earmark, and that when a trust fund, in the form of money, became mingled with the moneys of the trustee personally, it lost its identity and could not be traced. Since that vigorous and convincing judgment, the idea that money, as such, could not be traced, and that trust property lost its identity when turned into money and confused with the trustee's funds, has been abandoned completely. But the limits of the extension of the rights of cestui que trust with respect to the property of insolvent trustees, to which the decision in Knatchbull v. Hallett gave rise, were not perceived at first. All which that decision did was to wipe out the old dogma that money had no earmark, and to substitute the sensible rule that whenever trust property enters into a mass, to which the property of cestui que trust and that of the trustee have contributed, so long as the trust property remains in or forms a part of such mass, cestui que trust has a claim or charge thereon to that extent, and general creditors cannot take advantage of, or derive a benefit from, the increase in the assets due and traceable to misappropriation of the trust fund. Several courts in this country, however, went much further, and established a rule which, though generally abandoned or modified in the more recent authorities, is still adhered to in some quarters, and at one time had the support of the decisions of this court. McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 57 Am. Rep. 287, 28 N. W. 173, 214; First Nat. Bank v. Hummel, 14 Colo. 259, 8 L. R. A. 788, 23 Pac. 986; Peak v. Ellicott, 30 Kan. 156, 46 Am. Rep. 90, 1 Pac. 499; Myers v. Clay Center Bd. of Edu. 51 Kan. 87, 32 Pac. 658; Evangelical Synod v. Schoenich, 143 Mo. 652, 45 S. W. 647; Tierman v. Security Bldg. & L. Asso. No. 2, 152 Mo. 135, 53 S. W. 1072; Independent District v. King, 80 Iowa, 497, 45 N. W. 908; Davenport Plow Co. v. Lamp, 80 Iowa, 722, 45 N. W. 1049. The supreme court of Iowa has receded somewhat in Eureka Dist. Twp. v. Farmers' Bank, 88 Iowa, 194, 55 N. W. 342. And a divided court in Wisconsin has overturned McLeod v. Evans, 57 L. R. A.

66 Wis. 401, 57 Am. Rep. 287, 28 N. W. 173, 214, which was itself the decision of a divided court. Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Flanders, 87 Wis. 237, 58 N. W. 383. See also Bircher v. Walther, 163 Mo. 461, 63 S. W. 691. But this court, in Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 786, 69 N. W. 115, expressly refused to follow the latter case, and adhered to McLeod v. Evans. In the view of these authorities, if trust property has been misappropriated and has gone into the estate of the trustee, cestui que trust is to be preferred, and is to receive his money to the exclusion of general creditors. As the court put it in Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 786, 69 N. W. 115, the question is not one of identifying or claiming a sum actually deposited, but of compelling the insolvent to first restore the trust property, treating that as something which he had no power to commingle with other funds, but must keep whole and make up so long as he has any funds or property out of which to do so. Other cases do not go so far expressly, but reach the same result, either by holding that, if the insolvent trustee uses the whole fund to pay his debts, the effect is to increase his general estate, and create a charge thereon in favor of cestui que trust, or by ruling that, when the trust fund is once traced into the general property of the trustee, it is conclusively presumed to remain there. McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 57 Am. Rep. 287, 28 N. W. 173, 214; Peak v. Ellicott, 30 Kan. 156, 46 Am. Rep. 90, 1 Pac. 499; Myers v. Clay Center Bd. of Edu. 51 Kan. 87, 32 Pac. 658; Independent District v. King, 80 Iowa, 497, 45 N. W. 908.

We are not able to agree to the rule just stated in any of the forms which it has assumed. We are satisfied that the court did well when, in State v. Bank of Commerce, it withdrew its support therefrom, and took a position in accord with the great weight of recent authority. The court was in error in saying (54 Neb. 731, 75 N. W. 28) that the moneys which came into the hands of the receiver of the Capital National Bank on its insolvency were more than sufficient to meet the preferred claims established in Capital Nat. Bank v. Coldwater Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 786, 69 N. W. 115, and its companion cases. Such sum was greater than the preferred claim established in any one suit, but the aggregate considerably exceeded it, and the record in each case showed that fact. Hence State v. Bank of Commerce is not reconcilable with prior decisions of the court, and must stand on its own foundation, which we think it may do safely. Not only is it in accord with the overwhelming majority of recent decisions upon this point, and with the general tendency to abandon or recede from McLeod v. Evans and the cases following that decision, but on principle is clearly right. Of express decisions in the last three years upon this very point, we may cite Ellicott v. Kuhl, 60 N. J. Eq. 333, 46 Atl. 945; Collins v. Stewart, 58 N. J. Eq. 392, 44 Atl. 467; Collins v. Lewis, 60 N. J. Eq. 488, 46 Atl. 1098; Twohy Mercantile Co. v. Melbye, 78 Minn. 357, 81 N. W. 20; Beard v. Independent District, 31 C. C. A. 562, 60 U. S. App. 372, 88 Fed. 375; Robinson v. Woodward, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1142, 48 S. W. 1082; Wulbern v. Timmons, 55 S. C. 456, 33 S. E. 568; Byrne v. McGrath, 130 Cal. 316, 62 Pac. 559; Shute v. Hinman, 34 Or. 578, 47 L. R. A. 265, 56 Pac. 412, 58 Pac. 882; Bircher v. Walther, 163 Mo. 461, 63 S. W. 691. The cases and many others cited in State v. Bank of Commerce, 54 Neb. 725, 75 N. W. 28; and Morrison v. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 57 Neb. 225, 77 N. W. 655, establish clearly that misappropriation of a trust fund does not entitle cestui que trust, merely as such, and for that reason alone, to a preference over general creditors of an insolvent trustee. So long as the trust property, in any shape or form, can be recognized, it belongs to cestui que trust. So long as it enters into any fund property, or mass of assets in any way, cestui que trust has a charge or lien, which he may enforce upon the whole. But if the trustee "destroys a trust fund by dissipating it altogether, there remains nothing to be the subject of a trust." Wood, V. C., in Frith v. Cartland, 2 Hem. & M. 417. In such case, cestui que trust has no specific claim against any property or fund. He is merely a creditor of the trustee, and stands on the same basis as other creditors. The right to a preference is based on his ownership of some specific fund or assets, or on a claim or charge upon all the fund or assets, because his property is contained in, or has contributed to, them. In other words, to obtain a preference, cestui que trust must show that the estate out of which he claims such preference has been increased to some extent by the misappropriation of the trust property, and he is entitled to a preference to the extent of such increase only. This proposition in no way detracts from, and is but another way of stating, the general rule, announced in the cases cited, that, where a trustee mingles trust moneys with his own funds, cestui que trust is entitled to a charge upon the whole, and, so long as any portion of the mass into which the trust fund has entered remains in any form, it is subject to such charge, and may be followed and claimed. In State v. Bank of Commerce and Morrison v. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. it was held that the burden is upon cestui que trust to show that the trust money did in fact increase the estate out of which he seeks a preference, or is represented therein in some form. This is only to say that a plaintiff must prove his case. He claims a specific fund as his, or he claims a charge on the general mass of assets, and he must show the facts to justify his claim. But we think this should not be pushed too far. When it is once proved that trust money has gone into the general estate of a trustee who afterwards becomes insolvent, it would seem that we ought to presume, in the absence of other evidence, that it remains therein at his insolvency, and that we ought not to say it cannot be traced, or has wholly disappeared, 57 L. R. A.

where the contrary may fairly be inferred. Sherwood v. Central Michigan Sav. Bank, 103 Mich. 109, 61 N. W. 352; Independent District v. King, 80 Iowa, 498, 45 N. W. 908. In the case at bar the city showed that its money was put into, and became part of, the general fund of "cash on hand" in the bank. It appeared also that the receiver came into possession of cash or "cash items" amounting to some $2,000. If these facts stood alone, we should feel obliged to allow the city a preference to the extent of what came into the receiver's hands when he took possession. State v. Bank of Commerce, 54 Neb. 725, 75 N. W. 28. But as the evidence stands, it is clearly proved that the cash and cash items taken over by the receiver do not represent the city's money in any form. The city's money entered into, and was part of, the $41,000 cash on hand on April 9, 1895. The city had a charge on that fund for its money. Whatever moneys were drawn out of that fund and dissipated are presumed to be those of the bank. The portion that remains in the bank, in whatever form, is taken to be and represent the trust fund, and to be liable to be followed and claimed as such by the city. But if the whole of the cash on hand into which the city's money entered, or a greater portion thereof than that representing the bank's own money, was used in paying off other depositors or in running expenses, the city is not entitled to a preference over general creditors for the amount of its money so lost. Morrison v. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 57 Neb. 225, 77 N. W. 655; Cocin v. Gleason, 105 N. Y. 256, 11 N. E. 504; Collins v. Stewart, 58 N. J. Eq. 392, 44 Atl. 467; Ellicott v. Kuhl, 60 N. J. Eq. 333, 46 Atl. 945.

All of the cash on hand after the city's money became mixed therein, with the exception of the $1,750 used in the purchase of warrants, which will be considered presently, and the $200 in the bank when it suspended, was used in paying debts and expenses. The $200, as has been seen, was pledged to indemnify sureties on the bank's bond, was afterwards paid on the judgment superseded thereby, and never came into the receiver's control. In other words, except said sum of $1,750, it was wholly dissipated. Although there are decisions to the effect that the mere fact of use of the money in the trustee's general business or in paying his debts is, in effect, an increase of the assets, and suffices to create a charge thereon, that position is entirely at variance with the principle by which such cases must be governed, and is repudiated by all the later authorities. Spokane County v. First Nat. Bank, 16 C. C. A. 81, 29 U. S. App. 707, 68 Fed. 979; Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Campbell Commission Co. 77 Fed. 705; Boone County Nat. Bank v. Latimer. 67 Fed. 27; Bircher v. Walther, 163 Mo. 461, 63 S. W. 691. As the court said in Spokane County v. First Nat. Bank, 16 C. C. A. 81, 29 U. S. App. 707, 68 Fed. 979, "even if it is proven that the trust fund has been but recently disbursed, and has been used to pay debts that otherwise would be claims against the estate, there would be manifest inequity in requiring that the money so paid out should be refunded out of the assets; for in so doing the general creditors, whose demands remain unpaid, are, in effect, contributing to the payment of the creditors whose demands have been extinguished by the trust fund." Moreover, in this case the money which came into the hands of the receiver when he was appointed was the proceeds of loans made before the city's money came into the bank. For reasons already stated, it must be manifest that property or assets of the insolvent trustee acquired before, or with the proceeds of property held before, the trust money came into his hands, and not in any way mingled therewith, are not subject to any lien or claim in cestui que trust, and that the rights of the latter with respect thereto are those of a general creditor only. Eureka Dist. Twp. v. Farmers' Bank, 88 Iowa, 194, 55 N. W. 342.

We come now to the money derived from sale of the warrants. It will be remembered that after the city's money came into the bank it bought the warrants, using $1,750 of the moneys in which the funds of the city had been mixed, and $35,000 borrowed on security of the warrants. The receiver contends that since there was over $40,000 in cash in the bank at the time, of which but $6,000 belonged to the city, it will be presumed that the $1,750 was the bank's own money. Such would be the case, without doubt, had the bank withdrawn the money and dissipated it in some fashion. But it did not do this. It merely changed the form of a portion of the fund in which the city's money had been wrongfully mixed. After purchase of the warrants said fund was represented by the cash still in the bank, and by the bank's interest in the warrants. State warrants are readily convertible into cash. If the bank preferred to keep part of its cash fund as warrants, the identity of the fund was not changed. So long as any portion of the fund into which the city's money entered may be traced into money which came to the receiver, the city may assert the claim which it had upon the whole fund. The warrants were all that remained of that fund. In accordance with the presumption that whatever was retained and not dissipated was the city's money, and not the bank's, these warrants and their proceeds in the hands of the receiver represent money to which the city has a prior claim, and in which general creditors have no right to share. The city's right to follow the money does not fail because no one can say what part of the cash on hand in the bank went into the warrants. The city had a charge upon the whole in any form in which the bank might keep it. When all was wasted except the warrants, that charge remained upon them, because they were a part of that fund, though in an altered form. Knatchbull v. Hallett, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 696; Importers' & T. Nat. Bank v. Peters, 123 N. Y. 272, 25 N. E. 319; Byrne v. McGrath, 130 Cal. 318, 62 Pac. 559; Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank v. King, 57 57 L. R. A.

Pa. 202, 98 Am. Dec. 215; Smith v. Combs, 49 N. J. Eq. 420, 24 Atl. 9; Third Nat. Bank v. Stillwater Gas Co. 36 Minn. 75, 30 N. W. 440. We do not think this view of the transaction in question conflicts in any way with the holding of Bradley, J., in Frelinghuysen v. Nugent, 36 Fed. 229, followed in Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693, and Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 33 L. ed. 696, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354, and approved in Morrison v. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 57 Neb. 225, 77 N. W. 655. In Frelinghuysen v. Nugent the cashier of a bank had wrongfully turned over large sums to a partnership engaged in manufacturing, under such circumstances as to make the latter constructive trustees. The evidence indicated that the money had been entirely dissipated, and there was nothing to show that the stock on hand represented the trust fund, or a fund with which it had been mixed in any form. On the contrary, it was clear that said stock had been bought recently on credit, and represented the debts of general creditors. But in the case at bar a portion of the fund into which the city's money entered is traced directly into the warrants, in which form that portion was held till the bank suspended. The warrants were a cash asset, and the money thus held was still fairly to be called a part of the cash fund. It was not made way with, and it came into the receiver's hands, on sale of the warrants, as the last remnant of the fund with which the city's money had been mixed. The city had a charge upon the warrants, as upon the fund with a portion whereof they were bought, for the full amount of its moneys contained in said fund. Hence its claim upon the proceeds is not limited to the $1,750 which was used in buying them, but extends to the profit accruing therefrom, as well. The $3,334.37 which came into the hands of the receiver upon sale of the warrants represents the cash fund in which the city's money was mixed, and the profits of an investment of that fund. The profits of trust money belong to cestui que trust, and we see no warrant for limiting recovery to the actual sum invested, especially where there is not enough, in any event, to satisfy the charge on the original fund. Farmers' & T. Bank v. Kimball Milling Co. 1 S. D. 388, 47 N. W. 402; Brown v. Rickets, 4 Johns. Ch. 303, 8 Am. Dec. 567; Frank's Appeal. 59 Pa. 190; Butler v. Hicks, 11 Smedes & M. 78. We therefore recommend that the order of the district court be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a new order granting the city a preference to the extent of the proceeds of said warrants, namely, $3,334.37.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the order of the District Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to enter an order granting the plaintiff in error a preference to the extent of $3,334.37.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

John E. SATTLER, Admr., etc., of Emanuel Leveroni, Deceased.

- *1. A passenger on a railroad train does not lose his character as such by leaving his car at a regular station from motives of either business or curiosity, although he has not yet arrived at the terminus of his journey.
2. Where, however, the train in which the passenger is being transported is run upon a switch to allow the passage of another train, or is stopped at a place other than that used by the carrier for receiving and discharging passengers, and the stoppage is not for the purpose of allowing passengers to board the train or alight therefrom, one who leaves the train must usually assume all the ordinary risks incident to his action.
3. All passengers actually on the train, whether the same is moving or not, are passengers "being transported over the road," within the meaning of § 3, art. 1, chap. 72, of the Compiled Statutes; and passengers who have left the train at the express or implied invitation of the carrier, for any necessary purpose incident to their journey, are passengers being transported, within the meaning of said section.
4. Where a passenger leaves his car of his own volition, for some purpose of his own, not incident to the journey he is pursuing, and at a place not designed for the discharge of passengers, he cannot claim the protection of § 3, art. 1, chap. 72, of the Compiled Statutes, although the carrier may, under some exceptional circumstances, still owe him the duty imposed on it by the common law.
5. A through train between Denver and Chicago ran onto a side track at an intermediate station to allow the passage of another through train from the east. A through passenger left his car, crossed the main track of the road to the depot, and went to a pump for a drink of water. He filled his cup from the pump, but, before drinking, heard the whistle of the incoming train, and started on a rapid run to regain his car. From the pump the track over which the incoming train was approaching could be seen for about 100 feet, and three steps from the pump toward the track over which the train was approaching the track was visible for a mile or more. When the passenger reached the track the approaching train was about 50 feet distant from him, and running at a high rate of speed. The passenger attempted to pass in front of the train, and was struck by the engine and killed. Held, that under the circumstances he was not "a passenger being transported over the road," within the meaning of § 3, art. 1, chap. 72, of the Compiled Statutes, and the railroad was not liable for damages on account of his death, because of his own negligence.

(May 8, 1902.)

ERROR to the District Court for Cass County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. M. A. Low, W. F. Evans, and Woolworth & McHugh, for plaintiff in error:

Deceased was guilty of gross recklessness. He failed to exercise the slightest care or caution, by reason of which he was struck and killed by the train.

Myers v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 150 Pa. 386, 24 Atl. 747; Rigler v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 94 N. C. 604; Belton v. Baxter, 54 N. Y. 246, 13 Am. Rep. 578.

No obligation rested upon the plaintiff in error to provide a means to enable him to leave or return to the train at that station.

Frost v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 10 Allen, 387, 87 Am. Dec. 668; 2 Rorer, Railroads, pp. 1163, 1164; DeKay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 41 Minn. 178, 4 L. R. A. 632, 43 N. W. 182; State v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 58 Me. 176, 4 Am. Rep. 258.

The carrier was required to afford only a reasonable time for the passengers to alight from or get upon the train, and when that time expired the passengers took the risks and dangers in boarding or leaving the train.

State v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 58 Me. 176, 4 Am. Rep. 258; Chaffee v. Old Colony R. Co. 17 R. I. 658, 24 Atl. 141; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Yost, 61 Neb. 530, 85 N. W. 561.

Section 3, chap. 72, Neb. Comp. Stat. 1899, upon which this instruction is founded, has no application to the case at bar. That statute applies only in cases brought against a railroad company, in which a passenger was injured "while being transported over its road."

If deceased was guilty of any negligence which caused or contributed to his death, even though it was not gross, this action cannot be maintained.

Lincoln v. Gillilan, 18 Neb. 114, 24 N. W. 444.

No person, by his own transgression, can create a cause of action in his own favor against another for not interfering. That to which a man consents, or causes by his own action, cannot be considered an injury for which he can recover damages. Volenti non fit injuria.

Mr. Matthew Gering, for defendant in error:

The deceased was a passenger at the time he was killed, and did not lose his character as such in leaving the car.

Duffie, C., filed the following opinion:

John P. Sattler, the defendant in error, is administrator of the estate of Emanuel Leveroni. The deceased was killed by a train of the railroad company at the station of Alvo, in Cass county, Nebraska, on the 11th of April, 1899. The jury returned a verdict against the company for $4,000, upon which judgment was entered, and the company has brought the case to this court by petition in error.

There is little or no dispute over the facts in the case. Leveroni, the deceased, was a through passenger over the railway of the plaintiff in error from the city of Denver to Chicago. The train upon which he was traveling arrived at the station of Alvo from the west on schedule time, at 2:52 in the afternoon. On its arrival at the station the train went upon a side track to await the arrival and passage of a west-bound train which was then due at that point; its schedule time being the same at that station as the train upon which the decedent was traveling. The train from the east was behind time, and, while the train upon which Leveroni was a passenger was waiting on the side track, Leveroni left his train, and crossed over the main track to the depot platform, and to a pump a few feet west of the depot, to get a drink of water. About the time that he reached the pump the west-bound train was heard to whistle, when Leveroni left the pump, and started on a run for his car, and, in crossing the track upon which the west-bound train was approaching the station, was struck by the approaching train and instantly killed. The east-bound train upon which he was a traveler did not move from the side track until after the deceased was killed, nor had any signal or order been given that said train would move or start. It might be further stated that the evidence is undisputed that there was plenty of good drinking water in the car upon which the deceased was a passenger, and in all the cars of that train.

Two questions are presented by this record for our determination: (1) Was the deceased a passenger, within the legal meaning of that word, after leaving his car while it was standing upon the side track for the purpose of allowing an approaching train to pass? (2) If he was such passenger, can his administrator claim for him or his estate the benefits of the provisions of § 3, art. 1, chap. 72, of the Compiled Statutes of 1901?

Relating to the first question, the courts may be said to be fairly divided. In Maine and Minnesota the rule appears to be that a passenger on a railway, who purchases a ticket for a distant station, and gets off the train temporarily, and without objection or notice, while it is stopping at an intermediate station, surrenders for the time being his place and rights as a passenger. State v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 58 Me. 176, 4 Am. Rep. 258; De Kay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 41 Minn. 178, 4 L. R. A. 632, 43 N. W. 182. See also Missouri P. R. Co. v. Foreman, 73 Tex. 311, 11 S. W. 326. In De Kay v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. the facts were very similar to the facts under consideration in the case at bar. The conclusion of the court upon these facts is well expressed in the syllabus of the case as follows: "Where a passenger enters a railway train, and pays his fare to a particular place, his contract does not obligate the company to furnish him with means of egress and ingress at an intermediate station; and, if he leaves the train at such a station, he, for the time being, surrenders his place as a passenger, and takes upon himself the responsibility of his own movements; but, if he leaves without objection on part of the company, he does no illegal act, and has a right to re-enter and resume his journey. . . . While, if a railway company permits the practice of passengers leaving and re-entering their train while on a side track at an intermediate station for the purpose of letting another train pass on the main track, it is bound to use reasonable care not to expose such passengers to unnecessary danger, yet it is not bound to so regulate its business as to make the side track as safe a place of ingress or egress as the station platform; nor does it give any assurance, under such circumstances, to passengers, that no trains will pass while they are crossing or recrossing the main track. Neither does the call of 'All aboard!' by the conductor of the side-tracked train give an assurance to those who have left their train that they may cross the main track in safety without looking for approaching trains. Passengers who have thus left their train, when they attempt to cross the track, under these circumstances, are bound to exercise reasonable care and caution to avoid injury from passing trains, and must use their senses for that purpose. The station platform, and not the side track, is the proper place to enter or leave a train; and those who, for purposes of their own, use the latter, assume all the extra risks necessarily incident to such a practice, and are bound to exercise a degree of care corresponding to the increased risks." Another class of cases establishes the rule that a passenger on a railroad train does not lose his character as such by alighting from the cars at a regular station from motives of either business or curiosity, although he has not yet arrived at the terminus of his journey. Parsons v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 113 N. Y. 355, 3 L. R. A. 683, 21 N. E. 145; Clusman v. Long Island R. Co. 9 Hun, 618.

Of the two classes of cases which we have been examining, we think that the latter establishes the better rule. In this country of long journeys by railway trains, there can be no impropriety in a passenger claiming the right, which may be said to be established by long custom, to leave his car at any intermediate point on his journey, where a stop of any considerable time is made, to send a message, to obtain exercise and relief by walking up and down the platform, or to gratify his curiosity, provided he does not interfere with the employees of the company, or run counter to any established rule brought to his notice. In the exercise of this privilege he does not lose his character of passenger, and the common-law duties of the carrier are still to be exercised in his behalf, and injuries received on account of a failure on the part of the carrier to observe all its duties toward him required by the rules of the common law must be responded to in an action for damages. We think that the supreme court of Massachusetts has announced the true rule in Dodge v. Boston & B. SS. Co. 148 Mass. 207, 2 L. R. A. 83, 19 N. E. 373, where the following language is used: "To determine the rights of the parties in every case, the question to be answered is, What shall they be deemed to have contemplated by their contract? The passenger, without losing his rights, while he is in those places to which the carrier's care should extend, may do whatever is naturally and ordinarily incidental to his passage. If there are telegraph offices at stations along a railroad, and the carrier furnishes in its cars blanks upon which to write telegraphic messages, and stops its trains at stations long enough to enable passengers conveniently to send such messages, a purchaser of a ticket over the railroad has a right to suppose that his contract permits him to leave his car at a station for the purpose of sending a telegraphic message; and he has the rights of a passenger while alighting from the train for that purpose, and while getting upon it to resume his journey. So if one who leaves a train to obtain refreshment, where it is reasonable and proper for him so to do, and is consistent with the safe continuance of his journey in a usual way. Where one engages transportation for himself by a conveyance which stops from time to time along his route, it may be well implied, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that he has permission to alight for his own convenience at any regular stopping place for passengers, so long as he properly regards all the carrier's rules and regulations, and provided that his doing so does not interfere with the carrier in the performance of his duties."

All the cases agree that the carrier must furnish safe ingress and egress to and from the train for its passengers. In many of the larger stations the passenger has to cross two or three or four tracks in going to or from his train. In such cases he may assume that the company will see that his way across such tracks is clear and uninterrupted, and that no injury will be incurred in crossing the same. In Jewett v. Klein, 27 N. J. Eq. 550, it is held that a person who, in passing from the depot to the train he was about to take, was obliged to cross an intervening track, was not guilty of contributory negligence, in that he did not, before approaching the train, look up or down the track to see whether there was danger from an approaching train, and in that he approached the train diagonally from the platform to the station, and before his train had come to a full stop. Referring to this case, the supreme court of Colorado, in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Shean, 18 Colo. 368, 20 L. R. A. 729, 33 Pac. 108, says: "By the foregoing and well-considered cases it is settled that a passenger on a railroad, while passing from the cars to the depot, is not required to exercise that degree of care in crossing a railroad track as is imposed upon other persons, and that he has the right to assume that the company will discharge its duty in making the way safe, and, relying on this assumption, may neglect precautions that are ordinarily imposed upon a person in holding that relation. And this distinction is to be taken into consideration in determining the propriety of his conduct."

We do not care to extend this rule to passengers who leave the train at an intermediate station at a place other than that used by the carrier for the ingress and egress of its passengers. One who leaves the train at a point not intended for the discharge of passengers, and while the train is standing for some other purpose, must himself assume all the ordinary risks incident to his action. The cases above cited differ from the case at bar in the fact that the passenger left or boarded the train at its regular stopping place, and at the point where passengers were regularly received and discharged.

In the case now under consideration no stop was made to receive or discharge passengers. The train was not run to the depot platform, but was side-tracked to allow the passage of the west-bound train. It is probably true that parties who desired either to board or leave the train at Alvo, and who were aware of the custom of the train to side-track at that point to allow the west-bound train to pass, took advantage of the opportunity thus offered to take passage on the train, or to leave it while standing on the side track; but no inducement to do this was extended by the company, as the evidence discloses that it refused to sell tickets to passengers who desired to take this train at that station. Those on the train must have known that the stop upon the side track was not for the purpose of receiving or discharging passengers, and those who left the train without any express or implied invitation so to do on the part of the company, and without some known reason requiring them to do so, should, in all reason, assume the natural and ordinary risks of their own voluntary action.

A part of the fourth instruction of the court expresses so clearly our views upon this question that we insert it here: "If you find from the evidence that when the said Emanuel Leveroni left his car while standing on the side track at Alvo, Nebraska, he did so without the invitation of the defendant, either express or implied, and not for the purpose of attending to any personal want of his own, usually incident to a through passenger, nor made necessary by the manner in which the defendant's train was operated, then it was his duty, while absent from said train, to exercise ordinary care to avoid any injury to himself; and if you find from the evidence that while so absent from his car he failed to exercise ordinary care, and was injured through his failure so to do, then the defendant would not be liable."

Having now defined what we believe to be the rights of a passenger at common law, we will proceed to examine our statute relating to injuries received by passengers while being transported over a railway, and the questions discussed in the briefs of counsel in the light of that statute.

Section 3, art. 1, chap. 72, of our Compiled Statutes, is as follows: "Every railroad company, as aforesaid, shall be liable for all damages inflicted upon the persons of passengers while being transported over its road, except in cases where the injury done arises from the criminal negligence of the person injured, or when the injury complained of shall be the violation of some express rule or regulation of said road actually brought to his or her notice." In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Landauer, 39 Neb. 803, 58 N. W. 434, it was held that this statute made a common carrier an insurer of the safety of its passengers, except as against the gross negligence of the passenger, or his violation of some rule of the carrier brought to his notice; but up to this time this court has not been called on to determine the particular persons or class of persons taking passage with a railroad company who were intended by the legislature to be included in the phrase "passengers being transported over its road." The plaintiff in error insists that the statute was not intended to cover all cases of injuries to passengers, and its position on this question cannot be more clearly or briefly stated than by quoting from its reply brief: "Although no one but passengers can be brought within the section, yet it is not designed to cover injuries to all passengers. By express provision, as clear and positive language will permit, the section carved out of the general body of passengers of a company the particular class thereof to which it applies. 'Every railroad shall be liable for all damages inflicted upon the person of passengers' (so reads the section) 'while being transported over its road.' The liability imposed by this section with respect to injuries to passengers extends only to those injuries which passengers receive while such passengers 'are being transported over its road.' The clause 'while being transported over its road' is a clear limitation modifying the general word 'passenger' in the section. Therefore, to bring a case within this section, it must be shown that when the injury was received by a person he was not only a passenger, but that at the time of the injury he was, as such passenger, 'being transported over the line of the railroad company.' There is, of course, a manifest reason for this qualifying clause. The purpose of the act was to relieve the passenger injured 'while being transported over the line of the company' from the necessity of specifically proving the act of negligence which caused the injury. The passenger who buys a ticket and takes his seat upon the train may know that the court will presume that any injury which he receives on account of the operation or management of the train will be presumed to be attributable to negligence on the part of the railroad company. The train and all agencies connected with its management belong to the railroad company. All knowledge with respect to the cause of injuries resulting from the operation or management of the train is known to the company, but these causes may be difficult for an injured person to ascertain. The section was designed to relieve the passenger so injured from the necessity of proving the specific act of negligence. The manifest reason for the adoption of this section shows the purpose of the insertion of its provision, 'while being transported over its road.' After a person leaves the train provided for his transportation, then whatever dangers he encounters are dangers not connected with the operation and management of his train; and, if he is injured, he must prove negligence, and recover, if at all, upon the common-law liability. While riding upon the train provided for his transportation, he may not be able to learn the cause of an injury so received, due to the operation and management of the train. Therefore, as was said, this section was provided to relieve him of the necessity of proving such facts. But when the passenger leaves the train provided for his transportation, and is injured by reason of dangers entirely disconnected from the operation and management of his train, then there will be no difficulty in his ascertaining the cause of his injury, and in alleging and proving it in case of suit. Therefore the legislature did not intend that the presumption of negligence provided by the section should apply to such a case; and, to make the meaning clear, the legislature expressly made the section apply, not to injuries to all passengers, but to injuries received by passengers 'while being transported over the road of the company.' The legislature having expressly limited the operation of the statute to the cases of injury received by passengers 'while being transported over the road of a company,' this court cannot obliterate the qualifying clause referred to. This court, in construing this statute, must give effect to every provision thereof. When the legislature expressly limited this section to cases of liability for injuries to those passengers only who were injured 'while being transported over the road of a company,' this court has no power or authority, nor will it have any inclination, to nullify the express will of the legislature, and to extend this section to cases which the legislature expressly excluded from its effect."

We are agreed that the words "while being transported over its road" is a qualifying phrase, intended to limit liability on the part of the company, and that we must give it the force intended by the legislature. We cannot, however, agree with the plaintiff in error that it was intended to exclude all passengers who leave the car provided for them by the carrier. It is well known that many—perhaps most—roads provide eating houses and other accommodations for the comfort or convenience of their patrons, and that regular stops are made for meals, requiring the passengers to leave the car in which they are being transported, and often to cross numerous tracks on their way to and from the car to the dining room or restaurant. In such cases one does not lose his character as a passenger in the course of transportation over the road, or the protection of the statute. The duty of the company to provide him safe egress and ingress for such necessities as are required on his journey, and which the road assumes to furnish, and which it invites him to partake of, is no less stringent than to furnish him safe passage on its cars. While seated in the dining room of the company he is under its control, and must conform to its rules, as fully as while on the train; and, while thus subject to the rules and regulations of the company, he is their passenger, entitled to like protection from damage from the operating of the road as while seated in the car, proceeding on his journey. We believe and hold that it was intended to include in the words "while being transported over its road" all passengers actually on the train, whether the same is in motion or standing on any part of the road; and it further includes those passengers leaving the train for any necessary purpose incident to their journey, such as a change of cars, or to procure refreshments at any point where the same is furnished by the company, and where an express or implied invitation is extended to the passengers to leave the car for that purpose. Where, however, the passenger leaves the car for some purpose of his own, not incident to the journey he is pursuing, and at a place not designed for the discharge of passengers, he cannot claim the benefit of this statute, although the company may in such cases, under certain conditions, owe him the duty imposed on carriers by the common law. Parsons v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 113 N. Y. 355, 3 L. R. A. 683, 21 N. E. 145; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Morgan (Tex. Civ. App.) 64 S. W. 688. The only evidence offered by the company was that of one witness to show that there was plenty of good drinking water in the car in which the deceased was being carried. All of the testimony relating to the circumstances attending the killing of Leveroni came from the witnesses of the plaintiff below. These witnesses all testify that they distinctly heard the whistle of the train approaching from the east. Most of them testify that they saw Leveroni at the pump. One (a Mrs. Brown, a passenger sitting in the car) says that she saw him ascending the steps of the depot platform with a cup in his hand. All who saw him at the pump say that he filled his cup, but that, before he had time to drink, the whistle of the approaching train was heard; that Leveroni thereupon dropped the cup, and ran in a rapid manner for his train. Mrs. Brown relates what occurred as follows: "He went from the steps to the pump, and pumped water into a tin cup which he had. He dropped it. The whistle blew. That is the first warning he had, I am confident." He left the train of his own volition while standing on the side track, and for a wholly unnecessary purpose. In so doing he abandoned the protection of the statute. The witnesses agree that from the pump the railway track can be seen for the distance of 100 feet toward the northeast, from which direction the train was approaching. By taking three steps from the pump toward the main line of the road, the view is unobstructed for a mile or more, and the approaching train could have been seen for that distance. 57 L. R. A.

When Leveroni reached the track, running rapidly to reach his car, the train was about 50 feet away, and running at a high rate of speed. The evidence is convincing that Leveroni heard the whistle of the approaching train. It was that which caused him to drop his cup, and to run hurriedly to reach his car. He attempted to cross the track in a diagonal course, running partly in the same direction with the approaching train. This, however, is no reason why he should not turn his head to ascertain the position of the train, and whether it was safe to attempt to cross ahead of it. As we have seen, Leveroni was not, under the circumstances, "a passenger being transported over the road," within the meaning of the above-quoted statute. His case must therefore be determined by the rules of the common law, in accordance with which he must be held to suffer the consequences of his own carelessness and negligence. With full knowledge, or full opportunity for knowing the danger, he left a place of safety on the platform of the depot, and ran to his death.

We know of no rule of law that allows a recovery under such circumstances, and we recommend that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings according to law.

removal of all garbage, filth, and other noxious and unwholesome substances, ashes, stable manure, rubbish, and other waste and refuse matter accumulating in centers of population, and which, without such regulations, would become nuisances, menacing to the comfort and health of the inhabitants of such cities, and to license persons engaged in such occupation or business.

2. Such cities may also, as incident to the power of regulation, grant an exclusive privilege by contract to one person to collect and remove, under its own immediate direction and control, and in pursuance of regulations enacted for that purpose, those noxious and unwholesome substances which are nuisances per se, and a menace to the public health.
3. The legislature cannot, under the guise of police regulation, arbitrarily invade private property or personal rights. The test when such regulations are called in question is whether they have some relation to the public health or public welfare, and whether such is, in fact, the end sought to be attained.
4. It is not competent for the city, as a police regulation, to grant a monopoly to one individual, by contract, to enter upon the private premises of the inhabitants of the city, and at their expense collect and remove those innoxious substances, such as ashes, clinders, stable manure, or other substances not in themselves nuisances, but which, if allowed to accumulate in unreasonable quantities, would become such, or which may be utilized for some beneficial purpose. Such an attempted exercise of power is in excess of the authority granted by the charter, an invasion of the personal and property rights of the citizens, in restraint of trade, and unnecessarily creates a monopoly.
5. The section of the ordinance of the city of Omaha now under consideration held void and unenforceable, because an attempted exercise of power in excess of the authority conferred by the charter governing such city.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. H. Thompson and W. J. Connell, for plaintiff in error:

The right to grant an exclusive contract and privilege, which necessarily includes the right to deny the privilege to another, has been fully settled by the decisions of this court.

Grand Rapids v. De Vries, 123 Mich. 570, 82 N. W. 269; Smiley v. MacDonald, 42 Neb. 5, 27 L. R. A. 540, 60 N. W. 355; Coombs v. MacDonald, 43 Neb. 632, 62 N. W. 41.

A nuisance of the kind dealt with by this ordinance may be summarily abated.

A. 545, 39 Pac. 710, seems to stand alone in so far as it holds that the regulations for the removal of garbage and filth from a city must leave a way open to every person who will comply with the ordinance to engage at least in so much of the business of scavengers as relates to entering on private property and removing filth and garbage therefrom."

Mr. I. J. Dunn for defendants in error.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error, relators in the court below, sued out a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of regaining their liberty from imprisonment in the city jail, where they were committed for the alleged violation of one of the ordinances of the city of Omaha; it being alleged as a ground for the issuance of the writ, and contended at the trial, that the section of the ordinance authorizing their conviction and imprisonment was null and void, and their detention, therefore, unlawful. A trial in the district court resulted in a judgment holding the section of the city ordinance under which the conviction was had void, and discharging the relators from custody. The respondent, as custodian of the prisoners under the commitment issue on conviction in the criminal trial, prosecutes error proceedings in this court for the purpose of obtaining a reversal of the judgment discharging the relators from custody. The question determined in the lower court, and the only one of a substantial character involved in the controversy, is with relation to the validity of an ordinance numbered 4462, of the city of Omaha, entitled "An Ordinance Regulating the Collection and Removal of Dead Animals, Garbage, Manure, Ashes, Filth, Offal, Night Soil and Other Refuse Matter, Providing Penalties for the Violation of the Provisions Hereof, and Repealing Ordinances Numbered 3735, 3869, 4008, and 4080." Section 1 of said ordinance, which is the one directly bearing on the subject, and which it is contended is void, provides that any person who shall collect or remove any dead animals, garbage, ashes, filth, offal, night soil, or other refuse matter within the corporate limits of the city of Omaha, not having a contract with said city so to do, shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than $5 nor more than $20. The relators were charged and convicted of unlawfully collecting and removing garbage, ashes, filth, and other refuse matter without having a contract with the city, contrary to the provisions of said § 1. The object of the ordinance, which is rendered obvious from a reading of the whole of it, is to empower the city to enter into an exclusive contract with some individual, association, or corporation to collect and remove within the corporate limits of the city all of the substances, materials, and objects mentioned in § 1, which, if allowed to accumulate in a city, would become a nuisance; to provide maximum charges therefor, to be paid by the owner or occupant of the premises from which removed; to regulate the collection and removal; and to punish anyone engaging in such business without having a contract with the city therefor. If the city is empowered to enact an ordinance providing that a contract shall first be entered into with it before any person is authorized to do any of the things prohibited, it follows as a legal sequence that the city may grant an exclusive right to one individual with whom it may enter into a contract and refuse to contract with all others; that is, if it is authorized to contract at all, it may lawfully contract with one or more, as may best suit its own views as to the propriety, necessity, and terms upon which it will enter into such contractual relation with another. Over the objections of the city, and for the purpose of showing the city was incapacitated from contracting with the relators, there was offered at the trial of the cause in the court below and received in evidence a contract with one McDonald, giving to him the exclusive right to collect and remove within the corporate limits all of the things mentioned in § 1 of the ordinance. Aside, however, from this evidence, we regard it as altogether clear that, if the section of the ordinance mentioned is sustained as valid, it must be done on the theory that the city may lawfully provide by exclusive contract for one contractor alone to engage in the business of collecting and removing the garbage and other waste matter mentioned in the ordinance, and to exclude all others from such business by suitable penalties for a violation of the provisions of the act. In fact, counsel for plaintiff in error fairly and frankly meets the issue in his brief by asserting: "The right to grant an exclusive contract and privilege, which necessarily includes the right to deny the privilege to another, has been fully settled by the decisions of this court." The issue is thus directly presented as to the validity of the section of the ordinance under the provisions of which the relators were arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment for its violation, the relators contending that such ordinance is void, as being an unwarranted invasion of private property rights in restraint of trade, creating a monopoly, and contrary to a sound public policy; while respondent maintains that it is a lawful exercise of the police powers invested in the city by its charter for the protection of the health of the inhabitants of the city, and to preserve and promote the public comfort and welfare.

This is the only issue adjudicated in the trial court, and as it involves the substantial merits of the controversy, and goes to the very core of the subject of the litigation, we are disposed to confine ourselves in the consideration of the cause to this question alone, to the exclusion of all collateral matters. The only exception contained in § 1 as to the right of any person save the contractor therein provided for to remove any of the substances spoken of is a proviso that the act shall not apply to anyone hauling their own stable manure from their own premises with their own team or teams, and also a proviso regarding the use of manure for lawns, gardens, etc., under certain regulations, not necessary to mention. By § 11 the word "garbage," as used in the act, is defined to mean all refuse matter, animal or vegetable. It will thus be observed that the act is most sweeping in its character, and in effect, if valid, prohibits any resident of the city himself, or by the employment of another, from undertaking the collection or removal of any or either of the substances mentioned from his own premises, save the one exception noted as to the removal of stable manure by the owner or occupant from his own premises with his own team. All waste material, all accumulation of rubbish of whatsoever character, which, in time, if allowed to accumulate in large quantities, would doubtless become a nuisance, to abate which the city might employ any lawful means, can be collected and removed only by the contractor of the city at the expense of the private owner or occupant of the premises, at charges not exceeding the maximum rate allowed by the ordinance. Can such sweeping powers be justified as a valid exercise of the police powers of the city under its charter authority? By § 54 of the city charter act the corporation is empowered "to make and enforce all police regulations for the good government, general welfare, health, safety, and security of the city and the citizens thereof in addition to the police powers expressly granted herein and in the exercise of the police power may pass all needful and proper ordinances" (Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 148), with provisions for penalties for violations of ordinances enacted under the provisions of said section. The right of a city, under charter acts such as the one we have quoted, to make all needful rules and regulations for the proper collection and removal of all forms of rubbish, waste, and other refuse matter constantly accumulating in cities and towns, where the population is centered in a small territory, in order to protect the health of the inhabitants and preserve the public welfare, to provide the manner, method of collecting such material, and character of the vehicles in which the same shall be removed, and the place of depositing such refuse matter so as not to endanger the public health, and to license those engaging in such industry or business, seems so plain a proposition as to scarcely require elucidation or discussion, and is one on which the text writers and the utterances of all the courts are in entire harmony. Such regulation was clearly contemplated by the legislature in the enactment of the statute quoted from, and to that extent, at least, there is left no room for doubt or difference of opinion. People v. Gordon, 81 Mich. 306, 45 N. W. 658; Ouray v. Corson, 14 Colo. App. 345, 59 Pac. 876; Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 187, 17 Am. Dec. 351; Boehm v. Baltimore, 61 Md. 259. In the last case cited it is said in the opinion: "The validity of these ordinances was not seriously questioned in argument. That they are a lawful and proper exercise of the power 'to preserve the health of the city and to prevent and remove nuisances' does not admit of doubt. Such powers have been universally granted to municipal corporations in this country. In fact, the preservation of the health and safety of the inhabitants is one of the chief purposes of local government, and reasonable by-laws in relation thereto have always been sustained in England as within the incidental authority of such corporations."

In this jurisdiction we are committed to the doctrine, from which we do not believe it wise to recede, although the authorities are divided, that as to those substances which are in themselves nuisances, and for the protection of the public health require speedy and prompt abatement and removal by the city, or someone by it authorized to perform the work, the exercise of the power is in its nature a public function, to be engaged in by the city in its own behalf or by the employment of such agencies as will best accomplish the desired result, and that regarding such matters the granting of an exclusive privilege by the city to one individual for the removal of such unwholesome substances is not an unlawful exercise of power, nor does it conflict with the principle of law opposed to the creation of monopolies or an invasion of personal rights. The power thus exercised is incidental to the right to prevent and abate nuisances for the better protection of the health of the inhabitants of the city, and to accomplish the desired result the corporation may adopt the method of acting through its own agencies, or one of its own choosing, and directly under its own direction and control. Smiley v. MacDonald, 42 Neb. 5, 27 L. R. A. 540, 60 N. W. 355, which is relied on by the city in the case at bar to sustain the ordinance under consideration. In that case, after quoting from the charter provisions as then existing, which it is to be noted are materially different from those of the present charter, it is said in the opinion: "It requires no argument to prove that the subject of the contract before us is within the strict letter of these provisions of the charter. . . . But the removal of the noxious and unwholesome matter mentioned in the contract tends directly to promote the public health, comfort, and welfare, and is therefore a proper exercise of the police power." It is further held in the opinion that the fact of conferring an exclusive privilege was, as the case was presented, immaterial; that the power conferred by the charter on the city implied the right of the city to determine the means and agencies best adapted to the end in view. The ordinance then under consideration was not by any means of such sweeping character as the one under consideration in the present case. Many rights there reserved to the property owner and occupant as to the disposition of rubbish, débris, and other waste material are by the latter ordinance entirely swept away. As that case was presented and determined, we think it goes no further than to hold that the noxious and unwholesome substances, such as dead animals not killed for food, garbage in the strict sense of the word, and probably other substances which are nuisances per se might lawfully be removed by the city, in its exercise of lawful authority, for the protection and preservation of the health, comfort, and welfare of the inhabitants, or the same end might be accomplished by creating an exclusive agency under the direct control of its own officers to perform the work necessary for such result. This is also the extent of the decision in the Michigan supreme court in the case of Grand Rapids v. De Vries, 123 Mich. 570, 82 N. W. 269, also relied on in support of the contention of the respondent. In the case last cited was involved the question of the authority of the city, in the exercise of its police powers, to grant an exclusive license for the removal of garbage only. Under the ordinance then under consideration, "garbage," as used therein, was defined to mean the refuse accumulation of animal or vegetable matter, liquid or otherwise, attending the preparation, use, cooking, dealing in, or storing meat, fish, fowl, fruit, or vegetable. The court held this to mean such refuse and discarded matter of the kinds mentioned which in fact had been discarded and rejected as of no further use for any beneficial purpose for food of any kind, and that, when so considered, the substances were and should be regarded as in themselves nuisances, for the removal and abatement of which the city could lawfully, by ordinance, grant an exclusive license to one individual as an exercise of the police power for the benefit of the public health. It is also held that the granting of an exclusive license to remove such unwholesome matter is not in restraint of trade, such removal not being a business, trade, or occupation within the meaning of the word when used in stating the principle invoked for the purpose of having the ordinance declared void as being in restraint of trade.

The principle on which rests the right of a city to grant an exclusive privilege to collect and remove those noxious and unwholesome substances which menace the public health and endanger the welfare of the citizens seems to be that not only the prevention and abatement of those accumulations of substances which are in themselves nuisances, and dangerous to the health of a community, is necessary and essential for the preservation of health, but also because of their unwholesome and noxious character the proper and safe removal and disposition of such substances must, for the benefit of the public welfare, be in such manner and methods, at such times, and over such particular routes of travel as will best subserve the public interests, and that this may best be accomplished when such removal is under the direct control and immediate supervision of the city authorities, or with an agency of its own selection, with whom it may contract for such purpose. It is as necessary that the abatement or removal of the nuisance shall be accomplished speedily, in a particular manner, and by certain fixed agencies, ever ready to act, and at all times under the control of the municipality, as it is that such nuisance shall not be permitted to exist in the first instance. It would, therefore, seem that as to those things which are calculated to menace the public health if not properly and in a particular manner disposed of, and are in their nature regarded as nuisances within themselves, it is within the power of a city, for the benefit of the public health, and as a police regulation, not only to provide for the removal of such substances, but also, and as incident of the power of regulation, to grant an exclusive privilege to an individual or corporation by contract entered into for that purpose to perform the work of removal in such manner and methods as will best accomplish the desired result. It appears reasonably clear that such results can be obtained more satisfactorily and with less danger and inconvenience to the health and comfort of the inhabitants by the employment of one who shall at all times be subject to the control and direction of the city, and be held directly responsible to it for any failure to perform in the proper manner and promptly all that shall be necessary to effectuate the desired object. What may be termed for convenience the "dead animal contract cases" illustrate the principle and the reasons therefor most forcibly. In River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 7 Mo. App. 345, it is held that a city ordinance is valid, when passed as a sanitary police regulation, granting the exclusive right to remove the carcasses of dead animals from the streets. It is said in the opinion: "The municipal legislature is especially charged with the preservation of the public health. That high duty lies in prevention, rather than cure. It would be poorly discharged, or not discharged at all, if the surest and most well-known precautionary measures were not thoroughly put in practice against the introduction of disease. In a populous city, where large numbers of animals die every day, it is of the first importance that their carcasses be speedily removed from the centers of human habitation. The city authorities would be grossly derelict if they left the chances of removal to be determined by the owners of the animals or by the enterprise of possible purchasers. They are in duty bound to appoint special agencies for the purpose, and to render performance certain by whatever means their best judgment may suggest. If they find that this certainty can be secured only by confining the agency to a single person or corporation upon terms of responsibility for a failure to perform, it is their duty and their privilege to so secure it. The agency so appointed is rather the instrument in the hands of the municipal authorities for the fulfillment of a public duty than the beneficiary of an exclusive privilege." Says Mr. Justice Field in Alpers v. San Francisco, 32 Fed. 505: "There is no doubt that the contract between the plaintiff and the city and county of San Francisco is one within the competency of the municipality to make. It is within the power of all such bodies to provide for the health of their inhabitants by causing the removal from their limits of all dead animals not slain for human food, which otherwise would soon decay, and, by corrupting the air, engender disease. And provisions for such removal may be made by contract, as well as the performance of any other duty touching the health and comfort of the city; its authorities always preserving such control over the matter as to secure an observance of proper sanitary regulations." But in the exercise of police powers conferred upon cities for the benefit of the health of the inhabitants and to preserve the public welfare and comfort, and conceding the right to take possession and remove through its own agencies or by granting the exclusive privilege to one with whom they may contract for that purpose those substances which are inevitably and intrinsically nuisances and injurious and unwholesome, can an ordinance be upheld and justified as broad and of so sweeping a character as the one under consideration, which includes all accumulations of ashes, stable manure, rubbish, débris, etc., many different kinds of which may properly be regarded of some utility to the owner or others and which are not per se noxious and harmful? Is a city empowered to contract with one individual, and authorize him exclusively to go upon the private premises of the inhabitants, collect and remove at the owner's expense all such substances, and to make it a penal offense for another to engage in the performance of the same kind of labor? Can the city, merely by its fiat, declare all and every substance of the kind mentioned nuisances, and direct their abatement and removal through the agency of an exclusive contractor? The personal rights and property interests of the citizens have, with an unvarying rule, in all the authorities cited, been respected and preserved, and in Smiley v. MacDonald, 42 Neb. 5, 27 L. R. A. 540, 60 N. W. 355, is announced the same rule in the last paragraph of the syllabus, where in it is held: "The legislature cannot under the guise of police regulation, arbitrarily invade private property or personal rights. The test when such regulations are called in question is whether they have some relation to the public health or public welfare, and whether such is in fact the end sought to be attained." By the provisions of the ordinance under consideration neither the owner nor occupant of the premises nor a person employed for that purpose can haul or transport within the corporate limits of the city any of the substances included in the ordinance, even though such material might be utilized for some beneficial purpose. He is prevented from disposing of it in any manner, and must submit to its collection and removal by the city contractor in the manner and by the means pointed out in the ordinance. Stable manure has value, not only for the purpose of fertilizing lawns and gardens in the city, but is also highly prized by the thrifty husbandman in agricultural communities, because it enriches the soil and increases the yield of the crops. Cinders and ashes may be and are regarded as useful for many purposes. Many other substances coming within the meaning of the language of the ordinance in the nature of débris, rubbish, and other waste material which might be specifically mentioned could probably be used for some beneficial purpose, and many others having no utility like those referred to are not within themselves nuisances and a menace to the health of the public. It is quite true their accumulation in unreasonable quantities and for an unreasonable length of time would render them nuisances, and to prevent which all reasonable regulations may be imposed. These are all classed in the ordinance in the general category of dead animals, garbage, and other unwholesome and noxious substances, and made the subject of the same regulation under the provisions of the ordinance, and the right to collect and remove all such material and substances given exclusively to the city garbage contractor. Such attempted regulation is, in our judgment, unreasonable, oppressive, and contrary to a sound public policy. The ordinance not only grants a monopoly, always odious in the eye of the law, without justification or necessity therefor as a sanitary measure for the protection and preservation of the public health, comfort, and welfare, but is also an unwarranted invasion of the natural rights of the inhabitants of the city. It is true the banker, the merchant, and the lawyer may remove from their own premises, and with their own teams, stable manure, but nothing else. The man without a team and the one who desires to earn an honest living in removing for others these things which are not in themselves injurious to health are completely debarred. The personal right of the individual must give way regarding all the matters mentioned to the exclusive right of the contractor to collect, transport, and dispose of all such accumulations. Not only is the owner's property taken from him when he could perhaps dispose of it or make arrangements for its disposal to some advantage, but he is compelled to bear the expense of the taking. We cannot believe such an ordinance can be justified and upheld by the application of any sound principle of law. In Vandine, Petitioner, 6 Pick. 190, 17 Am. Dec. 351, it is said: "If the regulation is unreasonable, it is void; if necessary for the good government of the society, it is good." In State v. Hill, 126 N. C. 1139, 50 L. R. A. 473, 36 S. E. 326, it is held in the syllabus that an ordinance regulating scavenger work must be reasonable in its provisions, and not necessarily interfere with natural rights; and, if it does interfere with such rights, the public necessity must appear. In the opinion it is said by the author: "The prisoner is not charged with carrying on the business of a public scavenger, but simply with doing the work for one man, and it is admitted in the argument that the effect of the ordinance would be to prevent the owner himself from removing the refuse from his own premises. This is clearly an interference with a natural right, and, while this may be allowable on the ground of public necessity, some such necessity must appear, and the ordinance must be reasonable in its provisions,"—citing in support thereof State v. Higgs, 126 N. C. 1014, 48 L. R. A. 446, 35 S. E. 473; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 319; 2 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 745; Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 33 Am. Rep. 239. It is also there said, which is pertinent to the case at bar: "We do not say that the defendant, or even the owner of the premises, had the right to clean out their closets in a manner offensive to their neighbors, or detrimental to the public health and comfort. They would be subject to such reasonable regulations as were necessary to attain these ends. Nor do we say that the city might not, under reasonable regulations, require anyone to take out license before acting as a public scavenger, or even do the work through its own officers." The right of reasonable regulation for the prevention of nuisances of every kind, and the method of removal through and over the streets of a city of all accumulations of refuse matter, rubbish, and other waste material for the purposes of sanitation and in the interest of the general health and comfort of the inhabitants, should be and is fully recognized. It is but the exercise of an authority properly appertaining to a municipality in the interest of the public, and to promote and preserve the welfare and convenience of all the people; but there must be a line of demarcation beyond which the authorities cannot go without assuming powers in excess of those properly belonging to them, and in the case at bar we can but conclude that such powers have been transcended.

The ordinance is likewise invalid because it creates a monopoly. It is not competent for the city to grant an exclusive privilege to one individual to gather and remove those substances which are not per se nuisances. There can be, in the nature of things, no reasonable necessity for the city to gather and remove from the private premises of the inhabitants the accumulations of rubbish and waste material which are not in themselves, and when not allowed to accumulate in unreasonable quantities, nuisances. How can it be said that a necessity exists, in order to protect the public health, to enter private grounds, and remove therefrom the refuse of the barn, ashes from the yard, and other material not offensive in itself if not permitted to accumulate in large quantities and for an unreasonable length of time? By what process of reasoning can it be said that the owner may be deprived of the right to keep his premises neat and clean, and remove all such material as rapidly as it may accumulate in such quantities as to warrant its disposition, and under such reasonable regulation as to the method of removal as may be imposed by the authority of the city? Why and for what reason must he engage only the city contractor to perform such services? If such may be lawfully required in the interest of proper sanitation laws, then may not the city grant an exclusive privilege to perform all work of drayage, hauling of material of whatever description, in order that a possible nuisance may be prevented? It cannot, we think, be said, as was said in the Michigan case, Grand Rapids v. De Vries, 123 Mich. 570, 82 N. W. 269, that the removal and hauling of such substances is not a trade or occupation recognized by law. It may well be doubted whether the reason given in that case for holding the exclusive privilege granted not a monopoly is a valid one. We are all cognizant of the fact that scavenger work has a well accepted and defined meaning, and the occupation or business, lowly though it be, has existed and been recognized and regulated for ages. Certainly hauling refuse from barns, ashes, rubbish, and other waste matter is a legitimate calling, and engaged in whenever opportunity affords by many as one of the means of acquiring a livelihood. Why license drays, scavenger wagons, teamsters, and others engaged in hauling from place to place those things necessary to be carted from the owner's premises in cities and towns in order to prevent them from becoming nuisances, if the trade and calling is not legitimate, and so regarded and recognized by law? The reason for the rule is fully stated and discussed in the case of Re Lowe, 54 Kan. 757, 27 L. R. A. 545, 39 Pac. 710, and, although its application in that case is not supported by the weight of authority, yet in the case at bar the principle should be applied, because the right to transport and remove rubbish, ashes, manure, and other waste material not of itself a menace to the public health must be regarded as a lawful calling, and the attempted deprivation of the right to engage in it by all who may comply with all reasonable regulations pertaining to the subject is in restraint of trade, and therefore void. It follows that in the enactment of the section of the city ordinance now under consideration the city exceeded its powers, and for that reason the 57 L. R. A.

section should be, as was by the trial court, adjudged invalid and unenforceable.

The judgment of the District Court is therefore accordingly affirmed.

M. H. MEEKER, Admr., etc., of Sophia K. Brown, Deceased,

v.

Augusta LARSON et al., Impleaded with Leonard Olson et al., Appts.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. While subrogation is not founded on contract, and is a creation of equity, existing solely for accomplishing the ends of substantial justice, there must, in every case where the doctrine is invoked, in addition to the inherent justice of the case, concur therewith some established principle of equity jurisprudence, as recognized and enforced by courts of chancery.

2. One who furnishes money for the purpose of discharging a mortgage lien upon real estate cannot claim subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee, in the absence of an agreement or understanding that the mortgage is to be kept alive for his benefit, or that he shall be given a lien on the premises in lieu of the one which has been discharged.

(June 4, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendants Leonard Olson et al. from a judgment of the District Court for Lancaster County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to subrogate plaintiff to the rights of a mortgage to the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company and to foreclose the same for plaintiff's benefit. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. S. L. Geisthardt, for appellants:

The Brown mortgage for $1,300 could in no case convey more than a life estate in the property for the life of Augusta Larson, and in fact, under the circumstances, conveyed only the dower interest of the defendant, Augusta Larson.

Where the owner of a homestead dies, the survivor takes a life estate, and a mortgage by the survivor conveys the life estate.

Nebraska Loan & T. Co. v. Smassall, 38 Neb. 516, 57 N. W. 167.

The right of subrogation must in every case rest upon some recognized principle of equity jurisprudence, such as a mistake of fact, an agreement or understanding that the money advanced was for the express purpose designated, or the like.

*Headnotes by DUFFIE, C.

NOTE.—As to right of person furnishing money to pay mortgage to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, see also, in this series, Wilton v. Mayberry (Wis.) 6 L. R. A. 61; Holland v. Citizens' Sav. Bank (R. I.) 8 L. R. A. 553; and cases in note to Crumlish v. Central Improv. Co. (W. Va.) 28 L. R. A. on page 181.

Seieroe v. Homan, 50 Neb. 601, 70 N. W. 244.

The mere fact that from the proceeds of a later mortgage prior mortgages have been paid, that the lien of them might be removed, affords no ground for subrogation thereto.

Bohn Sash & Door Co. v. Case, 42 Neb. 281, 60 N. W. 576; Rice v. Winters, 45 Neb. 517, 63 N. W. 830; Hoagland v. Green, 54 Neb. 164, 74 N. W. 424; Hayden v. Huff, 60 Neb. 625, 83 N. W. 920.

Mr. Willard E. Stewart for next friend of infants.

Messrs. Mockett & Polk and C. S. Polk, for appellee:

The homestead of the deceased descends to the survivor for life. It is not necessary to the homestead right that the survivor continue to occupy it.

First Nat. Bank v. Reece (Neb.) 89 N. W. 804; Cooley v. Jansen, 54 Neb. 33, 74 N. W. 391.

Therefore it was unnecessary to show that Augusta Larson, then Olson, occupied the homestead at the time the $1,300 mortgage was given. It was so occupied at the time of the death of Carl Olson, and then the homestead right attached for the benefit of widow, and she could only be divested by her own deed.

There are two well-defined classes of cases where the right of subrogation is recognized: (1) Where a junior lien holder takes up a senior lien for the protection of his junior lien; (2) in estate matters where, because of legal disabilities, the estate cannot re-encumber its real estate, or pay off liens against it.

Under the second class of cases, the rule against "volunteer" or "intermeddler" is unknown.

Arlington State Bank v. Paulsen, 57 Neb. 717, 78 N. W. 303.

One who pays at the request of a debtor is not a volunteer.

Mr. George E. Hibner also for appellee.

Duffie, C., filed the following opinion:

The facts in this case are not in dispute. September 28, 1886, the defendant Augusta Larson, then Augusta Olson, with her husband, Carl Olson, executed to the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company a note and mortgage on the property in controversy for the sum of $1,800, due September 23, 1891. January 13, 1890, Carl Olson died intestate, and seised in fee of the mortgaged property, leaving surviving him his widow, Augusta Olson, who has since intermarried with the defendant Gust Larson, and five children; these children being appellants in this case. At the maturity of the above-mentioned mortgage the widow, Augusta Olson, endeavored to obtain an extension, and, this being refused, applied to her brother Frank G. Brown, now deceased, for a loan of money sufficient to enable her, in connection with a fund which she herself had, to take up the mortgage. Accordingly, on November 24, 1891, Frank G. Brown and Sophia K. Brown, his wife, advanced to her the sum of $1,300, and took from her a mortgage upon the property in controversy for that amount, due five years after date. The mortgage purports to convey the entire property, although Augusta Olson was only possessed of a life estate therein under the homestead laws of this state. The $1,300 borrowed from Frank G. and Sophia K. Brown, together with $518.60 furnished by the widow herself, was used to pay the $1,800 mortgage to the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company; and this mortgage was thereupon satisfied and released by an instrument bearing date the 8th day of December, 1891, which was duly delivered to the widow, and by her recorded. Frank G. Brown, one of the mortgagees, died on August 27, 1892, and Sophia K. Brown, the other mortgagee, departed this life July 15, 1899, and the plaintiff is the administrator of the estate of both decedents. Since the making of the mortgage for $1,300, the widow, Augusta Olson, has intermarried with Gust Larson, and is impleaded herein in the name of Augusta Larson. The $1,300 not being paid at maturity, Meeker, as administrator, brought this action to enforce the same against the land. In his petition in this case he sets out the foregoing facts, and further alleges as follows: "It was agreed at this time between Augusta Olson (now Larson), Frank G. Brown, and Sophia K. Brown, since both deceased, and the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, that the mortgage and note executed by Carl Olson and Augusta Olson to the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, above described, was to be held by the said Frank G. Brown and Sophia K. Brown as security for the sum of $1,300 so advanced by them as above set forth, and that the said Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company on the 8th day of December, 1891, executed a release and discharge of their said above-described mortgage, and forwarded the same to Augusta Olson, to be turned over by her to the said Frank G. Brown and Sophia K. Brown until the said $1,300 was fully paid, but that the said Augusta Olson failed to deliver said release as aforesaid, but, by mistake of fact, did on the 23d day of February, 1892, file the same for record in the office of the register of deeds of Lancaster county, Nebraska." The prayer of the petition is, among other things, that "the plaintiff be subrogated to the rights of the mortgage of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, as above set out, and that the discharge and satisfaction of its said mortgage be canceled; that an accounting may be taken of the amount due the plaintiff, and that said premises may be sold according to law, and out of the proceeds thereof the plaintiffs may be paid the amount adjudged to be due them, with interest; that, if the court should find there was no equity in plaintiff's bill as to the subrogation to the rights of the mortgage of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, . . . that then the court decree a foreclosure, and order sold the dower interest in the land aforesaid, and that it be decreed that Augusta Olson has a life estate in the remainder thereof by virtue of her homestead right, and that said life estate and dower right be sold, and the proceeds thereof brought into court for the satisfaction of plaintiff's claim." The minor defendants filed an answer by their guardian ad litem, admitting that they had an interest in the land, and further denying each and every allegation of the petition. A similar answer was filed on behalf of another of the Olson children who was of full age. Augusta Larson, the widow, admitted the execution of the notes and mortgages in question, and the facts relating to the title to the property, and denied each and every allegation of the petition not admitted. The court entered a decree finding the plaintiff entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company under its mortgage to the extent of the amount due on the $1,300 mortgage, and ordering that the satisfaction of said mortgage to that extent be canceled and set aside, and directing a sale of the land to satisfy the amount found due.

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that the principal question to be determined is the right of the plaintiff to be subrogated to the lien of the mortgage held by the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, to the extent that the money furnished by Frank G. and Sophia K. Brown was used to pay and satisfy said mortgage. The eighth finding of the court, which is probably as strong in plaintiff's favor as the evidence will allow, is as follows: "The court further finds that upon the 24th day of November, 1891, Frank G. Brown and Sophia K. Brown, since deceased, at the request of Augusta Larson, then Olson, advanced for the payment of said note and mortgage due to the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company the sum of $1,300; and the court finds that said sum of money was so applied upon the payment of said note and mortgage,—the defendant Augusta Larson furnishing the balance thereof,—and that said note and mortgage was fully paid, and said mortgage satisfied and discharged of record." It will be observed that there is nothing in this finding tending to establish that there was any agreement existing between the parties that Brown and his wife were to have a first lien upon the mortgaged premises for the amount of money furnished by them to discharge the mortgage of the insurance company, or that said mortgage was to be kept alive for their benefit. In relation to the claim made in the petition that such an agreement existed, the plaintiff, in his brief, expressly disclaims that there was any evidence to support it. He says: "We claim nothing by reason of the alleged agreement to keep the mortgage of the Connecticut Mutual Insurance Company alive. We failed in the proof as to this allegation. It was not intended as a feint, but appellants have put up their best defense on this point, and in the trial court rested wholly upon the failure to prove such agreement." The immediate question to be determined, then, is whether, under the proofs in this case, on the principle of subrogation the plaintiff can be treated as the equitable assignee of the mortgage of the Connecticut Mutual Insurance Company, and whether the indebtedness secured by that mortgage can be treated as still subsisting, and be enforced against the mortgaged property for the benefit of the plaintiff, notwithstanding it has been discharged of record.

Courts of equity are often called upon to enforce the right of subrogation where one pays the debt of another which he was under a legal obligation to pay either because he was surety or guarantor. The principle upon which this is done rests upon the right of a surety who discharges the debt of his principal to have the creditor make over to him the property or securities which may have been pledged by the debtor to secure the payment of the debt. It has well been said that in such a case the law creates or implies a contract on the part of the creditor that such property or securities will be turned over to the one who is secondarily liable as soon as he pays the creditor's claim. The same principle is also extended to cases where a second lien holder, or one having a reversionary interest in the property, is compelled to advance money to save the property from sale upon a prior existing lien. In the present case Mrs. Olson, upon the death of her husband, became vested with a life estate in the mortgaged property, the same being the homestead of her husband. It is conceded by the appellants that, if she had furnished the money necessary to discharge the mortgage of the insurance company, she could claim subrogation to the rights of that company under its mortgage, as such payment was necessary in order to preserve her life estate in the property. But the plaintiff had no interest in the property to preserve, and hence he cannot claim the benefit of the equitable principle which we have been discussing. The appellee insists, however, that, because the money was furnished at the request of Mrs. Olson for the express purpose of discharging the life insurance company's mortgage, he is entitled to all the rights possessed by the mortgagee of such mortgage. He asserts that the rule is well established that one who, at the request of another, pays off an encumbrance upon the latter's land, is entitled to be subrogated to the security. In Cumberland Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Sparks, 49 C. C. A. 510, 111 Fed. 647, Judge Thayer, in an admirable opinion, reviews many of the cases relied upon by the appellee in this case in support of this rule, and in relation to these cases makes the following remarks: "Without going over these authorities in detail, it will suffice to say that they sustain the following propositions: That where money is advanced to a debtor in pursuance of an express agreement that it is to be used to retire existing liens or encumbrances on his property, and that the creditor who loans the money is to have a first lien upon the property to secure its repayment, such creditor may be subrogated to the rights of the encumbrancer or lienor whose debt has been paid, not only as against the borrower, but as against anyone else who subsequently acquires an interest in the property with knowledge of the circumstances under which the money to pay off the encumbrances or liens was advanced. They further hold that if money is advanced to a debtor to discharge an existing first mortgage upon his property and in pursuance of an agreement that the lender is to have a fixed lien upon the property for the repayment of the sum loaned, the lender is entitled, as against a junior encumbrancer, to be treated as the assignee of the first mortgage, which has been paid off and discharged with the money loaned, whenever it becomes necessary to do so to effectuate the agreement with the lender, and to prevent the junior encumbrance from being raised accidentally to the dignity of a first lien, contrary to the intention of the parties. The species of subrogation mentioned in both of these instances is what has been termed 'conventional subrogation,' and does not depend upon the establishment of any privity of contract."

We have examined all the cases referred to in the brief of appellee, and we do not find that any of them, with the possible exception of Arlington State Bank v. Paulsen, 57 Neb. 717, 78 N. W. 303, supports his 57 L. R. A.

contention. The next strongest case in support of appellee's position is Emmert v. Thompson, 49 Minn. 386, 52 N. W. 31. It was there held that one who lends money for the express purpose of taking up and discharging liens upon real property, and who discharges those liens at the request of the debtor, expecting that his securities will, of record, take the place of that which he discharged, is not a volunteer, stranger, nor intermeddler, and therefore, if justice requires it, may be subrogated to the lien thus discharged, and allowed to assert it, as where he discharges liens in the belief that none other exist against the property, and afterwards learns of liens subordinate to those discharged, which are attempted to be asserted against him as having priority to the lien taken by him upon the same property to secure his advances. Nor will the fact that the lien of which he was ignorant was of record defeat his claim for relief. It will be noticed that the case does not go to the extent of the claim made by the appellee, for the reason that there was an express agreement between the parties that the party making the advance to discharge the prior lien should himself have a first lien upon the property, while in the case at bar the evidence entirely fails to show any such agreement between Mrs. Olson and the Browns; the utmost that can be claimed for the evidence in the record being that the Browns furnished the money for the purpose of discharging the insurance company's mortgage without reference to the same being kept alive for their benefit, or their being given a first lien upon the property to secure the advance thus made. This court has also expressly repudiated the doctrine laid down in Emmert v. Thompson, and has said in relation to that case, and to other cases supporting the same doctrine, that the decided weight of authority is against them. Rice v. Winters, 45 Neb. 517, 63 N. W. 830. In Arlington State Bank v. Paulsen, 57 Neb. 717, 78 N. W. 303, parties who had advanced money which was used in paying the debts of the testator's estate which had been allowed by the probate court, and taxes upon the real estate of which the testator died seised, as well as mortgage liens, were held entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the debts thus discharged, although no agreement to that effect had been shown. In the opinion it is said: "The doctrine or rule of subrogation is not a fixed and inflexible rule of law or equity. It does not owe its origin to statute or custom. It is a creature of the equity courts, invented and applied by them to do justice or prevent an injustice being done in a particular case, and under a particular state of facts, where the law is powerless in the premises." Grave doubt has been thrown upon the correctness of this holding in the opinion filed on the re-argument of the case, and reported in 59 Neb. 94, 80 N. W. 263. It is there said: "The principal contention of counsel for appellants is that the question of subrogation was not properly presented for decision, and that the conclusion announced upon that subject is, in any view of the case, unwarranted. It may be that the views expressed in the opinion are radical, that the decision is a new development of the doctrine of subrogation, and that it goes too far. The question is an important one, but we will not now stop to determine it, because it appears incontestably from the record that the right of appellees to subrogation was neither claimed nor litigated in the court below. The correctness of the former decision on this branch of the case will therefore remain an open question."

In the present case we have sought for some rule which would allow us to affirm the decree of the district court, and give the plaintiff the benefit of subrogation to the rights of the insurance company under its mortgage. We have been loath to take from the children of Frank G. and Sophia K. Brown the $1,300 advanced for the payment of this mortgage, and to give to the children of Mrs. Olson the advantage derived from such payment. We have been unable, however, to find any principle upon which we can affirm the decree of the district court without extending the doctrine of subrogation further than warranted by any decision called to our attention; nor have we been able, after a somewhat extended research, to find any case that supports the broad claim made by the appellees. It may be true that in the present instance an affirmation of the decree would best subserve the principles of justice and equity, but it would work such a radical departure from the rule heretofore adopted by this court that we do not feel justified in so doing.

We recommend, therefore, that the decree of the district court be reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to enter a decree foreclosing the plaintiff's mortgage upon the life estate held by Augusta Olson in the mortgaged premises, and ordering a sale of such interest for the satisfaction of the amount due upon the mortgage.

Ames and Albert, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the decree of the District Court is reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to enter a decree foreclosing the plaintiff's mortgage upon the life estate held by Augusta Olson in the mortgaged premises, and ordering a sale of such interest for the satisfaction of the amount due upon the mortgage.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Eliza CHURCH.

(.....Neb.....)

1. Evidence as to directions which the sendee had given a telegraph

NOTE.—For another case in this series, similar to the one above, as to damages for failure to deliver to a physician a telegraph message 57 L. R. A.

company as to delivery of telegrams for him is admissible in an action by a third person against the company for failure promptly to deliver a message to him.

2. A physician may state his opinion as to the probable further duration of a confinement case had he reached the mother at a time when all but the head and one arm of the child had been delivered.

3. Objections to the form of hypothetical questions addressed to expert witnesses must be made in the trial court.

4. Substantial damages may be given for breach of a contract to transmit promptly a telegram which the company knew to be addressed to a physician and to direct him to come to the sender's house at once.

5. Damages for breach of a contract promptly to transmit and deliver a telegram from a sick person summoning his physician "at once" may include an allowance for the pain and suffering endured during the physician's absence because of such breach.

6. An award of $950 damages is not excessive where, on account of the failure of a telegraph company to transmit and deliver a telegram summoning a physician, a woman was left in labor for thirty minutes with the child partly born, which resulted in the death of the child and great pain of body and mind to the woman.

Kirkpatrick, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action brought in the district court of Jefferson county by Eliza Church, defendant in error, against the Western Union Telegraph Company, plaintiff in error, to recover the sum of $1,990, as damages claimed to have been sustained on account of the failure of the telegraph company promptly to deliver a telegram which had been sent to a physician in the city of Fairbury to come to her home at once. The petition sets out that on the 28th day of January, 1898, she delivered to the telegraph company a message as follows: "Dr. Andrews: Come to L. C. Church's at once. L. C. Church;" that the telegraph company received the message at the village of Thompson, and undertook to deliver the same promptly to Dr. Andrews, at the city of Fairbury, which was distant 7 or 8 miles; that the company was paid for transmitting the message; that it was delivered to the company for transmission about the hour of 6 o'clock P. M., and that it was not delivered to Dr. Andrews until about the hour of 9 o'clock P. M. of the same day; that Dr. Andrews was a skilful and competent physician and surgeon, and that the defendant in error had previously arranged with him to attend her during her confinement, which was expected to occur soon; that he had agreed to come immediately upon receiving notice; that, upon receipt of the telegram, Dr. Andrews started immediately for the residence of defendant in error, arriving there about 10 o'clock P. M., and after the birth of the child, which died during birth; that, on account of the negligence and carelessness of the telegraph company, she was prevented from having the care, attendance, and assistance of a physician, and that her confinement was unduly prolonged, and that she suffered greatly in body and mind on account of not having the care and assistance of a physician; and that the period of labor was greatly lengthened, aggravated, and intensified,—all to her damage in the sum claimed. To this petition, plaintiff in error filed an answer, admitting its corporate character, and that it owned and operated a telegraph wire between the village of Thompson and the city of Fairbury, and that it held itself out to the public as a common carrier of information, and further denied each and every allegation contained in the petition, together with an allegation that plaintiff's petition did not state facts sufficient to entitle her to any relief.

Trial was had to a jury, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for defendant in error in the sum of $950, to reverse which the cause is brought to this court. Four assignments of error are argued in briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error, and they will be considered in their order: First. That the court erred in permitting Dr. Andrews, over objections, to testify that other telegrams had been sent to him which the company had delayed in delivering; that by reason of such delay he had lost money, and that he had informed the agent of plaintiff in error that he wanted messages addressed to him delivered to him at once, and that if they continued to hold messages they would be responsible for somebody's death, and that witness was losing money in having the telegraph company hold messages until they could find some person to deliver them to him. Second. That the court erred in permitting Dr. Andrews, over objection, to testify that if he had arrived at the residence of defendant in error at about 8 o'clock in the evening, and found her in confinement, and all of the child born except the head and one arm, he could, in all probability, have completed the delivery in three or four minutes thereafter. Third. The court erred in permitting the jury to find more than nominal damages. Fourth. That the verdict is excessive.

The facts, as disclosed by the record, briefly stated, are as follows: Some time prior to January 28, 1898, defendant in error, expecting confinement soon thereafter, talked to Dr. Andrews about attending upon her at that time, and he agreed to come upon notice. On January 28, 1898, defendant in error caused to be delivered to the agent of plaintiff in error at its office in the village of Thompson the message hereinbefore set out. The message was forwarded by the company's agent at Thompson within a very few minutes after its receipt from the sender, and was received by the company's agent at Fairbury. Dr. Andrews was well known in Fairbury as a practising physician and surgeon, and both his office and residence were within the free-delivery limit established by the company. The message was not delivered to him until about 8:45 p. m. He immediately hitched his horse to his buggy and started for the residence of defendant in error, distant about 7 miles, arriving there about 10 o'clock. It appears from the evidence that defendant in error was taken with premonitory labor pains about 3 o'clock in the afternoon. Soon afterwards she sent a young woman to the house of a neighbor woman, and then to the telegraph office with the message. Between 6 and 7 o'clock her pains became more violent and frequent, and about 8:30 the child was delivered. The birth was an instance of what is commonly called "foot presentation." After all of the body except the head and one arm was born, birth was delayed for about thirty minutes, and it seems that during this time the life of the child became extinct. At the time the doctor arrived (about 10 o'clock), defendant in error was in bed, resting easily. He left a prescription, and returned home. Defendant in error suffered intensely during the last half hour of her labor.

Dr. Andrews was called as a witness for defendant in error, and the following testimony by him is quoted from the record, as being the basis of the first assignment of error urged for consideration:

Now, you may state whether prior to that time you had received telegrams which had been transmitted to you from the defendant company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Many times?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have they been delivered to you by the defendant at your office prior to that?

A. Sometimes at the office, and sometimes at my residence.

Q. You may state whether prior to that time you had had any talk with the defendant company with reference to delivering telegrams to you? (Objected to as immaterial and incompetent. Overruled. Exception.)

A. I had explained to them in regard to the delay in the different telegrams sent to me, and I lost money by that.

Q. (By attorney for defendant company.) Explained to whom?

A. To Mr. Catlin. There was a telegram sent to me about three weeks, I think, before this time, from Reynolds. It was received here at 6 o'clock in the evening, and delivered to me at 5 o'clock the next day. (Objected to as not responsive to the question and immaterial. Sustained.)

Q. State what you said to him at that time about telegrams sent to you, and what should be done with them? (Objected to as immaterial. Overruled. Exception.)

A. I told him I wanted telegrams sent to me immediately. I didn't want them to keep them at the office; that, if they continued that, they would be responsible for somebody's death, and not only was that true, but I was losing money by telegrams being held until they could find somebody to bring them to me.

The testimony to which more particularly objection is urged in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff in error is that given to the last question quoted above. The testimony elicited by the questions immediately preceding, while it may have been objectionable, could not, we think, have resulted in prejudice to plaintiff in error. Regarding the last question, it may be said that no objection was made to its form; the only objection being that it was immaterial. Two inquiries were made in the question: First, "State what you said to him at that time about telegrams sent to you?" and, second, "What should be done with them?" The first portion of the question would likely call for immaterial testimony, and was objectionable; but the second portion called for any directions which the witness may have left regarding the delivery of messages to him,—whether they were to be delivered at his office or residence, between what hours at either place, or any such instruction as may have been given. If proper objection had been made to the form of the question, no doubt the court would have required the question to be separated, and would have excluded that portion which had no bearing upon the matter in controversy. The rule is elementary, and based upon sound reason, that objection made to a question is properly overruled unless the objection is good as against the entire question. "Where a part of testimony objected to as a whole is admissible, it is not error to overrule the objection." Schulze v. Jalonick, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 296, 44 S. W. 580. After the witness had answered the question, plaintiff in error moved to strike such portion as was not responsive. This motion was sustained by the trial court. Plaintiff in error did not ask to have any other portion stricken out. The trial court struck out that part of the answer to which plaintiff in error directed his motion, and we are of the opinion that there was no error of the trial court in this regard of which plaintiff in error can complain. The first contention, therefore, must be decided adversely to plaintiff in error.

After plaintiff in error had rested its case, defendant in error called Dr. Andrews for further examination in chief. He then testified as follows:

Q. If you had arrived at the residence of Mrs. Church that evening at the hour of 8 o'clock, or about that time, and found her suffering in confinement, and all of the child born, except its head and one arm, could you, in all probability, have perfected the delivery within three or four minutes thereafter? (Objected to as immaterial and being mere conjecture, and asking the witness as to a case of probability. Overruled. Exception. Further objection that the plaintiff has rested its case without showing any facts disclosing to defendant the circumstances and conditions upon which she predicates her claim for damages. Overruled. Exception.)

4. There is a probability in it, and I was answering along that line — (Question read, and further answer.) Yes, sir.

That the question called for a mere conjecture, and asked the witness as to a case of probability, is the only one of the three objections relied on by counsel, or mentioned in brief. It cannot be said that the question was objectionable for the reason stated. The witness was qualified as an expert. There was sufficient evidence already in the record to authorize the assumed state of facts contained in the question. The answer called for was whether the witness, as a competent physician, in the case stated, could, in all probability, have effected a delivery within a given time. A greater degree of certainty cannot reasonably be required in the testimony of medical experts. The science of medicine and surgery has not reached that degree of excellence when its votaries can say to a mathematical certainty what, in a given case, would be the results of a given remedy. In the case of Peterson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 38 Minn. 511, 39 N. W. 486, the court says with reference to the following question asked of a medical expert: "What, in your judgment, is the probability of her recovery?" "The point of the objection is that it called for an answer purely speculative in its character. While we have no disposition to extend the scope of this kind of evidence beyond the limits of established rules, yet we do not see that this question is obnoxious to the objection made. In view of the nature of the subject-matter of the inquiry, it amounted to nothing more than asking the witness his professional opinion whether she would recover. This was not an event the occurrence of which could be stated with absolute certainty. It was wholly a question of probabilities, and all that any honest witness, however skilful, could say, would be that the recovery was either probable or improbable." Hendershot v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 106 Iowa, 529, 76 N. W. 828; Block v. Milwaukee Street R. Co. 89 Wis. 371, 27 L. R. A. 365, 61 N. W. 1101. But in brief counsel suggests that the question called, not for testimony to be considered by the jury, but a conclusion or decision to be accepted by them, and that it called for a conjecture or a guess as to what he (the witness) could, in all probability, have done in the case which was the subject of the controversy. It is doubtful whether the question can be said to be vulnerable to this objection. But this objection directed to the form of a hypothetical question should have been made at the trial, so that the trial court could have passed thereon with this criticism in mind. Manifestly, this was not done. The objection was that the question "was mere conjecture, and asking the witness as to a case of probability." As we have already seen, this is no valid objection to the testimony of a medical expert. We think, from the question as put, and the answer of the witness, the jury must have understood this testimony as being nothing more than the opinion of the doctor, as a professional man, familiar with matters of this kind by reason of his habit and experience, as to the probabilities of an immediate delivery if he, as a physician, arriving at the hour stated, had found the conditions assumed to exist in the question. In the case of Potter v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 81 N. W. 80, it is said: "An objection that, by the terms of an hypothetical question put to a medical expert, the witness was at liberty to consider the subjective symptoms in giving his answer, made for the first time on appeal, will not be considered." 122 Mich. 179. In the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. O'Neill, 58 Neb. 239, 78 N. W. 521, it is said: "It is a general rule, to which the record in this case presents no exception, that objections not urged in the trial court will not be considered here." In the case of Asbestos Pulp Co. v. Gardner, 57 N. Y. Supp. 353, it is said: "It is a well-settled rule of evidence that a person objecting to the reception of testimony must state the grounds of his objections, so that the judge can rule with the criticism in his mind. Unless this is done, objections founded upon the admitted testimony are unavailing, unless they are of such a character that they could not have been obviated upon the trial." 39 App. Div. 654. In the case of Puth v. Zimbleman, 68 N. W. 895, it is said: "Unless a party objecting to evidence states valid reasons for its exclusion, the objection is properly overruled, though a sufficient ground for excluding it may exist." 99 Iowa, 641. Continental Ins. Co. v. Pratt, 8 Kan. App. 424, 55 Pac. 671. We do not think that there was any error in the admission of this testimony of which plaintiff in error is in a position to complain, and the second contention of plaintiff in error can therefore not be sustained.

It is next contended that the court erred in permitting the jury to find more than nominal damages, for the reason that the substantial damages claimed and awarded are not such as would usually and ordinarily arise out of the breach of the contract to deliver the message in question, but are too remote to have been in the contemplation of the parties, or to be reasonable. It is contended that, under the evidence, it was the duty of the court to have instructed the jury, as requested, that only nominal damages could be recovered. The contention is that the telegram itself, and all that was said to the agents of the company, were insufficient to apprise plaintiff in error of the injury sued for, or what was likely to arise from a failure promptly to deliver the message. We are unable to accept this view. It seems clear that the telegram itself, addressed to a physician,—one known to be such by the agent of plaintiff in error at Fairbury,—was sufficient to apprise it of the necessity of prompt delivery. It cannot be supposed that a message of the character of that in controversy should specifically set out the actual conditions calling for a physician's presence, the person who was sick, or the nature of the disease; and it is not necessary that this should be done in order to apprise the company of the need promptly to deliver the message. The telegram, however, did direct the physician to come at once. By no possibility could the physician come at once if the message was not delivered until some hours after its receipt. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Sheffield, 71 Tex. 570, 10 S. W. 752. In Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Lathrop, 131 Ill. 575, 7 L. R. A. 474, 23 N. E. 583, it is said: "It certainly cannot be contended that the agent must be informed of all the facts and circumstances pertaining to a transaction referred to in a telegram which are known by the parties themselves, to make his company liable for more than nominal damages. If it should be so held, the telegraph would cease to be of practical utility to the commercial world." In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 75 Tex. 531, 6 L. R. A. 844, 12 S. W. 857, it is said: "It is well known to the public, and cannot be unknown to telegraph companies, that the utmost brevity of expression is cultivated in correspondence by telegraph. It is as well known that that mode of communication is chiefly resorted to in matters of importance, financially and socially, requiring great despatch." One Green was called as a witness for defendant in error, and testified that he received the message from his sister, in the village of Thompson, and took it across the street to the telegraph office, and delivered it to the agent of the company. Answering an inquiry as to what he said, he testified that he would not be sure, but believed that he said the message should be sent in haste. Further answering, he said he would not be positive; that he could not remember. The testimony was contradicted by the Thompson agent of the company, but its truth was a question for the determination of the jury. There can be no question that the company's agent at Thompson knew from the message itself that someone was sick, and that a physician's presence was desired at once. He testified that he knew Dr. Andrews was a physician, and where he lived. In answer to interrogatories, he testified as follows:

Q. Did you know what that telegram was sent for?

A. Why, I could guess.

Q. From the telegram you knew what was meant?

A. I knew that his services were required. That is all I knew about it.

Q. You knew, then, that there was something that required the attention of a doctor at once, didn't you?

A. Yes, sir.

The physician testified that in prior conversations with the agent at Fairbury he had requested that messages directed to him be delivered promptly, and the agent at Fairbury had knowledge that the person to whom the message was addressed was a physician. The telegram itself, together with all the evidence, was submitted to the jury; and they, no doubt, concluded that the company was aware of its importance, and that injury would likely result from delay in its delivery.

Plaintiff in error contends that a recovery on account of the pain and suffering of defendant in error endured during the absence of the physician, resulting from the fault of the company, cannot be sustained, and that such damages are too remote, and did not flow directly and naturally from the negligence of the company, and that the parties did not have such possible injury in contemplation at the time the message was delivered to the company for transmission. The correct rule, as we conceive it to be, is that speculative, contingent, and remote damages must be excluded, but that a party guilty of a breach of the contract will be held liable for all injury flowing directly and naturally as a result of the wrong, which both parties would have contemplated if at the time the contract was entered into their attention had been called to the natural and direct consequence of the breach. The rule does not require that the parties must have contemplated the actual damages for which a recovery would have been allowed; nor does it embrace within its scope all the consequences which might be shown to have resulted from a particular omission of duty, but only those which might properly be deemed to have been within the contemplation of the parties. The rule is practical, founded on wise policy, and is consistent with equity and good sense. Leonard v. New York, A. & B. Electro Magnetic Teleg. Co. 41 N. Y. 544-567, 1 Am. Rep. 446; Pepper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Tenn. 554, 4 L. R. A. 660, 11 S. W. 783; United States Teleg. Co. v. Wenger, 55 Pa. 262, 93 Am. Dec. 751. The rule by which to determine whether damages are immediate and proximate, or remote and speculative, is well stated by Justice Post in the case of St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Hedge, 44 Neb. 448, 62 N. W. 887, as follows: "The question in all such cases is whether the facts shown constitute a continuous succession of events, so linked together as to make a natural whole, or was there a new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury? The intervening cause must be one not produced by the alleged wrongful act or omission, but independent of it, and adequate to produce the result in question. There may be, it is evident, a succession of intermediate causes, each dependent upon the one preceding it, and all so connected with the primary cause as to be, in legal contemplation, the proximate result thereof." In the case at bar there was no independent intervening cause adequate to produce the result. The message was sent in ample time to prevent the injury complained of. It was not delivered promptly, and the physician did not arrive at the residence of defendant in error until after his services were no longer required. In the case of Western U. Teleg.

Co. v. Cooper, 1 L. R. A. 728, which is in nearly all respects like the one at bar, it was said: "Damages in a suit against a telegraph company for failure to deliver a message to a physician, summoning him to attend a woman in confinement, cannot be based upon the death of the child before birth, and the grief of the parents occasioned thereby, but a reasonable consideration should be allowed for any increased pain and mental suffering caused to the mother by the physician's absence." 71 Tex. 507, 9 S. W. 598. In the case at bar there can be no doubt that the labor during confinement was prolonged on account of the failure of the physician to attend, and we are of the opinion that the defendant in error is entitled to substantial, rather than nominal, damages.

The last assignment of plaintiff in error is that the verdict returned is excessive, being so large as to lead to the presumption that it is the result of passion and prejudice and improper influence. It will be conceded that the verdict of a jury, in cases properly submitted, is ordinarily conclusive. In the absence of any showing that the jury were improperly influenced, the amount of the verdict must be so far beyond all reason as to raise a presumption that it is the result of passion and prejudice. The only question raised for consideration, therefore, under this assignment, is whether the verdict is so excessive as to raise a presumption of passion and prejudice, calling for a reversal of the case. Counsel say that it is more than twice as large as could fairly be awarded where the verdict is limited to mere compensation. It is conceded that there is no fixed rule by which the actual damages in a case of this kind are to be measured. This being true, it would seem to follow that the jury's verdict is the best and most satisfactory means of determining the extent of the damages. We do not feel warranted in saying that the verdict is excessive. That great pain and agony ordinarily accompany childbirth, even in cases where sympathetic and competent persons are in attendance to render all assistance lying within human power, is a matter of common information. It may be said that this pain and agony are such that no person could negligently be the occasion of its prolongation without being culpable. We do not believe that the jury in the case at bar returned a verdict so excessive in the premises as to be presumptively the result of passion and prejudice against plaintiff in error.

After a careful examination of the record in this case, we have arrived at the conclusion that no prejudicial error occurred at the trial, and the judgment is right, and should be affirmed. It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Day and Hastings, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

The conclusion reached by the Commissioners is approved, and, it appearing that 57 L. R. A.

the adoption of the recommendation made will result in a right decision of the cause, it is ordered that the judgment of the District Court be affirmed.

v.

Florence M. BANCROFT et al.

LEXINGTON BANK, Cross Petitioner,
Appt.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. The unchallenged findings of fact by a referee, when confirmed by the court, are binding on the party against whom they operate, and from the legal consequences flowing therefrom he cannot escape.
2. Where a debtor executes a note and mortgage for a loan of money at a lawful rate of interest, and, at its maturity, enters into a new contract with the lender for a further extension of the loan, which is tainted with the vice of usury, and the lender, by agreement, retains the note and mortgage as collateral security to the usurious contract, in a suit to enforce the mortgage security the lender is restricted in his recovery to the amount due on the indebtedness at the time of making the usurious contract, after which all interest is, by force of the statute, forfeited.

A PPEAL by the defendant bank from a judgment of the District Court for Dawson County disallowing its lien on certain property upon which plaintiff sought to enforce a mechanic's lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. D. Rhea, for appellant:

Where usurious interest has been charged and not paid, an action cannot be maintained to recover it; neither is it the subject of a set-off in defense of an action against the pleader for affirmative relief on foreclosure of a mortgage.

The payment of the illegal interest as alleged, being the amount merged into Dr. William M. Bancroft's note, was a complete settlement of the doctor's indebtedness by his wife, and cannot be successfully pleaded in this action.

The original contract sued on in this action was wholly free from the vice and taint of usury; and it will not be invalidated by a subsequent agreement to pay usurious interest after the debt has matured.

Messrs. Warrington & Stewart and E. A. Cook, for appellees:

This note is within the rule laid down in Cattle v. Haddox, 14 Neb. 527, 16 N. W. 841.

It being established that there is usury in that note, it taints all renewals of the note with the vice of usury.

The court ought, as a conclusion of law, to determine that there was usury in this contract, and that the cross petitioner is only entitled to recover the amount of the principal debt less the interest and payments thereon, and less the amount of valuable collateral.

McDonald v. Beer, 42 Neb. 437, 60 N. W. 868; Doud v. Reid, 53 Mo. App. 553.

Holecomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff instituted a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien on real estate, making the appellant, the Lexington Bank, and appellees Bancroft parties defendant in the action. Defendants Bancroft were the fee owners of the property involved in the suit, and defendant bank claimed a lien thereon by virtue of a mortgage in its favor executed by the Bancrofts. The bank appeared in the action, and, by way of cross petition, pleaded that the Bancrofts were indebted to it on a promissory note for the sum of $1,122, executed by them to the bank, and that said note was secured by a real-estate mortgage on the premises described in the petition, and prayed a finding of the amount due on the note and mortgage, and that the same might be adjudged a valid lien on said premises, and that the real estate be sold in satisfaction of the amount due, if the same were not paid at a short date, to be fixed by the court. To this cross petition of the bank the Bancrofts filed an answer, in which the giving of the note and mortgage was admitted, and, as a defense, it was pleaded that the contract evidenced thereby was usurious, in that by the agreement of the parties thereto a greater rate of interest was charged for the loan and forbearance of money than the rate of $10 per annum on the $100, the answer setting forth in detail the particulars of the transaction and the different items entering into the consideration of the note, and the amount of unlawful interest included therein. It was also pleaded that, after the maturity of the note and mortgage mentioned in the cross petition, a new contract was entered into between the parties for a further extension of the indebtedness, and that said contract was likewise usurious; the answer stating in detail the facts constituting the alleged usury. Further renewal of contracts was also pleaded, each of which, it was alleged, was usurious, and that at the time of filing the cross petition the defendant bank held two notes of defendants Bancroft, other than the one declared on, as evidencing the usurious contract so pleaded, one being for the sum of $1,400 and the other for the sum of $200, giving the dates and maturity thereof. The answer prayed for an accounting, and the ascertainment of the amount actually due the bank, after allowing credits and payments claimed to exist in favor of the mortgagors, and for general equitable relief. There were other issues tendered by the answer, as to certain collaterals alleged to have been given to secure the debt, for the proceeds and value of which the Bancrofts claimed they were entitled to credit; but, as all such matters are eliminated from the questions presented for our consideration by this appeal, we need not further notice them. A reply was filed, denying the usury alleged in each and all of the transactions mentioned in the answer; the reply stating in detail the items entering into each of the notes executed by the Bancrofts, and the amount of interest charged in each, which, it was alleged, did not exceed 10 per cent per annum, and on the issues thus framed the parties went to trial. A referee was appointed to take the testimony and report to the court the evidence, with its findings of fact and conclusions of law. We will only notice such portion of the report of the referee and the action of the trial court thereon on exceptions by the defendants Bancroft as seems necessary to an intelligent understanding of the points involved in the consideration of the case on appeal. We are not favored with a brief on the part of the appellees Bancroft, and are compelled to decide the controversy upon the record and a brief by appellant's counsel, with such independent research as we have had time for at our command.

The referee made several findings of fact, those material to the question now under consideration being as follows: "(6) I find that neither upon the note for $1,122 made by the defendants Bancroft to the defendant Lexington Bank, and by them delivered to it, which note is set forth in the defendant Lexington Bank's cross petition and answer, nor upon any of the notes of which it is a renewal, nor upon any of the items which are included in said note of which it is a renewal, was there contracted for, received, or reserved a rate of interest exceeding 10 per cent per annum, said note being the one secured by the mortgage set out in said cross petition. (7) I find that no part of said $1,122 note has been paid, and there is now due thereon the sum of $1,865.88, according to the terms thereof. (8) I find that on the 12th day of April, 1893, a new note for the sum of $1,299 was made and delivered by the defendants Florence M. Bancroft and William M. Bancroft to the defendant Lexington Bank, as a renewal of the said $1,122 note, and for the purpose of keeping the obligation created by said $1,122 note in bankable shape, the said $1,122 note being retained by the defendant bank, and marked "Collateral," as shown by indorsement thereon, and said mortgage was also retained by said bank; that from time to time after the making and delivery of said renewal other renewals were made and delivered by the defendants Florence M. Bancroft and William M. Bancroft to the defendant Lexington Bank, for the same purpose, said $1,122 note and said mortgage still being retained by said bank. (9) I find that in these renewals and on them a greater rate of interest than 10 per cent per annum was contracted for, by and between the parties and by the defendant bank, and by it charged and included in said notes. (10) I find that all of these renewals have been canceled and surrendered by the defendant bank to the defendants Bancroft, excepting the last two given, one of which two is for the sum of $1,400, dated January 14, 1895, and signed by Florence M. Bancroft and William Bancroft; and the other is for the sum of $200, dated January 9, 1897, and made by William M. Bancroft, into which two notes all of the other renewals were merged; and the said $200 note is the one in these findings mentioned in which said taxes and said interest found to have been paid by William M. Bancroft were included, together with other items of indebtedness of said William M. Bancroft to said bank." As a conclusion of law the referee found that the bank had a valid lien on the premises mortgaged for the amount found due by the seventh finding of fact, and was entitled to a decree of foreclosure as prayed, and a sale of the premises in satisfaction of the amount found due. On objections and exceptions by the defendants Bancroft, the trial court set aside the seventh finding of fact, and approved and confirmed the remainder. The court construed the referee's ninth finding to be and mean that at the time the indebtedness was renewed, April 12, 1893, a new and original contract was entered into, and the note and mortgage sued on were, by agreement of the parties, retained as collateral security to the contract then entered into, and so found, in effect, that such contract was tainted with the vice of usury, as was found by the referee, and that the amount then due on the indebtedness was the sum of $1,238.13, to which sum the cross petitioner was limited in its recovery, by reason of the usurious character of the contract, less credits which should be applied thereon, and regarding which there is no controversy, and entered a decree of foreclosure accordingly. The bank appeals.

It is argued, in substance, that, the note sued on being free from the vice of usury, and retained by the payee, the renewal contract did not discharge the indebtedness evidenced thereby, and that the agreement to take usury, even though made, could not affect such note and mortgage, and that the bank was entitled to recover the full amount due thereon, including interest, according to its terms; that the contracts of renewal can only be regarded in their character as collateral to the principal indebtedness, which is unaffected by any subsequent usurious agreement. It is also contended that the evidence will not support the finding of the referee that usury was contracted for in all or either of the renewal notes given after the maturity of the note for $1,122, which was made the foundation of the bank's cause of action, as stated in its cross petition. As the bank did not challenge the findings of the referee, which were, with the exception noted, confirmed by the court, we think it is now bound by such findings, and cannot be heard to dispute their truthfulness, or escape the legal consequences flowing therefrom.

This, therefore, leaves but one question to be determined, and that is, What is the legal effect with respect to the rights of the contesting parties, because of the contract of renewal entered into between them, whereby it was agreed that usurious interest should be charged for the further loaning of the money for which the notes were given, which indebtedness prior to the time of the first renewal had been evidenced by the note and mortgage pleaded in the bank's cross petition, and which was found to be free from the taint of usury? Was it an extension of the time of payment under the old contract, which was free from usury, or was the nature of the transaction such as to give it the character of a new contract affected with the vice of usury? The finding of the referee, though somewhat obscure, was, we think, as construed and found by the trial court, a finding that the original indebtedness was satisfied by the execution of the new note then given providing for the payment of the sum for which made payable, at a stated time in the future, and the retention of the note and mortgage originally given, as collateral security for the fulfilment of the contract last entered into. The evidence as to the course of dealings between the parties fully justifies this inference. It was as though the parties had canceled the evidence of the old indebtedness, and, as security to the new, executed a note and mortgage on the debtor's real estate and delivered the same as collateral to the unsecured notes evidencing the usurious contract. This is, in effect, what was in fact done. The note and mortgage were satisfied for the purpose for which they were executed and retained by the creditor as further security to the notes evidencing the new contract. The transaction by which the first renewal was accomplished, and which was tainted with usury, as well as all subsequent transactions relating to the extension of the time of the payment of the debt, falls, we think, within the principle of the rule stated in McDonald v. Beer, 42 Neb. 437, 60 N. W. 868, in which it is held: "Where a loan is made at a legal rate of interest, and a note executed as evidence of the indebtedness thereby created, and at the maturity of the note a contract is made by which the time of payment is extended, and a new note is given, in which is included interest on the amount of the loan at a usurious rate for the time of the extension, the renewal note is tainted with usury." In the opinion it is said: "The judge who tried the case in the district court evidently adopted the view that the transaction was an illegal one, or tainted with usury, from the date, January 16, 1885, when the first renewal notes were given in part for the interest figured at a usurious rate, and rendered judgment for the amounts loaned, with legal interest from the dates of inception to January 16, 1885, deducting therefrom the several sums paid; and this, we think, was right, and according to the correct rule of law as applied to such transactions. Where a loan is made at a legal rate of interest, and a note executed as evidence of the indebtedness thereby created, and at the maturity of the note a contract is made by which the time of payment is extended, and a new note is given, in which is included interest on the amount of the loan at a usurious rate for the time of the extension, the renewal note is tainted with usury. Tyler, Usury, 352; Webb v. Bishop, 101 N. C. 99, 7 S. E. 698, and cases cited." Applying the rule above cited to the case at bar, the bank would be entitled to recover the amount of the original indebtedness evidenced by the $1,122 note, with all lawful interest accrued thereon to the date of the renewal contract, when usury was charged and contracted for, after which, by reason of the force of the statute on usury, the creditor must lose all interest which would otherwise accrue: and all payments made, whether as interest or as a part of the principal, would apply in extinguishment of the principal and lawful interest accrued to that time. The decree of the district court based on the findings of the referee conformed to the rule stated; and this, we think, adjusted the differences between the parties in harmony with the law. The note and mortgage sued on were held as a pledge to the payment of the valid demands owing by the makers to the payee, and nothing more. Whatever sum was justly due the bank on the principal indebtedness, to which the mortgage was held as collateral security, the bank had the right to subject the property mortgaged to its satisfaction; but it could not claim or recover a greater sum, or establish a lien for a greater amount, than was actually due on the principal indebtedness. To the extent that the principal notes evidencing the indebtedness existing between the parties fail, because of their usurious character, to the same extent would the collateral security fail. Webb, Usury, § 318; Bell v. Lent, 24 Wend. 230; Moncure v. Dermott, 13 Pet. 345, 10 L. ed. 193; Kellogg v. Adams, 39 N. Y. 28, and authorities therein cited.

The decree of the District Court gave to each of the parties their lawful dues, and is accordingly affirmed.

Sullivan, Ch. J., concurring:

I agree fully with the views expressed in the foregoing opinion. It is the business of the courts to ascertain the agreements of parties, not to make agreements for them by presuming the existence of mutual intentions which in truth never existed. It is entirely clear from the indorsement on the original note that it was to be held by the bank as collateral security. In other words, it became, by the express contract of the parties, a mere incident or accessory of the renewal notes. This contract was supported by a valuable consideration, and I can conceive of no sound legal reason why it is not enforceable. The amount due upon the original note could not be made the measure of the bank's recovery without violating the agreement under which the renewal notes were given. The parties having, by a valid contract, made the original note collateral, it is collateral, and must be dealt with as such. If the renewal notes were wholly void, the case would be different, for then there would be no consideration for the agreement making the original note a mere adjunct of the renewals.

Sedgwick, J., dissenting:

The proposition that the giving of the renewal note, by which it was agreed to pay an illegal rate of interest upon the loan, operated to make the original note and mortgage usurious, seems to me unsound. In Burnhisel v. Firman, 22 Wall. 170, 22 L. ed. 766, it is said: "If a security founded upon a prior one be fatally tainted with that vice [usury], and the prior one were free from it, but given up and canceled, and the latter one thereafter be adjudged void, the prior one will be revived, and may be enforced as if the latter one had not been given." In Rountree v. Brinson, 98 N. C. 107, 3 S. E. 747, it is held: "When a note or bond taken for a valid debt, or to renew a valid note, is void for usury, the creditor may, in an action thereon, recover judgment for the valid debt, when the complaint alleges the facts constituting that debt; and an assignee of the note or bond has the same rights as the original creditor." To the same effect are Cook v. Barnes, 36 N. Y. 520; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Joslyn, 37 N. Y. 353; Rice v. Welling, 5 Wend. 595; Russell v. Nelson, 99 N. Y. 119, 1 N. E. 314. In Farmers & M. Bank v. Joslyn, 37 N. Y.

353, it was said: "The infected contract did not absolve the mortgagor from his antecedent obligations; nor did it impair the rights of the plaintiff under a prior and valid agreement. It is true that the usurer is not permitted, at his own election, to allege his illegal act, as a ground for reinstating an old security; but it is equally true that a party, who claims to be the victim of exaction, cannot avail himself of the invalidity of a later contract, as a shield from liability on one of earlier date, which was honest and free from vice. Brown v. Dewey, 1 Sandf. Ch. 57; Swartwout v. Payne, 19 Johns. 294, 10 Am. Dec. 228; Billington v. Wagoner, 33 N. Y. 31; La Forge v. Herter, 9 N. Y. 241; Crane v. Hubbel, 7 Paige, 413." Some of the cases were decided under statutes providing that a usurious note is void, and the fact is mentioned that the giving of such a contract would furnish no consideration for the surrendering of the former valid one, but I do not see any reason for making a distinction in this case. The finding of the referee was that all of the renewals which were usurious had been canceled and surrendered by the bank to the defendants Bancroft, excepting the last two given, and that when the first usurious renewal was given the original note, which was not usurious, was marked "Collateral," and it, with the mortgage securing it, was retained by the bank. It was upon this mortgage and note that this action was brought. There was then no agreement on the part of the bank to surrender or cancel the note and mortgage in suit. On the other hand, it was expressly agreed that it should remain a valid obligation, and be held as collateral to the subsequently executed renewal notes. It may be admitted that these transactions amounted to new agreements to pay an illegal rate of interest on the original principal, but this would not affect the liability on the note and mortgage in suit. In Richards v. Kountze, 4 Neb. 200, after the original notes, which were not tainted with usury, became due, a contract was indorsed thereon, by which it was agreed to extend the time of payment of the principal of the indebtedness, and to pay usurious interest for such extension. Justice Gantt, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If the original contract is bona fide, and wholly free from the taint of usury, then no subsequent agreement to pay usury, or an usurious premium upon the debt, will invalidate the instrument given for the payment of the debt, or affect the original contract with the vice of usury, or prevent the collection of the debt, with its legal interest. And this proposition, I think, is well founded in principle, and just in equity; for, if there was once a valid subsisting debt, bearing interest, the contract creating such debt cannot be impaired or destroyed by a subsequent void agreement. Such agreement would be a mere nullity, and could not impair or destroy rights acquired under a valid subsisting contract. Stewart v. Peetree, 55 N. Y. 623, 14 Am. Rep. 352; Rice 57 L. R. A.

v. Welling, 5 Wend. 597; Rogers v. Rathbun, 1 Johns. Ch. 367; Early v. Mahon, 19 Johns. 150, 10 Am. Dec. 204." This case was approved and followed in Dell v. Openheimer, 9 Neb. 454, 4 N. W. 51. If in giving the renewal notes it had been expressly agreed that they should take the place of the former note, and if the former note had thereupon been canceled and surrendered to the maker, and the mortgage released of record, it might be questioned whether, under our statute, the illegal renewals could be rejected, and an action maintained to reinstate the former securities which had been surrendered and canceled for the sole consideration of an illegal agreement; but the facts in this case, as found by the referee, do not present that question. Here it was agreed that the original valid note and mortgage should continue as a liability against the makers thereof, and it seems to me clear that the holder of the valid note and mortgage can maintain this action thereon, unaffected by the subsequent illegal agreement. McDonald v. Beer, 42 Neb. 437, 60 N. W. 868, does not seem to be in point, because in that case the action was on the renewal note, which was affected with usury, and in this case the action is upon the original note and mortgage, in which there was no usury.

I think the decree should be entered for the amount of the note sued on and interest, as reported by the referee.

Mr. J. S. Kirkpatrick for defendant in error.

Duffie, C., filed the following opinion:

William G. Chapin brought this action in the district court of Lancaster county against Mary C. Kitchen and A. D. Kitchen, alleging as his cause of action that he was the owner of a promissory note for $500 made by James H. O'Neill, and payable to the order of Mary C. Kitchen; that after the execution and delivery of said note, and before the maturity thereof, the said Mary C. Kitchen sold, assigned, and delivered the note to him, and for that purpose the said Mary C. Kitchen and A. D. Kitchen indorsed on the back of said note the following:

For value received, I hereby assign the within note unto William G. Chapin, and hereby guaranty payment of the same, and waive demand and notice of protest on same when due.

Mary C. Kitchen.
A. D. Kitchen.

It is alleged that the note is due and unpaid, and judgment is asked against the defendants. Mary C. Kitchen filed the following answer: "Now comes Mary C. Kitchen, and, for her answer to the petition of the plaintiff, says: At the time the note sued on was executed, and the indorsements of assignment and guaranty made, she was a married woman, the wife of her codefendant, A. D. Kitchen, and living with him. That previous to this time she owned some city lots in Lincoln, of uncertain value. Her said husband was engaged in the erection of some brick buildings in said city, and was needing money. This defendant said to him if he could sell some of her lots she would make a deed to the purchaser, and he, her said husband, could have the money realized from said sales to use in the erection of the said buildings he was erecting. Later he represented to her that he had negotiated a sale for certain lots, and asked her to execute a deed to the same to the defendant O'Neill, which she did. Later he brought to her the note and mortgage in suit, and asked her to write her name on the back of it, so he could use it in his business, which she did. The defendant alleges that she had no business dealings with the plaintiff whatever; that she has never been engaged in any trade or business, and did not get or receive any benefit or consideration for the sale of said lots, or for the execution of the deed she executed thereto, or for the transfer of said note to the plaintiff, or for said assignment and guaranty. She alleges that she did not enter into said contract of guaranty for the purpose of binding her separate estate, or with reference thereto, but only for the purpose of passing the title of said note, so her husband could get the money to use in his own business and enterprises. Wherefore she prays that she may go hence without day, and recover her costs." The reply is a practical admission of all the facts set out in the answer, except that she did not indorse the note for the purpose of binding her separate estate, or with reference thereto. The case was tried to the court without a jury, and judgment entered for the plaintiff below, and Mrs. Kitchen has taken error to this court.

The only question presented by the record is whether the plaintiff in error, a married woman, is liable upon her guaranty, under the admitted facts in this case. In order to assist her husband in some building operations in which he was engaged, she sold certain lots which she owned in her own right, taking this note as a part of the purchase price. For the purpose of negotiating the note, and obtaining money thereon for her husband's use, she guaranteed payment of the note, in the form above shown. Was this a contract relating to her separate estate, and did she intend thereby to bind her separate estate? In Grand Island Bkg. Co. v. Wright, 53 Neb. 574, 74 N. W. 82, Judge Norval, in speaking of the liabilities of a married woman under our enabling act, remarks at page 578, 53 Neb., and page 83, 74 N. W.: "But this statute does not, expressly nor by implication, enlarge a wife's capacity to contract generally. She can buy and sell property in her own name and upon her own account, and enter into valid contracts with reference to her separate estate, the same as if she were a feme sole, or as a married man may in relation to his property." It is undisputed that the note in suit was taken by Mrs. Kitchen on a sale of her separate property, and that the note itself was her separate property. She had the same right to hold and collect it or sell and negotiate it that a married man would have, and in the sale and transfer of the note she could undoubtedly bind herself by any contract of indorsement or guaranty that is usual or customary in the sale and transfer of such instruments. The contract was one relating wholly to her separate estate, in relation to which the statute empowers her to contract with the same freedom and to the same extent as though she were unmarried. The fact that the proceeds of the sale of the note were to go into her husband's business would not in the least affect her power to guarantee the payment of the note, and to bind herself by such guaranty.

The third finding of the court is as follows: "That, before the purchase of said note by the plaintiff, Mary C. Kitchen had given said note to the defendant A. D. Kitchen to use by him in his business, but that before said purchase said Mary C. Kitchen signed the guaranty hereinbefore found, and authorized her husband to put said note in circulation with said guaranty thereon." It is insisted that this finding shows that Mrs. Kitchen had parted with all interest in the note, and had given the same to her husband, prior to indorsing the same, and that she is therefore no more liable upon her indorsement than she would be by indorsing the note of her husband or of some third party. This third finding of the court is inconsistent with the admitted facts, and we think it is not to be considered. It is undoubtedly true that Mrs. Kitchen agreed with her husband, prior to a sale of this note to the defendant in error, that he might sell some of her lots and use the proceeds in his business. As before stated, the note in question was taken as part consideration on the sale of some of her lots; and, in the sense that she had agreed with her husband to give him the proceeds of these lots, she had given him this note. The record and her own answer make it plain, however, that she never transferred to her husband the legal title to the note by indorsing the same to him; and her answer admits that she indorsed the note at the request of her husband in order that it might be sold, and the proceeds used in his business. We think that she is bound by the allegations of her answer, and that, fairly construed, admits that she indorsed the note in its present form for the sole purpose of negotiating the same and transferring the title.

Our attention has been called to some cases from other states, and particular attention directed to Russel v. People's Sav. Bank, 39 Mich. 671, 33 Am. Rep. 444. It appears from the statement of facts made by Judge Cooley in that case that Mrs. Russel, a married woman, was the owner of a note made to her by the Hamtramck Iron Works. She was also a stockholder in the Detroit Car Works. The latter company was indebted to the People's Savings Bank, which threatened suit for the collection of its claim. To prevent suit, Mrs. Russel indorsed the note given her by the Hamtramck Iron Works, and gave it to the bank as a collateral security for the debt due it from the car company. The note not being paid at maturity, the bank brought suit against Mrs. Russel upon her indorsement. Judgment went against her in the superior court, which was reversed in the supreme court upon the ground that her contract of indorsement was made for the benefit of the bank, and that she could not bind herself as surety for another. The statement of the case shows that she indorsed this note, not for any purpose of her own, but as security for the payment of a debt due the bank from the car company, and the fact that she was a stockholder in the company could not enlarge her liability on the contract. Judge Cooley disposes of such a claim in the following apt words: "But it is said that in this case the suretyship was for the benefit of a corporation in which Mrs. Russel was a stockholder, and therefore she must be supposed to have had in view in making it her own interest in the corporation. Mrs. Russel, however, was not identified with the corporation otherwise than as having an interest in it. The legal identity of each was distinct, and contracts for the benefit of the corporate estate were in no sense contracts for the benefit of the estate of one of its corporators. . . . The test of competency to make the contract is to be found in this: that it does or does not deal with the woman's individual estate. Possible incidental benefits cannot support it. Tested by this criterion, this contract of indorsement, so far as it involves a personal responsibility, must fail. Mrs. Russel has contracted for the advantage, not of her own estate, but of a corporation with which she is no more identified in law than she is with her husband or any third person. . . . But there is no occasion to indulge in presumptions one way or the other. It is sufficient that the contract is one of suretyship, merely, and as such is not one the statute empowers a married woman to make." In the case we are now considering, the note was made payable to Mrs. Kitchen. She offered it on the market with her indorsement in the form above set out; and, while the purchaser of negotiable paper takes it with constructive notice of the disability of the maker or the indorser, we do not think he is driven to the inquiry of the use to which a married woman intends to devote the proceeds of a note payable to her order, and which she indorses to give it currency. Concededly, the law is that she would be liable on this contract of indorsement, had she invested the proceeds of the sale in the improvement of her separate estate or to her own personal use; and we cannot bring ourselves to think that because she may invest it in presents made to her friends, or turn it over to her husband to be used by him in his business, her liability is lessened in the slightest degree. A married woman in this state may engage in trade. Of necessity, she may take notes and bills in the conduct of her business, and, having taken them, she may dispose of them like other traders. As a trader, she gives an implied warranty of her title to every article which she sells; and, in case the property is lost to the purchaser because she had no title when she sold to him, there can be no doubt of his right to maintain an action against her on her implied warranty of title. This being so, why can she not make an express warranty of the quality of the goods she offers for sale,—a warranty that is valid and may be enforced against her? If she has not that power, then the statute which gives her leave to engage in trade places her at a disadvantage with other traders, who can make a valid warranty upon which their customers may rely as affording them protection. So, too, in the disposal of the notes and bills taken in the conduct of her business, if she cannot sell and dispose of them when the necessities of her business demand ready money, and make an indorsement upon which she may be held liable personally,—if she can indorse so as to transfer the legal title only,—then she is again at a disadvantage, and may be compelled to dispose of the notes and bills taken in the course of her business at a large discount, to a purchaser who would be willing to pay their full face value if he could rely upon her indorsement, rather than on the solvency of the maker, who is perhaps unknown to him. These considerations lead us to believe that it was the intent of the legislature to give to a married woman the same rights as a married man possesses, and to impose on her the same liabilities, in all transactions connected with her separate estate or trade or business, and that a person dealing with her in relation to her separate property need make no inquiry as to her intention in the disposition of the proceeds realized by her from a sale made either of notes or bills or of other property held by her in her own right.

We recommend the affirmance of the judgment.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County in favor of defendants in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Wright & Stout, for appellant:

The fact of copulation after a promise per verba de futuro is simply evidence from which the court may presume a new promise or a promise de presenti; and the fact of living together is not itself marriage, but is simply evidence from which the court may presume that a promise was made. This presumption, which ordinarily would arise from continued copulation, in the case at bar is overcome by the positive finding that no new promise was made, and that the relation was meretricious at its inception. Having been meretricious at its inception, it is presumed to continue meretricious until there is positive evidence of a change or a new promise.

Albert, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought by Elizabeth H. Bates against Daniel L. McGuckin and Anna McGuckin to foreclose a mortgage executed by the first-named defendant to the plaintiff. Anna McGuckin resisted the foreclosure, on the ground that at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and at all times subsequent thereto, she was the wife of her codefendant, and that the mortgaged premises was their family homestead; that the mortgage, not having been signed and acknowledged by her, was void. The reply was a general denial. A trial of the issues joined resulted in a finding and decree in favor of the defendant, to reverse which 57 L. R. A.

the case is brought to this court on appeal. For reasons not necessary to state in detail, the case is now prosecuted under its present title.

The first question presented is whether the findings of the trial court are sufficient to sustain the decree. The appellant challenges the sufficiency of the finding on two grounds, which will be considered in their order. It is first urged that the findings do not establish a marriage between Anna McGuckin and her codefendant. The finding on this point is as follows: "(4) The court further finds that the said Anna McGuckin entered the home of Daniel L. McGuckin in the month of April, 1880, as housekeeper for Daniel L. McGuckin. That she was then the wife of James Lavelle. That at the solicitation and expense of Daniel L. McGuckin she commenced an action for divorce against said James Lavelle in Burt county, Nebraska, and that a divorce was granted her on May 4, 1880, in the district court of Burt county, Nebraska. That at the time of the filing of her petition in Burt county, Nebraska, she was living in Burt county, Nebraska, and that her parents, with whom she had made her home since separating from said James Lavelle, were residing in said Burt county, Nebraska. (5) That in April, 1880, Daniel L. McGuckin was a married man, and that he obtained his divorce from his wife in August, 1880, and that said Anna McGuckin did not know of the fact that Daniel L. McGuckin was married until May 4, 1880. That at a time prior to the obtaining of her divorce, to wit, on May 4, 1880, said Daniel L. McGuckin and Anna McGuckin promised to marry as soon as she could get her divorce, and that they commenced cohabiting together at said time, and continued to so cohabit until April, 1893. That the said Daniel L. McGuckin again promised to marry the said Anna McGuckin after she got her divorce, and before he obtained his divorce, and promised that he would so marry her as soon as he could procure a divorce from his wife. That pending his action for divorce they cohabited as husband and wife, and held each other out to the world as husband and wife, and that no marriage ceremony was ever performed, and that she continued to live with and cohabit with the said Daniel L. McGuckin until the spring of 1893. That they announced themselves as husband and wife to her relatives, and so conducted themselves wherever they went. That he introduced her as his wife in society and in the church, and spoke of her as his wife in stores where they traded, addressed her as 'Mrs. McGuckin' in the presence of company, paid her bills, and supported her as his wife. That Daniel L. McGuckin gave her an engagement ring and a wedding ring. That she gave birth to five children, whose paternity Mr. McGuckin has always acknowledged, and which were duly baptized in the Catholic Church as children of legally married parents. Four of said children are still living. That the promises above made were the only promises ever made, and that no new promise was made after the obtaining of the divorce by Daniel L. McGuckin, nor was there any apparent change in their manner of living or holding themselves out as husband and wife." In our opinion the foregoing is a finding of a marriage between the parties. Marriage in this state is purely a civil contract, and whenever the minds of parties capable of entering into a marriage contract with each other meet in a common consent thereto at the same time, there is a valid marriage. Bailey v. State, 36 Neb. 808, 55 N. W. 241. No particular form of words is required to express such common consent. The announcement of the parties to her relatives that they (the defendants) were husband and wife in itself shows a meeting of their minds at the same time in common consent to bear that relation each to the other. That the relations between the parties, before divorced from their respective spouses, was meretricious, is immaterial, so long as their minds did meet, as before stated, at a time when they were both free to enter into a contract of marriage. Poole v. People, 24 Colo. 510, 52 Pac. 1025; State v. Zichfeld, 23 Nev. 304, 34 L. R. A. 784, 46 Pac. 802.

It is next urged that the defendant Anna McGuckin had waived or abandoned her right to claim a homestead as against the appellant. The question involved is purely one of fact, and, as such, was submitted to the court, and the court found against the appellant. The evidence is not before us, and it will be presumed that the findings of the court are sufficiently sustained by the evidence.

It is next urged that the answer of Anna McGuckin does not allege that she was the wife of her codefendant at the time the mortgage was executed. This fact might have been pleaded with greater certainty, but in our opinion it sufficiently appears when called in question for the first time on appeal. The decree of the district court should be affirmed.

Ames and Duffie, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the decrees of the District Court is affirmed.

A rehearing having been granted, Ames, C., on March 19, 1902, filed the following additional opinion:

This cause is resubmitted upon arguments and briefs upon a rehearing granted from a former decision in the same cause. The opinion in which was filed on the 10th day of July, 1901. The case was submitted upon a record containing the pleadings and findings of fact of the trial court, only. The principal question discussed upon the reargument, and the only one with which we think it requisite to deal in this opinion, is that of the validity of the alleged marriage between the appellees Anna Mc-

Guckin and Daniel McGuckin. The findings of fact relative to this inquiry are copied in the former opinion, and need not be repeated here. The district court found, as a conclusion of law, that they were sufficient to establish the validity of the marriage. In this conclusion this court, in its former opinion, concurred. The facts found are many of them evidential, rather than ultimate, in character. The beginning of the cohabitation was meretricious, each of the parties having a lawful spouse then living; but both these obstacles were soon afterwards removed by decrees of divorce, and thereafter the parties not only continued for a long term of years to live together as husband and wife, and to enjoy the repute of that relation, but continuously represented themselves to the public and individuals as being such. During this time, and before the making of the mortgage in question, five children were born of the union, whom their parents unitedly represented to the public, and caused to be baptized into church, as the children of lawful wedlock. That these facts and certain others recited in the finding would, if standing alone, be sufficient evidence of marriage, cannot be doubted, and is explicitly admitted by counsel for the appellant in both brief and argument. But in connection with them, and as a part of the same finding in which they are set forth, the court also found that, although the parties made promises to marry prior to the obtaining of the divorces, yet that such promises "were the only promises ever made, and that no new promise was made after obtaining of the decree of divorce by Daniel McGuckin, nor was there any apparent change in their manner of living, or holding themselves out as husband and wife." Counsel thereupon insists that a lawful marriage could have had its inception only in a promise or agreement of marriage after the removal of the legal obstacles thereto; that the evidential facts found are of no significance, except as tending to establish the making of such a promise or agreement, or of raising a presumption that one had been made, and that whether one had been made was the only ultimate fact in controversy; and that the language quoted above from the finding, being an express negation of such promise, is decisive of the case, so that the evidential facts found are immaterial. In other words, it is contended, as we understand counsel, that a single finding by the court that there was no promise or agreement after obtaining of the divorces would have had the precise legal weight of the actual finding, and that it is not a material inquiry whether the court recited all or only part of the evidence establishing this ultimate fact, because it was not obligatory upon him to recite any of it. We can hardly believe that this is the interpretation which the trial judge himself put upon his findings, and we are not convinced that it is the true one to be given to that document. In our opinion, an express verbal promise or agreement of marriage is not in all cases indispensable under our law. The statute enacts (Comp. Stat. chap. 52, § 1): "In law, marriage is considered a civil contract to which the consent of the parties capable of contracting is essential." The main purpose of this definition is, we think, to negative the idea that marriage is an ecclesiastical sacrament, or that in the eye of the law it is controlled by the mandates or dogmas, or subject to the observance of the rituals or regulations, of any particular churches or sects. That it is not a contract resembling in any but the slightest degree, except as to the element of consent, any other contract with which the courts have to deal, is apparent upon a moment's reflection. This was pointed out by the late Mr. Justice Field, with his usual clearness of expression and wealth of illustration, in Maynard v. Hill, 125 U. S. 190, 31 L. ed. 654, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 723. What persons establish by entering into matrimony is not a contractual relation, but a social status; and the only essential features of the transactions are that the participants are of legal capacity to assume that status, and freely consent so to do. It may be true, as counsel for appellant contends, that the indispensable consent cannot be implied, but must in all cases be expressed; but it does not follow that it must be expressed in any especial manner, or by any prescribed form of words. The statute above cited dispenses with all ceremonials,—verbal as well as other. It was probably this idea which was in the mind of the trial judge when he penned the words quoted above from his finding. In other words, it appeared to him, as it appears to us, that there was sufficient evidence that after the obtaining of the last divorce the parties consented to assume the status of husband and wife, although they made no explicit verbal contract or agreement so to do. Doubtless the very phrase which counsel for appellant regards as establishing the ultimate, conclusive, and solely essential fact, the trial judge looked upon as slightly, if at all, material. So construed, his finding is inconsistent neither with itself, nor with the conclusion of law and judgment, and that this is its true interpretation is to our minds perfectly clear. As has already been said, it is conceded, and, indeed, it could not well be disputed, that there is in the finding, aside from this single expression, sufficient evidence of the consent of the parties, after the removal of their disabilities, to assume the marriage relation. That evidence is not rebutted by the mere negative fact that they omitted to express that consent by formal words. The ultimate fact is not that the parties made a formal promise or contract, but that they mutually consented to a social relation. This consent may be expressed by conduct as effectively as by words, and proof of the conduct is proof of the consent. In both cases the conclusion drawn by the court is from an implication, but in either case all that is required is that the expression be clear and unambiguous. In neither case can it properly be said that the contract or the consent is implied.

It is recommended that the former decision of this court be adhered to, and the judgment of the district court affirmed.

Oldham, C., filed the following opinion:

One Nierstheimer owned a farm in Thayer county, Nebraska, of 160 acres, upon which George E. Aldrich (the plaintiff in error) had a mortgage. This mortgage was foreclosed by a decree of the district court of Thayer county, in 1897, at the February term thereof. The statutory stay was taken. Nierstheimer, the mortgagor, was in possession of, and was farming, this land, and in the month of September of the year 1897 he planted 40 acres of this land to wheat. On November 15, 1897, he gave to the Bank of Ohiowa (the defendant in error) a chattel mortgage on the north one-half of this field of wheat, to secure his note, which he had that day given it for $850. This note was, by its terms, due in ninety days from its date. This mortgage was duly filed for record, and it is stipulated in the record that this note has not been paid. The land was sold under the decree of foreclosure by the sheriff of Thayer county on January 24, 1898, Aldrich being the purchaser. The sale was confirmed, and a deed thereon was issued to Aldrich on March 21, 1898, and Aldrich at once took possession of this land, and still has the possession. The bank claimed the right to go upon this land and harvest this mortgaged wheat, and demanded of Aldrich that it be permitted to do so. This was refused by Aldrich, who claimed the wheat by reason of his ownership of the land, and harvested and marketed the same; whereupon the bank brought its action against Aldrich for the conversion of the wheat. This action was tried to the district court of Thayer county (a jury being waived), which resulted in a judgment for the bank for the sum of $130.76,—the value of the wheat, less the cost of harvesting and marketing,—from which judgment Aldrich prosecutes error to this court.

The problem for solution, then, is, Who is entitled to the wheat,—the mortgagee or the purchaser of the land at judicial sale? There is no question presented as to the validity of this chattel mortgage in its inception. The property was in esse, and the right to mortgage is not questioned; but it is claimed that by the confirmation of the sale the title to the real estate on which the wheat was growing passed to Aldrich and carried with it the wheat. So the ownership of this property is dependent on the question, Do crops that are not matured, but growing on the land at the time of the confirmation of the judicial sale, pass to the purchaser of the land, or do they remain the property of him who planted them? Phases of this question have been passed upon by this court. In Foss v. Marr, 40 Neb. 559, 59 N. W. 122, this court held: "A matured crop of corn standing ungathered upon land sold at judicial sale, which was not considered or taken into account by the appraisers in arriving at the value of the premises sold, did not pass to the purchaser at the judicial sale, but remained the property of the mortgagor, who had planted and cultivated it." In Monday v. O'Neil, 44 Neb. 724, 63 N. W. 32, the court says that "a tenant for years of mortgaged land planted a crop after the rendition of a decree foreclosing the mortgage, the tenant having been a defendant in the foreclosure suit. The land was sold under the decree, and the sale confirmed, while the crop was growing, and before it matured. The purchaser did not obtain possession of the land, but permitted the tenant to retain possession, merely notifying him that he, the purchaser, would expect from the tenant rent in money or in kind. Held that, as between the tenant and purchaser, the former was entitled to the crop." In this last case the court did not determine what the rights of the parties would have been had Monday secured possession and evicted O'Neil before the crop matured. But the court, in both Foss v. Marr and Monday v. O'Neil, bases its decision on the case of Cassilly v. Rhodes, 12 Ohio, 88, and Houts v. Showalter, 10 Ohio St. 125. The doctrine of these cases is that annual crops growing on the land do not pass to the purchaser on judicial sale, because in law they are regarded as personalty. We must either accept this classification or reject the doctrine of the Ohio cases absolutely. To reject this would be to overturn Foss v. Marr and Monday v. O'Neil, which, to the extent they have gone in the application of this doctrine, have become a rule of property in this state; and for this reason we do not feel justified in overthrowing them. This being so, nothing but the other alternative is left to us, which is the acceptance of this classification, and, with the Ohio cases, hold that the title to the annual crops growing on the lands do not pass to the purchaser on judicial sale, for the reason that the law regards them as personal property. This being their legal status, the controversy over whether or not they were taken into account by the appraisers becomes immaterial. The appraisers of the land would have no right to appraise the personalty which they may find upon the land. This status of the property also renders the question of possession by the purchaser a plain and reasonable one. It will be conceded that a purchase of real estate would not carry with it the personal property of the vendor. When you buy and receive title to my land, you do not buy my horse, and by the act of buying the land you have acquired no right to the horse. The result would be, and is, the logical sequence of all personal property of whatsoever nature and kind, and hence Aldrich acquired no ownership of this property in controversy by reason of his purchase at judicial sale of the land on which the wheat was growing. Having no ownership, how would the possession of the land give him the right to treat this property as his own and apply it to his own use? Counsel suggest no answer to this question. Nor do we think it could be answered to his advantage. The land passes by a judicial sale to the purchaser, burdened with any and all the rights of other parties, including the mortgagor, that are not inconsistent with, or opposed to, title. Title, and this alone, is all the court gives the purchaser. From this he may, or may not, according to the circumstances of the case, or the rights of others, have the right of possession. But the possession of the purchaser could not by any reason of that act destroy the rights of others, nor justify him in appropriating other people's property; and it would make no difference to whom it belonged, as it did not belong to him.

The law recognizes the necessity of agriculture, and favors its promotion, and, as is said in Houts v. Shoualter, 10 Ohio St. 125, "under our system, frequent advertisements and offers for sale, and occasionally revaluations are necessary before a sale can be effected. When an appraisement is made, it cannot be foreseen when a sale will be effected. It is not for the interest of any party, nor for the public interest, that the land should thenceforth lie waste; then, there may have been no crop sown or planted." This failure to sow or plant is what the law discourages, and it can only encourage sowing and planting under circumstances like these by assuring a man that if he sow he shall reap.

The judgment of the court below is right, and we recommend that it be affirmed.

NOTE.—For an earlier case in this series holding that a statute very similar to the one discussed above is unconstitutional because the distinctions attempted to be made were no proper basis for classification, see State ex rel. Luria v. Wagener (Minn.) 38 L. R. A. 677.

As to necessity of uniformity in license or an exercise of the taxing power, and not the police power.

2. It is settled doctrine that the courts will not declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional unless it is manifestly so.

3. The provision of § 154 of the general revenue law, authorizing fine and imprisonment as a means of enforcing a license tax, does not trench upon the Constitution, and is therefore valid.

4. An act entitled "An Act to Provide a System of Revenue" covers the entire subject of taxation, and comprehends whatever means or machinery the legislature may provide to enforce payment of taxes.

5. The provision of the Constitution (art. 9, § 1) authorizing the taxation of persons engaged in certain occupations, in such manner as the legislature shall direct by general law, uniform as to the classes upon which it operates, forbids partiality and favoritism, and makes equality before the law a rule of legislative action. It does not, however, forbid reasonable classification of persons for the purpose of taxation.

6. Classification, to be valid, must not be arbitrary. It must rest on some reason of public policy,—some substantial difference of situation or circumstances that would naturally suggest the justice or expediency of diverse legislation with respect to the objects or individuals classified.

7. There is such a real distinction between persons who go from house to house, and place to place, vending their own products, and those who sell in the same way the productions of others, that the legislature, acting on considerations of general policy, may make it the basis of classification for the purpose of taxation.

8. A particular classification may be valid if the object of the statute is to raise revenue, and invalid if the object is regulation.

9. The law imposing an occupation tax upon peddlers is sufficiently certain to be capable of enforcement.

Mr. William O'Brien also for defendant in error.

Sullivan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Max Rosenbloom, defendant below, having been convicted of peddling in Platte county without a license, seeks by this proceeding to obtain a reversal of the sentence. The statutory provisions which we have occasion to consider in disposing of the questions presented for decision are found in the general revenue law (Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 77, art. 1), and are here set out:

"Sec. 152. Peddlers plying their vocation outside of the limits of a city or town within any county in this state, and peddlers selling by sample outside of the limits of a city or town within any county in this state, shall pay, for the use of said county, an annual tax of twenty-five ($25) dollars; those with a vehicle drawn by one (1) animal, fifty ($50) dollars; those with two (2) and less than four (4) animals, seventy-five ($75) dollars; those with four (4) or more animals, one hundred ($100) dollars. Nothing in this section shall be held to apply to parties selling their own work or production, or educational, either by themselves or employees, nor to persons selling at wholesale to merchants, nor to persons selling fresh meats, fruit, farm produce, trees, or plants exclusively.

"Sec. 153. A certificate or license shall be issued to any such peddler by the county clerk, upon the presentation of a receipt showing the payment of the proper tax to the county treasurer, and such certificate or license shall be good only in the county where issued, and shall not authorize peddling in cities and towns.

"Sec. 154. Any person peddling outside the limits of a city or town in any county within this state, without such certificate, or license, or after the expiration thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and the person actually peddling is liable, whether he be the owner of the goods sold or carried by him or not, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined the sum of fifty ($50) dollars and stand committed until the fine is paid, or he be discharged as provided by law; and if any peddler refuses to exhibit his license to any person requiring a view of the same, he shall be presumed to have none, and if he produces a license upon trial, such peddler shall pay all costs of prosecution."

It is conceded that the facts alleged in the information exist, but it is insisted that they do not constitute a crime. The argument is that the law taxing peddlers trenches in various ways upon the Consti-

273, and note; State v. Emert (Mo.) 11 L. R. A. 219; Re Spain (C. C. E. D. N. C.) 14 L. R. A. 97, with note on peddlers and drummers as related to interstate commerce; *South Bend v. tution, and is therefore void. It is said in the first place that the object of the legislation is to raise county revenue, and that revenue measures cannot, in this state, be enforced by the infliction of fines or penalties. We agree with counsel in the view that the primary and paramount, if not the only, object of the law, is to obtain revenue, by imposing a tax upon the business of peddling. The only thing the peddler is required to do is to pay his tax, and exhibit the appropriate evidence of payment to any person who may wish to see it. The only thing he is forbidden to do is to pursue his calling without first having paid the tax. No police inspection or supervision is provided for. If the things commanded and forbidden are to be regarded as features of regulation or repression, they are not, to say the least, so pronounced or conspicuous as to suggest the idea that the law is referable to the police power, rather than the power of taxation. But granting the contention of counsel for defendant that the statute is a revenue measure, pure and simple, we are not able to discover any valid objection to the enforcement of it in the manner provided by the legislature. It is settled doctrine in this and in every other jurisdiction that courts will not adjudge statutes unconstitutional unless they are plainly so. Now, with what express provision of the higher law does the statute in question clash? We know of none. It may, perhaps, be said that imprisonment for debt has been abolished; but taxes are not debts, within the meaning of the Constitution, and, if they were, the provision with respect to a fine and that with respect to imprisonment are not so inseparably connected that they must stand or fall together. "The law abolishing imprisonment for debt," says Judge Cooley, "has no application to taxes; and the remedies for their collection may include an arrest, if the legislature shall so provide." Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 17. In speaking of license taxes, the learned author further remarks that it is still customary to enforce payment of them by arrest and imprisonment, adding that "a constitutional provision inhibiting imprisonment for debt has no application to the case of a license tax." Cooley, Taxn. 438. Among the many cases sustaining this view, we cite the following: Appleton v. Hopkins, 5 Gray, 530; Daggett v. Everett, 19 Me. 373; McCaskell v. State, 53 Ala. 511; Com. v. Byrne, 20 Gratt. 165; Denver City R. Co. v. Denver, 21 Colo. 350, 29 L. R. A. 608, 41 Pac. 826; Campbell v. Anthony, 40 Kan. 652, 20 Pac. 492; St. Louis v. Sternberg, 69 Mo. 289; Bozeman v. Cadwell, 14 Mont. 480, 36 Pac. 1042; Cincinnati v. Buckingham, 10 Ohio, 257; Re Dassler, 35 Kan. 678, 12 Pac. 130.

Limitations upon legislative power are to be found in written constitutions. It has not been customary to look for them in the opinions of the courts. When it pleased the people of this state to put an end to the ancient practice of seizing the person of a debtor as a means of coercing payment of a debt, they put into the bill of rights this expression of their sovereign will: "No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any civil action on meane or final process unless in cases of fraud." Section 20, Bill of Rights. This language is terse and lucid. It means just what it says, and, when considered in the light of familiar history, it seems hardly possible to misunderstand it. It deals only with procedure in civil actions,—actions having for their object the collection of debts. It has no application to the civil liability created by the bastardy act (Ex parte Cottrell, 13 Neb. 193, 13 N. W. 174; Ex parte Donahoe, 24 Neb. 69, 38 N. W. 28), and it has certainly no relation whatever to criminal actions brought by the state to punish the violation of a public law. The just and humane policy of abolishing imprisonment for debt cannot be too highly commended, but an extension of that policy by judicial decision can be defended only on the theory that beneficent usurpation is justifiable. Three cases decided by this court (State v. Green, 27 Neb. 64, 42 N. W. 913; Magneau v. Fremont, 30 Neb. 844, 9 L. R. A. 786, 47 N. W. 280; and Templeton v. Tekamah, 32 Neb. 542, 49 N. W. 373) declare that penal provisions of an occupation tax ordinance are unenforceable. These decisions do not profess to rest in either reason or authority, and are, in our judgment, contrary to both. If they had become a rule of property, we should certainly adhere to them, but, since they have not, we think they should not be regarded as binding precedents; and they are accordingly overruled.

Another ground upon which the law is assailed is that § 154, which prescribes penalties for peddling without a license, is not embraced within the title of the act. The title is a very comprehensive one. It is "An Act to Provide a System of Revenue," and, ex vi termini, covers the entire subject of taxation. It comprehends the selection of the persons, property, and franchises to be taxed, the manner and method of revenue to be raised, the means or machinery by which the taxes are to be collected, and many other matters obviously germane to a general scheme or plan for providing funds with which to defray the necessary expense of maintaining a state and local government. A law to provide a system of revenue would be singularly weak and inefficient if it did not make adequate provision for the collection of taxes. In fact, every revenue law does contain such provision. The usual and appropriate method of enforcing payment of a property tax is by the addition of an increased rate of interest, which is in truth a penalty, and by the sale of the taxed property. But payment of taxes on occupations cannot be enforced in this way, and hence the ordinary, and often the only effective, method of compelling payment, is by fine and imprisonment of the person upon whom the tax is imposed. In the recent case of Nebraska Loan & Bldg. Asso. v. Perkins, 61 Neb. 254, 85 N. W. 67, it is said: "If no portion of the bill is foreign to the subject of legislation, as indicated by the title, however general the latter may be, it is in harmony with the constitutional mandate." Tested by this rule, it is, we think, entirely manifest that the penal provision of § 154 is covered by the title of the act.

A further contention of counsel for defendant is that, by reason of the exceptions contained in § 152, the law lacks the essential requirement of uniformity. The Constitution (§ 1, art. 9) declares that the legislature may impose a tax upon persons engaged in certain occupations, "in such manner as it shall direct by general law, uniform as to the class upon which it operates." This provision undoubtedly contemplates that all persons pursuing the same business or calling under the same conditions and circumstances shall be treated alike, and subjected to the same burdens. In other words, partiality and favoritism are forbidden, and equality before the law is made a rule of legislative action. But as was said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Seabolt v. Northumberland County, 187 Pa. 318, 41 Atl. 22: "Classification is a legislative question, subject to judicial revision only so far as to see that it is founded on real distinctions in the subjects classified, and not on artificial or irrelevant ones, used for the purpose of evading the constitutional prohibition." In the case of State ex rel. Dawson County v. Farmers' & M. Irrig. Co. 59 Neb. 4, 80 N. W. 53, we had occasion to consider this question, and reached the conclusion, after a pretty thorough examination of the authorities, that the "classification, to be valid, must rest on some reason of public policy, some substantial difference of situation or circumstances, that would naturally suggest the justice or expediency of diverse legislation with respect to the objects classified." The real test of the validity of defendant's objection to this statute is not whether the classification is wise and just, but whether the legislature acted arbitrarily,—whether, without an adequate determining principle, it made a division of peddlers into two classes, and then sought to deprive one class of their constitutional right to the equal protection of the laws. If there is a genuine and substantial distinction between persons who go from house to house, and place to place, vending their own products, and those who sell in the same manner the productions of others, the classification is founded in the nature of things, and is therefore upon a basis everywhere recognized as lawful. Now, there is, in our opinion, such a marked and material difference between the two classes of peddlers as to make it entirely proper for the legislature, acting on considerations of general policy, to tax one class, and to permit the other to go free. The man who goes about the country selling what he has himself produced may be presumed to confer a benefit upon the general public, by eliminating the profits of the retail merchant, and perhaps even those of the wholesaler and jobber. He has a fixed abode where he produces the things which he sells, and where he may be reached and required to make good his warranties. He is generally the owner of immovable property, which is subject to state and local taxation. It may be that he is required by the municipality in which he lives to pay a poll tax and a tax upon his business; to build and repair sidewalks, and keep the same free from snow, ice, and other obstructions. He contributes to the social, educational, and financial property of the community in which he resides. He bears a just share there of the burdens of government. And, in addition to all this, it must be remembered that the sale of his products is only incidental to the business of producing them. These characteristics, speaking generally, distinguish the untaxed peddler from the peddler who is taxed; and they are, it seems to us, quite sufficient to justify the classification which the legislature has made. In State v. Stevenson, 109 N. C. 730, 14 S. E. 385, a license tax upon merchants was upheld, although it exempted purchasers of farm products from the producers. The court, after observing that the law puts all merchants dealing in farm products purchased of the producers in one class, and all other merchants in another class, and treats all in each class alike, goes on to say: "There is no discrimination in either class. The power to select particular trades or occupations, and subject them to a license tax, cannot be denied to the legislature, nor the power to tax such trades according to different rules, provided the rule in regard to each business is uniform." The supreme court of Maine had before it in a recent case the question we are now considering. State v. Montgomery, 92 Me. 433, 43 Atl. 16. In delivering judgments sustaining the law, Savage, J., said: "It is contended that the exception which permits one to peddle without license 'the products of his own labor, or the labor of his family, any patent of his own invention, or in which he has become interested by being a member of any firm, or stockholder in any corporation which has purchased the patent,' is a discrimination in favor of some and against others. We do not think so. If one may peddle freely the products of his own labor, so may all. The products may be unlike, but the freedom to prosecute one's own business and to peddle his own products is free alike to all. So of the other exceptions. While it may happen that various producers may peddle each the product of his own labor without license, but not of the labor of another, still we think this fairly answers the requirements of uniformity. The legislature is the sole judge of the extent to which the business of peddling should be regulated, and its conclusions are final, so long as the burdens imposed do not bear unevenly upon citizens. Ex parte Thornton, 12 Fed. 538." This decision is in conflict with State ex rel. Luria v. Wagner, 69 Minn. 206, 38 L. R. A. 677, 72 N. W. 67, referred to in the brief of counsel for defendant. In each case the statute construed was held to be a police regulation having for its object the protection of the public. In this case we have no occasion to determine which view of the matter is correct, because the classification in our statute was made for the purpose of taxation, and not for the purposes of regulating the business of peddling. It is plain, of course, that a particular classification may be valid if the object of the legislation is revenue, and invalid if the object is regulation.

The law is also assailed on the ground that it lacks definiteness and certainty, but we think there is so little merit in this objection that it may be overruled without discussion.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Holcomb, J., dissenting:

Although entertaining the profoundest respect for the legal ability, erudition, and discriminating judgment of my associates, I am unable to concur in the majority opinion formulated by the chief justice in this case, and will, as briefly as is consistent with reasonable clearness of expression of my views, give some of the reasons which impel me to dissent therefrom.

The conclusion reached necessitates the overruling of several prior decisions of this court, of many years' standing, which have become, and should be regarded as, the settled law of the state; and this I am unwilling to assent to, because the principle of stare decisis is, in my judgment, too lightly regarded, and the overturning of the adjudications referred to is without sufficient cause. The law as therein enunciated has stood unchallenged for over a decade, and should not now, except upon the most weighty and grave consideration, be overturned. The doctrine, as expressed in the overruled decisions, as to the power to enact laws providing for imprisonment to enforce collection of taxes, is itself sound in principle, and supported by both reason and authority. The soundness of these decisions has not been challenged since they were enunciated, and they should not now be overruled, unless unmistakably and radically unsound in principle. The course of legislation has been consistent with the Constitution as construed in these overruled decisions. The charters and ordinances of the cities and towns have been enacted and enforced in conformity with the law as thus construed. The whole history of the jurisprudence of the state lends color and support to the principle as announced therein, to the effect that the collection of taxes is to be enforced by the application of remedies civil only in their nature. It is aptly said by Mr. Justice White, in a dissenting opinion in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 650, 39 L. ed. 759, 843, 15 Sup. Ct. 57 L. R. A.

(Rep. 673, 716 (and I can do no better than quote his words): "The conservation and orderly development of our institutions rests on our acceptance of the results of the past, and their use as lights to guide our steps in the future. Teach the lesson that settled principles may be overthrown at any time, and confusion and turmoil must ultimately result. . . . The fundamental conception of a judicial body is that of one hedged about by precedents which are binding on the court, without regard to the personality of its members. Break down this belief in judicial continuity, and let it be felt that on great constitutional questions this court is to depart from the settled conclusions of its predecessors, and to determine them all according to the mere opinion of those who temporarily fill its bench, and our Constitution will, in my judgment, be bereft of value, and become a most dangerous instrument to the rights and liberties of the people.")

It is worthy of note that of the five eminent jurists who have graced the bench we now occupy, and who have all expressly concurred in the views as stated in the several decisions it is now proposed to overthrow, two of them were honored members of the constitutional convention which formulated the organic law of the state which they afterwards were by the people of the state called upon to interpret and expound. Who shall say that these men, not only because of their great learning, but also on account of their presence and participation in the work of that convention, were not in a peculiarly advantageous position, and well qualified to correctly interpret and construe the several provisions of that document? When it was held in the case of State v. Green, 27 Neb. 64, 42 N. W. 913, that an occupation tax is to be collected by distress and sale of the property of the tax debtor, in the same manner as the collection of debts generally, and not by imprisonment, the conclusion, I assume, was arrived at on the theory that by the adoption of the Constitution, with its provision against imprisonment for debt in any civil action, except in case of fraud, an occupation tax was a debt, within the meaning of the word as used in that instrument, and therefore collection thereof could be enforced only as other civil obligations. The language of the Constitution is fairly susceptible of this interpretation without doing violence to any well-recognized rule of construction. If a tax is treated as a debt as it is by all authorities, then the construction was proper, and the fact that no lengthy reasons were given in support of the decision in no way militates against its soundness. I am aware that in many jurisdictions a distinction is made between a debt created by the levy of taxes and those arising ordinarily between individuals on contract or otherwise. But the reason given for such construction is not free from imperfection, and is in some cases warranted, because of substantial difference in the language of the law which was being construed. The logic of the ma-majority opinion is to hold that in a purely fiscal measure, enacted solely for the purpose of raising revenues, the enforcement of the provisions of the act, and the collection of dues levied thereunder, whether on property, person, or business, may be coerced by invoking the aid of the criminal law, and the infliction of fines and imprisonment on the person on whom the obligation rests, regardless of the question of his ability to meet the obligation, or the possession of property or means wherewith to satisfy the same. The doctrine, if extended to its legitimate scope and breadth, authorizes every municipality in the state to levy taxes on the person, property, and business of the inhabitants thereof, within the limits of the law, and to coerce payment by arrest and incarceration of the delinquent until the taxes are paid, or until a judgment of fine and imprisonment is satisfied. This, to me, is a startling doctrine, and thoroughly repugnant to our entire system of jurisprudence, and in conflict with the very letter of the Constitution itself. Such a construction, it seems to me, is contrary to the Constitution, as evidenced by the terms of that instrument, the course of judicial construction since its adoption, and the character of the legislation enacted with reference thereto. A tax, in this state, has always, so far as my knowledge extends, been regarded as a civil liability of the same general character as other debts, and so considered by both the courts and the legislature. With reference to real estate taxes even the personal civil liability has been eliminated, under the laws in relation thereto as construed by this court; and all such taxes are held to be only a charge against the real estate against which levied, to be satisfied by a sale of the property, and not by recourse to the personal liability of the owner of the property when assessed. A personal property tax, or a tax on a business or calling, has heretofore, I think, without exception, been treated as a civil liability against the person to whom assessed, for the enforcement of which the taxing authorities could resort only to remedies common to the collection of other civil liabilities. In a very recent suit we decided that a civil action was maintainable for the recovery of personal taxes in the same manner as for the recovery of debts generally. Hoover v. Engles (Neb.) 88 N. W. 869. In fact, the entire history of the state, both judicial and legislative, since the adoption of our present Constitution, so far as my knowledge extends, has treated the obligations imposed for revenue purposes on the same plane as debts generally, and the collection thereof to be enforced in a civil action, and not by punishment in a criminal proceeding, by fine and imprisonment. I venture to say that a search will be made in vain for an utterance either by the courts or the legislature of the state during the last quarter of a century indicative of the power of the legislature to authorize the coercion of the payment of the public revenues in a criminal action by fines and imprisonment. Is it not fairly inferable, since the legislature has made no attempt to authorize the enforcement of the collection of the revenues necessary for the expense of government, except by civil remedies, such as are common to the enforcement of all civil obligations, that it, too, has given a construction to the Constitution in harmony with the prior utterances of this court? Is it not reasonable to say that the legislature, enacting laws for the collection of the public revenues, would, in all probability, go as far as its powers were deemed to extend? The necessity for the speedy collection of all such taxes, and that all against whom the charge is made should bear the just proportion of these necessary public burdens, would naturally suggest to any legislative body the wisdom of making the payment of the obligations as certain and prompt as might be done under a full exercise of the powers belonging to the legislature in that regard. Can there exist any reasonable doubt that for over a quarter of a century the legislature and the courts of the state have deemed the power of coercing payment of the public revenues exhausted when all remedies for the collection permitted in actions civil in their nature had been provided for? I am not speaking of license taxes, but of measures purely fiscal, for the collection of revenues generally in support of government, and as the term is ordinarily understood. I shall speak of license taxes later on. If the legislature and the courts during this long period of time have so construed the force and effect of the constitutional provision referred to, then I submit that it is now too late to undertake to give to it an entirely inconsistent and contrary construction. But it is said in the majority opinion that it is not all civil liabilities that are included in the purview of this provision of the Constitution, and we are cited to authorities holding to the right of imprisonment under the bastardy act, which is denominated a "civil action." These authorities, however, expressly hold that while the action is in its nature civil, as distinguished from a criminal trial, yet the law, as enacted, is an exercise of the police powers of the state. Ex parte Donahoe, 24 Neb. 69, 38 N. W. 28. As a police regulation, the imprisonment is lawful, and it was competent for the legislature to provide for imprisonment as means to the desired end. It is not to be doubted that, in the exercise of the police powers of the state, imprisonment is justified and warranted for the preservation of public morals, good order, and the peace and welfare of society.

A similar constitutional provision against imprisonment for debt is found in the Constitution of Ohio, from which ours is adapted word for word, and which has existed in that state for over half a century. I have yet to learn of an authority in that jurisdiction, or an action by the lawmaking body, recognizing the power of the legislature to coerce payment of taxes levied for public revenues by fine and imprisonment for failure to pay the obligation thus imposed. Surely this is some indication of the soundness of the construction heretofore given to an identical provision in our own Constitution. It is held there, as here, that the bastardy act, providing for a judgment against the putative father, and its enforcement by imprisonment, may be resorted to, and that such judgment is not a debt, within the meaning of the constitutional provision under consideration. Musser v. Steward, 21 Ohio St. 353. While the section has been construed in various ways by the court of last resort of that state, none of the decisions relating thereto give countenance or support to the construction adopted in the majority opinion in the case at bar. In a very early case in one of the inferior courts of that state that provision of the Constitution was under consideration, and it is there said: "The 15th section of the 1st article of the Constitution declares 'that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any civil action, on mesne or final process, unless in cases of fraud.' This provision is contained in the bill of rights, and is an explicit declaration that the people have reserved to themselves the sacred boon of personal liberty, and have denied to the government all control over their persons, except for the commission of crimes, and the isolated case of fraud in their business transactions. This declaration is regarded as an ample safeguard, without either legislative or judicial construction, and admits of no such thing by either the one or the other of the departments of the government." Messenger v. Lockwood, 9 West. L. J. 521. This construction appears reasonable and fairly supported by the language used. On the same point it is stated in the syllabus in State v. Mace, 5 Md. 337: "The term 'debt,' in that clause of the Constitution which provides that 'no person shall be imprisoned for debt,' is to be understood as an obligation arising otherwise than from the sentence of a court for the breach of the public peace or commission of a crime." I hope I may be pardoned for quoting at some length from the opinion of the court in the case last mentioned, because my own views are reflected therein quite as clearly as I could express them in language of my own choosing. The court says: "The 44th section of the 3d article of the Constitution declares: 'No person shall be imprisoned for debt;' and the court of common pleas have decided in this case that a fine imposed by a justice of the peace for a violation of the act of 1854, chap. 138, is a debt, within the constitutional meaning of the term. In this view we do not concur. We think the Constitution ought to have a common-sense interpretation, by which we mean the sense in which it was understood by those who adopted it; and if it receives such a construction, in our judgment, the term 'debt' is to be understood as an obligation arising otherwise than from the sentence of a court for the breach of the public peace or commission of a crime. Although it is a well-recognized canon of construction that, where legal terms are used in a statute, they are to receive their technical meaning, unless the contrary plainly appears to have been the intention of the legislature, the principle, however, does not apply to the interpretation of the organic law, which is to be construed, according to the acceptance of those who adopted it, as the supreme rule of conduct both for officials and individuals; and, in conformity with this view, it has been habitual for the supreme judiciary of the United States to derive light and instruction from the commentaries of the framers of the Federal Constitution. . . . We cannot be insensible to the fact that, in all the struggles for the abolition of the law for imprisonment for debt, the advocates of the measure contended it was unjust and cruel to place the unfortunate debtor on the same footing with the disturber of the public peace, or the perpetrator of crimes punishable by fines. The evident intention of the Constitution was to relieve those who could not pay their debts, and not to shield from punishment persons who had violated the public law."

The supreme court of North Dakota, speaking on the same subject, though with reference to provisions unlike ours (Granholm v. Sueigle, 3 N. D. 476, 479, 57 N. W. 509, 510), says: "If not a tortious act (and we think it was not), the appellant would be protected from arrest and imprisonment by § 15 of the state Constitution, which provides that 'no person shall be imprisoned for debt unless upon refusal to deliver up his estate for the benefit of his creditors in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, or in cases of tort, or where there is a strong presumption of fraud.' The term 'debt,' as employed in § 15, supra, is manifestly used in a broad sense, and hence will embrace such obligations to pay money as arise upon the law, as well as those which arise upon contract." The supreme court of Georgia, in Cooper v. Savannah, 4 Ga. 68, holds that where a tax had been imposed by a city ordinance upon free persons of color, and in case of nonpayment the act provided that such person should be arrested and committed to the common jail, and there confined until the same was paid, such imprisonment was repugnant to the laws of the state, and therefore void. In the authorities referred to the word "debt," when found in an organic law, is given a broad and popular meaning, as it occurs to me ought to be done. If, as is said, such a provision denied to the government control of the citizens of a state, except for the commission of crimes or in cases of fraud, or if the word "debt" is to be understood as an obligation arising otherwise than from the sentence of a court for a breach of the public peace or the commission of a crime, or if it embraces such obligations to pay money as arise upon the law, as well as those which arise upon contract, then may it not, in reason, be said that an obligation imposed by the levying of a tax for revenue purposes is a debt fairly within scope and purview of the words as used in the Constitution, and that the decisions overruled have such support in principle and on authority as not to justify their condemnation in order to adopt a construction which is more technical and less liberal?

In all the authorities cited in the majority opinion, a tax is recognized as a debt, in its broad and comprehensive sense, but is held not to come within the purview of the word as used in the organic law, for different reasons,—some upon one ground, and some on others; but the tendency of all is to limit and restrict the meaning, rather than to use it in a popular sense. It is also to be noted that in many of the statutes and Constitutions the language used is altogether different in meaning from our own. In some states the exemption from imprisonment for debt is limited to contracts, either expressed or implied, and does not extend to obligations arising ex delicto. Surely it will not be contended that under our Constitution a civil action for a liability founded on tort can be enforced by imprisonment, and yet, to be consistent, my associates must so construe our Constitution, in order to justify the doctrine enunciated. In Re Dassler, 35 Kan. 678, 12 Pac. 130, cited in the majority opinion, the supreme court of that state holds that "road assessments or levies are not debts, within the meaning of the constitutional provision abolishing imprisonment for debt, as such provision applies only to liabilities arising upon contract." It is evident, by a reading of the opinion, that the right to imprison is also justified as an exercise of the police power. Says the court: "It was decided by this court in Re Wheeler, 34 Kan. 96, 8 Pac. 276, that 'the provision of the Constitution [§ 98] declaring "no person shall be imprisoned for debt except in cases of fraud," applies only to liabilities arising upon contract.' Therefore road assessments or levies are not debts, within the meaning of the constitutional provision abolishing imprisonment for debt. . . . The power to impose labor for the repair of public highways and streets has been exercised from time immemorial, and comes within the police regulation of the state or city. A commutation of such labor in money in lieu of work, while in the nature of a tax, is not, in common speech or in customary revenue legislation, understood as embraced in the term 'tax.' The power to impose this labor is exercised for public purposes, and the general good and convenience of the community." Charleston v. Oliver, 16 S. C. 47, was a case relative to the right of enforcing payment of a license tax by imprisonment, and it was there held that the abolishing of imprisonment for debt did not apply to debts due as taxes. This case supports the general proposition laid down by Judge Cooley, and is the only one directly in point which may be said to fully sustain the doctrine announced in the majority opinion. In that case, as a reason for adopting the construction which it did, 57 L. R. A.

the court says: "The manifest object was to deprive the citizen of the power to have his fellow citizen imprisoned for nonpayment of his debt. This power, in the hands of private individuals, has long been a subject of discussion, and had been previously circumscribed by the enactment of the insolvent debtors' and prison bounds acts, which had no application to taxes; and the object of the clause in question, undoubtedly, was still further to limit this power by confining its exercise to 'cases of fraud.'" Some of the authorities cited relate to an exercise of the right of regulation under the police powers of the state, and on decisions of that character I have no comment to offer. This power must be conceded, and is too firmly established in our system of jurisprudence to be regarded as other than one of its important branches, and necessary for the welfare and protection of society.

What I have heretofore said applies only to my conception of the duty of this court to adhere to the precedents already established, and what appear to me to be sufficient reasons therefor. I have only spoken of what, in my judgment, is a very proper construction of the scope and effect of the constitutional provision declaring against imprisonment for debt, when applied to measures for the collection of taxes of a purely fiscal character, and solely for the purpose of raising revenues for the support of government, whether of the state and its political subdivisions, or of any municipality therein. There is another and equally important view of the question, which is being decided when it is viewed and considered as imposing a license tax, as distinguished from the exercise of the taxing power generally. The majority opinion not only, in terms, overrules the three prior decisions mentioned, but in effect, and indirectly, overturns and repudiates the doctrine announced and adhered to in a long line of decisions, beginning with State ex rel. Sage v. Bennett, 19 Neb. 191, 26 N. W. 714, to the effect that an occupation or purely revenue producing tax cannot be levied and collected as a condition precedent to the issuance of a license to engage in the business taxed; that, when so levied and collected, the tax becomes license money, to be disposed of in the manner provided by § 5, art. 8, of the Constitution. In escaping the provisions of the Constitution against imprisonment for debt, my brothers have some in conflict with § 5, art. 8, which declares that all license moneys shall be paid into the common-school fund, when collected. This latter section of the Constitution by this decision has been restricted in its application, in my opinion, much more than is warranted by its unambiguous language, or than was the evident intent of its framers. It now must read, if I correctly understand the import of this decision, that all license moneys, if collected under an act or ordinance whose chief object and aim is regulation, must be paid into the common-school fund, but, if the main purpose appears to be the raising of revenues, then the license moneys derived therefrom may be applied to any lawful purpose provided by such act or ordinance. To this construction I cannot assent. The section, in unmistakable terms, provides that all license moneys shall be paid into the common-school fund. There is no exception or qualification. And if the tax is a license tax, if it is required to be paid as a condition precedent to obtaining the license or engaging in the business, if it is made unlawful to engage in the business taxed without a license, then the fees thus derived, by whatever name the act or ordinance may be called, and whatever may appear to be its chief aim and object, is license money, and must go where the Constitution directs, or that instrument is violated. This section of the Constitution has made it impossible to raise revenue for general purposes by clothing an act in the garb of a license law, and providing for criminal prosecution and punishment as a means of coercing payment of the tax thus imposed. The section decrees, in unmistakable terms, that all moneys so derived shall be paid exclusively into the common-school fund. This court first fell into an error in this respect in the opinion in the case of State ex rel. Auburn School Dist. v. Boyd (Neb.) 89 N. W. 417, from which I dissented, where the rule was announced that, in construing ordinances providing for license taxes, if the purpose appeared to be to raise revenues, the money was a tax, but, if regulation was the end and object in view, the money results from an exercise of the police power, and is license money. The standard there set up by which the application of the moneys derived as a result of licensing a business is to be determined was an arbitrary one, and at variance with the intent and meaning of the language used in § 5, art. 8, of the Constitution, which neither makes nor warrants such distinction. The true rule, in my judgment, should be that if, in such an act or ordinance, there is any element of regulation, a license tax is justifiable, and its payment may be enforced by declaring the business taxed unlawful, and providing for punishment by fine and imprisonment for engaging in the business declared unlawful without procuring a license therefor. If the measure is solely a revenue producing act, without any element of regulation, and in substance an occupation tax, then it must be justified and enforced under the taxing power, and as a civil liability only. I understand the rule to be of quite general application that, if there is any element of regulation in a licensing tax act, then the act is valid as an exercise of the police power, even though the collection of revenues be one of the objects, and incidental thereto, and that it is not at all necessary that regulation shall be the paramount aim and object. This court has recognized the distinction between the two forms of taxation in Peuler v. State, 11 Neb. 566, 10 N. W. 486, where it is said: "By the Constitution of this state, the legislature, within certain specified inhibitions and limitations, is invested with full legislative power. And this power includes, as no one will deny, that of police regulation, which, being neither defined nor specially limited, is practically left by the Constitution to legislative discretion, so long as no right secured by that instrument is encroached upon. Taxation is also a legislative power, and is specifically mentioned in the Constitution, but always in connection with the subject of revenue for the support of the government generally, or some particular department or branch of it. And it is in such connection that we find the requirement of uniformity. This being so, we are led to conclude that this constitutional injunction has reference solely to taxation, pure and simple, according to the commonly accepted meaning of that term, for the purpose of revenue merely, and not those impositions made incidentally under the police power of the state, exerted either directly or by delegation, as a means of constraining and regulating what may be regarded as a pernicious or offensive act or business,"—citing and quoting from a large number of authorities.

The Supreme Court of the United States says: "The power to license is a police power, although it may also be exercised for the purposes of raising revenue. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that when a municipal corporation is authorized 'to regulate, tax, and license ferry boats,' the imposition of a license fee of $100 per boat is not within the power to regulate and license, and is consequently not within the police power." Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257. In State ex rel. Wyatt v. Ashbrook, 154 Mo. 375, 48 L. R. A. 269, 55 S. W. 629, it is observed: "In order to sustain legislation of the character of the act in question as a police measure, the courts must be able to see that its object to some degree tends towards the prevention of some offense or manifest evil, or has for its aim the preservation of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare." Many other authorities might be cited, but the above are deemed sufficient for present purposes.

Ordinarily, and I think it was so contemplated by the Constitution framers, a license tax arises from an act of regulation, and, as expressed by the United States Supreme Court, is an exercise of the police power of the state. It is the exaction of a fee for the privilege of engaging in a specified business or vocation. It is not a tax on the business, but is a condition precedent to the right to engage in it. The business is regarded as one requiring regulation, and the fee is exacted as an efficient means of accomplishing the desired result. It is made unlawful, and imprisonment provided as the punishment, not for failure to pay the tax, but for engaging in a business declared unlawful unless a permit is granted by the proper authorities to engage therein, and the required fee paid therefor. This is made manifest when it is considered that the offending party becomes guilty by engaging in the prohibited act without a license, and no payment of the required license fee thereafter would purge him of such guilt. He is not imprisoned until he pays the license fee, but until he has paid the fine or served the term of imprisonment imposed for its violation. When a tax is levied solely for revenue purposes, and on different kinds of business or callings, it is properly denominated an occupation or business tax, and rests on the same general principles as the imposition of taxes generally for revenue purposes. The first is required for the privilege of engaging in the business which he is otherwise precluded from pursuing, and as a means of regulation, and the latter levied on the business he is already lawfully engaged in. With these distinctions kept clearly in mind, the validity of any law on either branch of the subject ought not to be very greatly difficult of determination. The doctrine has never heretofore gained a foothold in this state which authorizes the exaction and collection of a business tax for purely revenue purposes under the guise of an act to license the business taxed, and with authority to imprison the delinquent if the tax is not paid. And I cannot conceive of any state of affairs which would permit this to be done, without expressly violating the constitutional provision declaring that all moneys derived from licenses must be applied to the one specified purpose.

It is clear to my mind that the act, the validity of which is in question in the present case, is an act of regulation, and was so intended by the legislature, and not an act solely for the purpose of raising revenue, as held in the majority opinion. It seems to me almost too obvious for argument that the amendment of the act of the legislature of 1901 was chiefly for the purpose of better regulating the different kinds of business therein mentioned, and to prevent the indiscriminate peddling by wholly irresponsible parties, to the detriment of the different communities of the state, and to prevent imposition on the people generally. It bears on its face the stamp of regulation, protection to the inhabitants, and the preservation of the public welfare. Its tendency is to confine the business licensed in the hands of but a few persons in each county. It has features that would indicate an intent to, in a measure, prohibit, and can this be regarded as other than for the purpose of regulation? The very fact of requiring every person included in the provisions of the act to take out a license before engaging in the business, to have a record of the issuance of the same, and the name and residence or location of the party licensed, and to require an exhibition of the license when requested, are all well calculated to act as a regulation, and to dignify the calling in its importance, and to restrict it to the more responsible of those disposed to engage in the business. It is the same regulation and restraint that lie at the foundation of almost every act requiring a license fee to be paid, and the issuance of a license to the person thereby authorized to engage in a business otherwise made unlawful. The statute prior to 1901 provided generally for a tax of $30 on each peddler of watches, clocks, jewelry, or patent medicines, and all other wares and merchandise, for a license to peddle throughout the state for one year, and provided a penalty of $50 for a violation of the act; the guilty party to stand committed until the fine was paid. By the amendment of 1901 the act was made to apply only to peddlers plying their vocation outside the towns and cities, and graduated the tax from $25 on the walking peddler to $100 on the one using a team and four horses, and excluded from the provision of the act those who sold their own work or production, or anything educational, and those selling at wholesale to merchants, and persons selling fresh meats, fruit, farm produce, trees, or plants, exclusively. Why these changes in the provisions of the original act, discriminations, and exceptions, if the raising of revenues was the aim and object in view? Who can doubt, in view of these amendments, that the intent of the legislature was to regulate the business of peddling by a certain class that was deemed detrimental to society, and consequently some form of regulation and restraint was required, and that such was the object in enacting the law, rather than that the sole purpose was to raise revenues? Peddling has from time immemorial been regarded as a subject justifying the exercise of the police power by regulating acts, and I entertain no doubt that such was the aim and object of the legislature when it amended, as it did in 1901, the act theretofore existing which related to the same subject. An instructive and interesting opinion on the point now being considered, and under a statute of the same character as ours, is found in Morrill v. State, 38 Wis. 428, 20 Am. Rep. 12. It is there held: "Laws restricting the business of hawkers and peddlers, or providing for the licensing thereof, are an exercise of the police power of the state, and do not lose this character by requiring payment of the license fees into the state treasury." It is observed by Lyon, J., who wrote the opinion of the court: "The statute was doubtless enacted in the interest of merchants having fixed places of trade, on the theory that a sound public policy demands that they should be encouraged, and traveling merchants or peddlers discouraged, and for the further purpose of protecting honest and well-disposed citizens from the arts and importunities, and frequently from the dishonest practices, of a class of traders to whom they are usually strangers, and who are not as directly amenable to those legal and social restraints which must necessarily greatly influence the business conduct of a merchant having a fixed place of business, and depending for his patronage upon one and the same community." And further on: "The reasons (or at least some of them) why the legislature enacted the law of 1870 have already been stated. That they are stated correctly, and that the common law regarded hawkers and peddlers with disfavor, and their vocation opposed in some degree to public policy, will appear by reference to Jacob's Law Dictionary." After quoting from the authorities it is further stated: "We give the language of the author merely to show the grounds upon which, centuries ago, Parliament regulated and restricted the business, and that such regulation and restriction is an exercise of police power in the interest of the public. But with this disclaimer we must be permitted to add that undoubtedly resort is often had to this business for the sole purpose of obtaining admittance (which could not otherwise be obtained) into private dwelling houses in furtherance of some criminal or unlawful object. This is another reason why the restriction or regulation of the business is an exercise of police power."

The act under consideration in the case at bar, in my judgment, must be justified and upheld as an exercise of the police power. It is presumed to be constitutional and valid, and all intendments are to be taken in favor of the validity of the act, and the exercise of lawful powers by the legislature in its enactment. Whether it will, when thoroughly considered, square with all the express provisions of the fundamental law, I can express no opinion until a full investigation is made of the subject when it is considered in the light of an act of regulation. It would be a vain and unless effort for me alone to undertake the determination of that question; hence I must content myself with dissenting from the views of my associates in upholding the law as a valid exercise of the taxing power, and in overruling the several prior decisions mentioned in order to reach that conclusion.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

Edward S. SHARPE, Piff. in Err.,
v.
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(50 C. C. A. 597, 112 Fed. 893.)

1. In awarding damage to one, a portion of whose land is sought to be condemned for public use, for injury to his remaining land, injury to tracts not connected with, and held under different titles from, although adjoining, that from which the parcel is taken, cannot be considered.
2. Evidence of merely possible uses to which land sought to be condemned by the government may be put, not founded on any clear, certain, or avowed obnoxious uses, is not admissible to enhance the damages to be awarded for injury to the residue of the tract.

3. Upon the question of the value of land sought to be condemned by the government, testimony of the owner of offers which have been received for the land is not admissible, where there is nothing to show the conditions under which they were made or the circumstances influencing them.
4. Upon a trial de novo upon appeal from commissioners in an eminent domain proceeding the jury are not to consider the evidence produced before the commissioners, or be influenced by the commissioners' report.

I. Different holdings.

The cardinal rule in determining whether damages should be limited to the piece of ground taken in eminent domain, or extend to other portions of land owned by the same party, seems to be that unity of use determines the question. It is also affected by purpose, and it may be affected by character of holdings and title. The question of derivation of title is an important factor in some cases, but is usually regarded as subordinate to the unity of use. Some stress is placed upon it in 57 L. R. A.

SHARPE v. UNITED STATES and in other cases. Where condemnation is anticipated by a party acquiring title, evidently for the purpose of increasing damages or speculating thereon, the question of title would probably be quite a factor.

In SHARPE v. UNITED STATES it was held that, in awarding damages to one, a portion of whose land is sought to be condemned for public use, for injury to his remaining land, injury to tracts not connected with, and held under different titles from, although adjoining, that from which the parcel is taken, cannot be considered. This was on the ground that the land taken constituted one of three several tracts of land consisting of three adjoining farms held by different titles and acquired at different times. The three separate farms were held and managed as such previous to the beginning of the condemnation proceedings, and the land in controversy was not purchased until ten days prior to the proceedings, and was not used in connection with the other farms until three months after the proceedings were begun, but was managed, as were the other two farms, as a distinct and separate holding, occupied by a different tenant, and was separated from the other two farms by public roads. The court said, in regard to the rule of "just compensation:" "In applying this rule, however, regard is had to the integ-

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey to review a judgment in favor of petitioner in a proceeding to condemn property for a military reservation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Acheson, Dallas, and Gray, Circuit Judges.

Mr. D. J. Fancoast for plaintiff in error.

Mr. David O. Watkins, for defendant in error:

Offers by third parties to purchase the land are no indication of its true market value.

Such testimony is easily manufactured. It is warranted neither on principle nor on authority, and is too dangerous to be tolerated.

ity of the tract as a unitary holding by the owner. The holding from which a part is taken for public uses must be of such a character as that its integrity as an individual tract shall have been destroyed by the taking."

A quarry used for quarry purposes alone, and a shipping lot having no connection with the quarry by contact of the lines, by railway, or any other private means of transportation, were held to be disconnected from each other, where the shipping lot was condemned for railroad purposes. Potts v. Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. 119 Pa. 278, 13 Atl. 291. In this case, part of the property was owned by two as tenants in common, part was owned by one individually, and a partnership used the three tracts for their partnership business. The court said: "They were not only different properties applied to different uses, but the fee was held and owned by different persons. Neither of them could be considered as appurtenant to, or part and parcel of, the other."

In Ellsworth v. Chicago & I. W. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 386, 59 N. W. 78, it was held that where a large body of land was wild, unimproved, and of diversified qualities, adapted for different purposes, and not used as an entirety, and not shown to have been designed for such use, the question whether the entire tract should have been considered as a whole, or portions of it separately, in estimating damages, was one of fact which should have been submitted to the jury. In this case the land was sold in 80-acre tracts, to three different persons, and all the contracts of purchase were assigned to the plaintiffs.

The rule that where a portion of an estate is taken by condemnation the damage not only to the particular portion taken, but also to the remaining portion of the land, is to be considered, was held not to apply where a leasehold estate was condemned, and the lessee claimed damages to property owned by him, separated by an alley, but used by him in connection with his business. United States v. Inlots, 2 Am. Law Record, 577, Fed. Cas. No. 15,441a.

In proceedings to condemn, for a railroad right of way, a strip of land wholly within a quarter section owned by one person in fee, the owner may not only recover damages for the injury to such section, but also for injury to his interest in an adjoining quarter section, consisting of a remainder in an undivided half after the termination of a life estate. But in ascertaining his interest in such section, great care must be exercised, and evidence of damages to a leasehold interest under a verbal lease from the life tenant is inadmissible, since 57 L. R. A.

such lease is voidable and damages for interfering with the enjoyment of it would be uncertain and speculative. And, although the two tracts have been used as one farm, the damages to each must be estimated separately, and the jury, in fixing the compensation, cannot take into consideration the fact that the right of way will divide the section owned in fee from that in which the owner has a remainder interest only, and that on the latter tract are located the wells and buildings which have been used in connection with the other farm, and the enjoyment of which will be interfered with by the separation of the tracts. Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Conness, 184 Ill. 178, 56 N. E. 402, 193 Ill. 464, 62 N. E. 221.

In Gibson v. Fifth Ave. & H. Street Bridge Co. 192 Pa. 55, 43 Atl. 339, it is held that a person who owns several lots forming one tract of land, but fronting on different streets and occupied by separate dwelling houses, is one of which streets a bridge approach is built, to the detriment of abutting property, may recover damages for the injury to the lot fronting on such street only, and not for injury to the properties fronting on the other streets, where the latter lots were acquired and held by a separate and distinct title from the lot fronting on the bridge improvement, and were wholly distinct in use. In this case the court said that if the building fronting on the street in which the bridge approach was built had been a manufactory, and the other lands were purchased to enlarge the factory as to make one plant of the whole, damages might have been awarded for the injuries caused to the property as a whole.

In Greenwood v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 26 Jones & S. 482, 12 N. Y. Supp. 919, it was held that, where property located on the corner of two streets was divided by the owner into two lots, which were sold separately, and the two lots were subsequently reunited into one by a person who obtained title thereto through mesne conveyances from the original owner, and a single building constructed thereon, nevertheless damages for injuries from the construction of an elevated railroad in one of such streets must be limited to the lot abutting on that street. This was on the ground that the easements of light and air from that street once appurtenant to both lots, having been severed by the separate conveyances of the original owner, were not reunited by the subsequent conveyances whereby one person acquired title to the whole property. The proposition that severed easements cannot be reunited by a union of title seems to be new as applied to Evidence even to show that the owner of the land had declined to sell or lease it, or to show what his reasons were for so doing, was not admissible.

Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Cleary, 125 Pa. 442, 17 Atl. 468.

To entitle an owner to recover damages to the whole tract, when a part of his lands have been taken, there must have been a unity of contiguous parcels. The land must have been together. All of it must have been used as a single tract.

damages in eminent domain cases, especially where one building covers both lots.

But this case was distinguished and disapproved in Stevens v. New York Elev. R. Co. 180 N. Y. 95, 28 N. E. 667, in which it was held that property extending from one street to another, occupied by a single building, and which for many years had been owned, used, and conveyed as a single lot abutting on both streets, and the title to which was held by one person, must be treated as a whole in estimating the damages caused by the construction of an elevated railroad in one of such streets, although originally the property had consisted of two lots, one abutting on each street, and the lots had been owned by separate parties. The Greenwood Case was distinguished on the ground that there it was not shown whether the lots became the property of a single proprietor before or after the railroad was built, or whether the building which covered them was built before or after the construction of the road.

See infra, II. c, Separating and severing buildings, for a further discussion of this case.

Where the parcels are a part of the unit, adapted for a single use, making the enjoyment of a part depend on the use of the other, the whole will be considered in estimating damages to a part.

So, where a party occupied four lots in one tract as an entirety, and owned a portion of the lots and held the others under a lease, in proceedings by a railroad company to condemn the lots leased, it was held that the owner was entitled to recover for damage to the market value of the whole tract during the continuance of the lease. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Dresel, 110 Ill. 89.

Where a volunteer corps obtained leases of certain ground, on which they formed a rifle range and built butts, and behind the butts was marsh land in the possession of another party, with whom the corps had a verbal agreement that they should have the privilege of shooting over such land, and should pay the owner a certain sum per year as compensation for any injury done by the shooting, and beyond this marsh land were meadow lands which the corps held under a lease, it was held in Holt v. Gaslight & Coke Co. L. R. 7 Q. B. 728, 41 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 351, 27 L. T. N. S. 442, that upon the condemnation of a part of such meadow lands by a gas company damages must be paid to the corps, notwithstanding the contention that there had been no actual severance of the land taken from the rifle range, since the corps did not own the intervening 57 L. The damages must be special in their nature, and not such as are suffered in common with the rest of the public.

marsh land, but had only a precarious right of shooting over it. This was under land clauses consolidation act 1854, § 49 (8 Vict. chap. 18), providing that where an inquiry shall relate to the value of lands to be purchased, and also to compensation claimed for injury done or to be done to lands "held therewith," the jury shall deliver their verdict separately for the land required, or of any interest therein belonging to the party or which he is unable to sell, and for money for damages sustained by the owner of lands by reason of the severing of them from other lands of such owner, or otherwise injuriously affecting such lands. The court said that, since the lands taken were used in connection with the other land as a rifle range, and since their condemnation rendered necessary the abandonment of the use of the remaining land as a rifle range, the condition of the statute on which compensation might be claimed—namely, that land held with the land taken is injuriously affected—was sufficiently satisfied, and that the fact that the rifle corps had only a precarious right of shooting over the intervening marsh land only went to the quantum of compensation.

Three quarter sections of land lying in a body being owned severally by three persons, who used the land in common for raising stock under a partnership agreement, and each section being more valuable as thus used than if used separately, it was held, in Smith County v. Labore, 37 Kan. 480, 15 Pac. 577, that where a public road was established over the three sections, separating the water for the stock, which was almost entirely on one section, from the pasture, and thereby rendering the use of the land as a whole less valuable, damages should be allowed to the owner of each quarter section for the loss of value caused to his land.

Where a farm of 730 acres was owned by one person, and a railroad company took about 12 acres out of it, dividing the wood, water, and timber from the balance of the farm, damages for injury to the whole farm were allowed, although part of the land was in one section and part in another, and some 230 acres had belonged to an estate, and were purchased by the present owner after the railroad track was laid. Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 80 Ill. 316. The question of the separation of tracts by acquiring title to a part is not discussed by the court.

The measure of damages in the state of New Jersey is when the whole property is taken, its market value, and when a part only is taken, the difference in value before and after such taking, to be ascertained by the use to which such untaken part can be put.

tract was owned by tenants in common, who had in fact platted it into lots and blocks for the purpose of partition, but, although deeds were executed, neither they nor the plat had been put on record at the time the incline plane company entered on the land. The separate owners brought actions against the company for compensation. The court said that the joint owners, by virtue of the uncompleted partition and the continuing joint interest in the proposed streets in the plan, might have maintained a joint proceeding for compensation, and that damages might have been assessed with reference to the whole, but that they were not obliged to unite and might proceed separately, but, having proceeded separately, the right of each was as owner of a number of separate and disconnected pieces of land; that there were no streets, nor, in the ordinary meaning of the word, any lots; that all these were inchoate, existing only in intention, and subject to change or destruction, at the volition of the parties; and that therefore no damages could be claimed directly on account of any of the land which was not on the line of the incline plane, and of which no part was taken; that any direct damage that might accrue to such lots was recoverable, if at all, only for interference with rights of way possessed by the owner of them over the land actually taken. In this case the court said that a joint suit might be maintained, and "that the land might be treated, as in fact what it appeared to be when the appellant located its road, a single, undivided, and unimproved tract of 17 acres, and the damages for taking part of it assessed with reference to the whole."

In Hetzel v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 7 App. D. C. 524, it was held that lots in the same block, partitioned among cotenants, with alleys between them reserved for their joint use, cannot be regarded as part of the same tract when all are afterwards acquired by one owner, so as to permit damages from an obstruction of a street on which some of the lots front to be recovered for the injury, not only to those lots, but to other lots fronting on other streets and formerly severed from them in ownership. In this case, inasmuch as the declaration proceeded as for an injury to the entire original lot, without any reference to the fact that there had been any division into the separate lots, the court deemed the proof showing such division and the former joint ownership contradictory to the pleading, and held that the plaintiff could not recover more than nominal damages. This decision, however, was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United

Gray, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Proceedings were instituted by the United States in the district court for the district of New Jersey February 1, 1900, for the condemnation of about 40 acres of land of the plaintiff in error, Edward S. Sharpe, situate in Salem county, in the state of New Jersey, contiguous to a certain reservation of the United States, upon which Ft. Mott had theretofore been built, which land, as stated in the petition filed by the United States, was "needed for military purposes, for the location, construction, and prosecution of works for fortifications and coast defenses." They were authorized by the provisions of the act of Congress of August 18, 1890, and of those of March 7, 1898, and March 3, 1899, making appropriations therefor. The act of August 18, 1890, pro-

States (169 U. S. 26, 42 L. ed. 648, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255), on the ground that, although the declaration claimed damages for the injury done to the entire lot, plaintiff could recover thereunder for such damage as she actually suffered, and that, even if she did not own the alleys, as alleged, she nevertheless was entitled to recover for any substantial diminution in the value of the land she did own, or any part thereof, arising from the nuisance in question. The court said: "In estimating the damages, the jury could take into consideration the subdivision of original lot 1, and eliminate from their calculation any subplot belonging to the plaintiff that was not damaged in salable or rental value by the nuisance in question. So, if the plaintiff did not own the alleys marked on the plat, that fact could be given proper weight in estimating the damages she was entitled to recover; that is, if damages were claimed in respect of more land than belonged to the plaintiff, the recovery could have been limited to the injury done to the part that she did own."

Damages for injury to the property as a whole, and not merely for the injury to the separate lots over which the railroad ran, were held to be recoverable in Welch v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 27 Wis. 108, where a party owned land within a city, which had been laid out into lots, the titles to which had been acquired by him at different times, and a railroad was laid across certain lots which were separated from the owner's dwelling house by a highway, but all the land was used as one piece for agricultural purposes.

Where children owned land in several different sections, subject to the life estate of their parents, and the father owned, in his own right, several tracts, intervening between the tracts owned in fee by the children, but had given a private right of way over his land for the use of the whole, and the tracts were all used together as one farm, it was held, in proceedings to condemn a right of way over a part of the land, that if the several parcels of real estate that were claimed to be injured as an entire farm had such a connection or relation of adaptation, convenience, and actual and permanent use, as to make the enjoyment of the parcels or tracts from which the right of way was taken reasonably and substantially necessary to the enjoyment of the parcels not so touched by the right of way, in the most advantageous manner in the business in which it was at the time used, and if such tracts were dependent upon each other in the use to which they were then put, they would constitute one vided that the proceedings for condemnation should be "prosecuted in accordance with the laws relating to suits for the condemnation of property of the states wherein the proceedings may be instituted." These proceedings accordingly were begun under the authority of an enabling act of the legislature of the state of New Jersey, passed in February, 1900, and were prosecuted in accordance with the laws regulating the condemnation of lands in that state at the time this enabling act was passed. Pursuant to the requirements of the laws aforesaid, three commissioners were duly appointed by the judge of the district court for the district of New Jersey to appraise the value of the land in question. The commissioners so appointed made due report of their proceedings to the said district court, which report was filed July 16, 1900. By it, it appears that they fixed the value of the 41.75 acres of land required to be taken for the purposes aforesaid at the sum of $20,875, and the damages sustained by reason of the taking of the said land "to the remainder of the tracts of land from which the above-mentioned tract is taken, and to its uses, and which the parties in interest will sustain by reason of the premises," at the sum of $12,953. From the finding of the commissioners so made an appeal was taken in behalf of the United States to the United States district court for the district of New Jersey. Pursuant to the requirements of the statute of New Jersey, the said appeal was prosecuted in the said district court, and an order framing an issue and fixing a day for the striking of a jury and a day for the trial of the appeal was duly made by the judge of said court. A venire was there-farm. Westbrook v. Muscatine N. & S. R. Co. (Iowa) 88 N. W. 202.

In Charleston & S. Bridge Co. v. Comstock, 38 W. Va. 263, 15 S. E. 69, it was said that two lots acquired at different times, separated by a street, where one lot was condemned for a bridge, might constitute but one tract for the purpose of ascertaining damages; and it was held that this was a question for the jury. In this case the owner of land opposite, on which was his residence, had acquired title to the lot on which the bridge was constructed, and had removed the buildings therefrom for the purpose of improving his residence, and the lot was used in connection therewith.

Likewise, in Potts v. Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. 119 Pa. 278, 13 Atl. 291, it was said: "So, if one buy a farm in separate contiguous portions from different persons, but occupy the whole in a body for farm purposes as one farm, the damages for the appropriation of a part, or even the whole, of one of the original pieces, will be assessed upon the injury done to the whole tract."

And, where a grantor conveyed some lots after condemnation proceedings were commenced, it was held that he could recover damages for all the lots, notwithstanding his conveyance and covenant of warranty. Drury v. Midland R. Co. 127 Mass. 571. The court said: "It is contended that these grantees took the right to damages which Alger had in these lots, and that they should have been cited in under Gen. Stat. chap. 43, § 53. But the answer to this is that the title acquired by the railroad was acquired when the location was filed. Alger was then sole owner in fee of all the land described in his petition. . . . It is contended that the subsequent conveyances of Alger with covenants of warranty operated as equitable assignments of his claim for damages, on account of the land conveyed; but, whether this is so or not, it is plain that these conveyances could not deprive him of the right to prosecute his claim for damages, and to recover the same in his own name, if he saw fit. The remedy of the grantees is at law upon Alger's covenants of warranty."

II. Property in city.

a. Separated by highways, railroads, or other property.

It seems hard to formulate a rule that will cover all cases where property in a city is divided by highways, railroads, or intervening property, and a portion of it is condemned or damaged. The general rule seems to be that where the use of property is necessary for the maintenance and successful running of a plant, and a detached portion is injured, damages may be allowed for injuries to the whole. So where it is a homestead and used as a whole for agricultural purposes. On the other hand, where property has been purchased for the erection of a plant, on different blocks, or is separated by being on different blocks, and cannot be connected; or where the use of the detached property is temporary or disconnected, —it seems that damages to one piece will not be allowed to reach the other tract.

Where a party owned two lots separated by an alley, there being a malt house, pump, and pipe on the east lot, connected under the alley with a brewery on the west lot, and the east lot was condemned by a railroad company, damages were allowed for the injury to the west lot also, the owner of both lots owning the fee in the alley, but the damages were restricted to the expense of removing the plant from the east to the west lot. Hannibal Bridge Co. v. Schaubacher, 57 Mo. 582.

So, also, damages for injury to the property as a whole were allowed in Union Elevator Co. v. Kansas City Suburban Belt R. Co. 135 Mo. 358, 38 S. W. 1071, where one person owned three blocks, separated by streets, which were used for elevator purposes, all the blocks being necessary to the successful operation of the elevator, and a railroad right of way was condemned over one block. In this case it was said: "Whatever may be the ruling in other jurisdictions under similar conditions, the law as announced in this state is that the owner of land adjoining a street or alley owns the fee to the center of such street or alley, as the case may be, subject to an easement in the public."

And, where property consisted of several lots in different blocks, and the entire piece had been occupied for years as a brick yard, and was used as one tract of land for a common purpose, on which were machinery, buildings, dryhouse, sheds, and kilns, it was held that damages should be allowed for the whole. Kansas City Suburban Belt R. Co. v. Norcross, 137 Mo. 415, 38 S. W. 299.

A consolidated gas company owned two pieces of land in different blocks, one of which had been acquired by the consolidation of the companies, and on this was a plant for making coal gas, which had not been in use for several years but was maintained as a reserve for any exigency that might arise. The plant on the other tract was used for making water gas. The land covered by the coal-gas plant having upon issued, with an order for view by the jury of the premises, and the matter came on for trial at the January term, 1901, of said court. After charging the jury, the court stated to them that by the consent of counsel they might bring in a verdict in a lump sum for the value of the land and the damages to the adjoining property. On March 11, 1901, judgment was entered of record, as follows:

"This matter coming on for trial at the January term, 1901, of this court, and being called, and both parties appearing, and the cause being moved by the said appellant, and a jury being impaneled and sworn, and having viewed the premises, and the evidence offered by the parties having been submitted, and the respective parties, by their counsel, being heard, and the judge having charged the jury, and the jury having retired to consider their verdict, come again into court, and say that they find and assess the value of the said lands and damages sustained at the sum of $12,000, to be paid to the said Edward S. Sharpe, by the said appellant, for the value of said lands and damages sustained. And it is hereby ordered and adjudged that the said assessment by the jury aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, confirmed, and that the said Edward S. Sharpe is entitled to have from the said United States the sum of $12,000 for his said land and damages. Judgment signed this 11th day of March, A. D. 1901."

Bills of exception to the rulings of the court in regard to the admission of testimony and to the charge of the court were duly sealed, and, together with the record of the judgment, have been brought before us by writ of error.

been condemned, it was held that damages to the entire plant, as a whole, on both blocks, should be allowed, and it was also held that in estimating the damages the assessment would not be restricted to the simple value of the land and the owner required to remove the plant, but that the rule concerning fixtures, which obtains between vendor and vendee, would control in the assessment of the damages. Re New York, 39 App. Div. 589, 57 N. Y. Supp. 657.

Disconnected lots on different blocks were held to be a part of the same tract, where a railroad bridge was constructed destroying access to some lots, and all the lots were used in connection with a sawmill for stacking lumber thereon. Chapman v. Oshkosh & M. River R. Co. 33 Wis. 629. In this case the court said: "It seems to us that it was just as legitimate a subject for compensation as though the sawmill had been situated on some one of the lots on Pine street, and the lots on that street had been inclosed in the mill-yard for the storage of lumber manufactured at the mill."

So, lots separated by a highway and used for agricultural purposes were held to be one tract, in Welch v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 27 Wis. 108.

And whether lands separated by a street constitute but one tract was held to be a question for the jury. Charleston & S. Bridge Co. v. Comstock, 36 W. Va. 263, 15 S. E. 69.

On the other hand, unity of ownership and purpose has been held to be insufficient to extend the damages to other tracts where there is no actual unity of use. In some cases separation by an intervening highway has been held sufficient to limit the damages to the parcel taken. This seems to work a hardship sometimes, as when the only available property for a plant seems to be vacant lots opposite each other, separated by a street. If the plant is not constructed the damages may not extend across the street. If it is in operation, using both sides of the street, an injury to one lot may extend to the other also.

In estimating damages for the condemnation, by a railroad company, of a strip of land along one side of a strip already owned by it through a block owned by a gas company, which also owned two other parallel blocks separated by streets, it was held, in Re New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Hun, 149, that the ownership by the railroad of the intervening strip on which its road existed was a complete severance of the block through which its road ran into two distinct parcels, and that no damages could be allowed for injury to that portion of the block from which the new strip was not taken, also that damages could not be allowed for incidental injury to the other blocks separated by streets, but that the several blocks must be considered as distinct parcels, and that no parcel could properly be considered as injured except the parcel out of which the lots required by the railroad company were in fact taken. This was against the contention of the gas company that these blocks were all purchased with the intention of using them as a whole for the purposes of its business, and that it was entitled to prove the value of the whole of the several blocks for that purpose and the extent to which that value was diminished by the condemnation of the lots taken by the railroad company. This case was distinguished in Currie v. Waverly & N. Y. Bay R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 381, 20 Atl. 56 (infra, II. b), on the ground that it was determined by N. Y. act 1813, vesting the fee of the streets in the municipality.

Where proceedings are instituted to condemn a right of way through a block, the owner cannot claim damages for injuries to property in another block, separated therefrom by a street the fee of which is in the city, no portion of which has been taken; and the fact that he purchased the property to be used as a whole for a polytechnic institute can make no difference, where the tracts are not used for any common purpose as one tract of land when the condemnation proceedings are instituted. White v. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. 154 Ill. 620, 39 N. E. 270. The court said: "The two tracts of land must be considered as they existed when the proceeding was instituted. At that time they were separated by a public street. They were in no manner connected, and never could be connected without the consent of the city, which may never be obtained. They were not used for any common purpose as one tract of land. Two tracts of land might be so connected and used as to constitute but one tract, and in such a case, in a proceeding to condemn a part, it would be proper to consider the damages to the whole. But this record presents no such case." It was also said that, if by the construction and operation of the railroad the property on the other side of the street was specially damaged, and the damage sustained was not common to the public, there was a complete remedy in an action at law.

So, in condemnation proceedings for a right of way for an elevated railroad across a block, it was held that evidence of damages as to all lands separated from those taken by streets,

The first point of objection that arises out of the assignments of error is that the court overruled the defendant's offer to prove the probable use that the government would make of this land, and the further offer to prove that the use of this land for military purposes would injure and depreciate the value of Dr. Sharpe's remaining and adjoining land. We think the court were right in overruling these offers, on two grounds: First, the record discloses the fact that the land taken by these proceedings constituted one of three several tracts of land, consisting of three adjoining farms, owned by plaintiff in error, and held by different titles, and acquired at different times. The property first acquired was known as the "Dunham Farm," and was purchased in 1880, for $5,800, by Mrs. Sharpe, wife of the plaintiff in error, and afterwards transferred to the plaintiff in error. The property in question, the subject of these proceedings, was purchased by plaintiff in error in 1891, and is known as the "Gibbons Tract," consisting of 41.75 acres and 22 acres of meadow. These 22 acres of meadow were not adjoining or a part of the tract known as the 41.75 acres, nor was it used in connection therewith, but was such a considerable distance away, and of so little value, that no attention was paid to it by either the plaintiff in error or the defendant upon the trial of the cause, either as to value or damages. The purchase price paid for this tract, with the house and farm buildings thereon, was $6,000. The third and remaining tract of land, known as the "White Farm," was purchased by plaintiff in error December 29, 1899, for $5,200. The petition in this case alleys, or lands owned by other parties was properly excluded. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. v. Johnson, 159 Ill. 434, 42 N. E. 871.

Whether a particular lot of land constitutes an independent parcel is a question which cannot be determined in the affirmative by the mere fact that it is separated from other land by a highway or street, or by paper lines, or by fences; nor can it be determined in the negative by the mere fact that it is all under one ownership, and is not divided by streets or by paper lines.

So, it was held that each lot would constitute a separate and distinct parcel, where there was an actual division by streets and use for travel and by recorded paper lines; and there was no evidence that any two of the lots were used together, or held for sale as one parcel; and "the only use shown was a separate and distinct use and holding of each lot by itself." Wellington v. Boston & M. R. Co. 164 Mass. 380, 41 N. E. 652, 158 Mass. 185, 33 N. E. 393.

Where lots in a town were used by the owner, in connection with other lots, in the same business, but they were separated by streets and alleys, it was held, in a condemnation proceeding by a railroad company, that damages could not be allowed on all the lots as an entirety. Fleming v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. 34 Iowa, 353.

In Peck v. Superior Short Line R. Co. 38 Minn. 343, 31 N. W. 217, the general rule is stated to be that in condemnation proceedings, to constitute unity of property between two contiguous, but prima facie distinct, parcels of land, there must be such a connection or relation of adaptation, convenience, and actual and permanent use between them as to make the enjoyment of the parcel taken reasonably and substantially necessary to the enjoyment of the parcel left, in the most advantageous and profitable manner in the business for which it is used. In this case the owner of three lots condemned by a railroad company claimed damages also for injuries to a tract of land separated from the lots by a street, which was occupied and used partly as a mill site and partly for piling lumber. The three lots were not used in connection with the mill property at the time of the condemnation, though for a time a temporary blacksmith shop, used in connection with the mill, had been maintained on them, and lumber had been piled upon them. The court said that the separation of the lots from the mill property by the street did not necessarily prevent the whole of both tracts from being regarded as one property, that they were contiguous in the sense of touching each other by embracing the soil of the street, but that there was no such connection as to render the enjoyment of these lots reasonably and substantially necessary to the enjoyment of the tract. This was held because the use which had been made of the lots in connection with the mill business was merely fugitive and temporary,—not in any proper sense permanent, nor reasonably or substantially necessary; a mere expedient for a short time; and because even such use was not continued, and had not been for a year and a half before the trial.

A party owned a homestead and a block of lots separated by lands of another party, having a right of way connecting the two tracts. The homestead was injured by a railroad laid in the street, and it was held that the owner was not entitled to recover damages for injury to the second tract. Pennsylvania Co. for Ins. on Lives & G. A. v. Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. 151 Pa. 334, 25 Atl. 107. In this case the court said: "It was clear upon the testimony that neither the larger tract, nor the private alley leading from it to Coal street, had been taken, injured, or destroyed by the defendant in the construction of its road, and the court was right in refusing to submit any question of damages done to said tract or way to the jury."

And where lots were sold with restrictions in the conveyance against the erection of engines, forges, and foundries, and with authority to any lot owner to enforce the same, it was held that a condemnation of lots by the government for fortifications would not authorize compensation for prospective damages to other lots, not owned by the same party, or contiguous, by reason of anticipated shops or necessary equipments to perfect and maintain the fortifications. It was held that persons by contract could not anticipate and prevent public use so as to enlarge or impose a greater value on their holdings. United States v. Certain Lands, 112 Fed. 622.

See United States v. Inlota, 2 Am. Law Record, 314, 513, 577, Fed. Cas. No. 15,441a, supra, I.

b. Separated by plat lines.

Where property is contiguous and separated merely by plat lines, and is owned and used as one tract, it is held, in a large proportion of the cases, that damages may be estimated as affecting the whole tract. In New Jersey it is held that this rule extends to blocks where no lots have been sold, as the platting of the street was filed and proceedings begun January 9, 1900. The evidence shows that these were three separate farms held and managed as such previous to the beginning of these proceedings, and that the property here in question was not used in connection with the White farm until three months after they had begun, but was managed, as were the other two farms, as a distinct and separate holding, and by a different tenant, and that it was separated from the other two farms by public roads. It is this separate and distinct tract known as the Gibbons tract of 41.75 acres that the government is now seeking to condemn. It is not denied that in rendering the "just compensation" secured by the Constitution of the United States to the citizen whose property is taken for public uses it is right and proper to include the damages in the shape of deterioration in value which will result to the residue of the tract from the occupation of the part so taken. In applying this rule, however, regard is had to the integrity of the tract as a unitary holding by the owner. The holding from which a part is taken for public uses must be of such a character as that its integrity as an individual tract shall have been destroyed by the taking. Depreciation in the value of the residue of such a tract may properly be considered as allowable damages in adjusting the compensation to be given to the owner for the land taken. It is often difficult, when part of a tract is taken, to determine what is a distinct and independent tract; but the character of the holding, and the distinction between a residue of a tract whose integrity is destroyed by the taking and what are merely other parcels or holdings of the same in that state does not divest the owner of his title thereto. But where there is no unity of use which indicates permanency, it seems that damages will be limited to the immediate lot or block affected. Some cases hold that the platting of property will prevent extending the damages to other lots where the property is vacant, or where there is not an actual permanent use of the whole as a unit.

So, where a lot was appropriated by a railroad, it was held that the owner was entitled to damages to contiguous lots occupied as a whole. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Boerner, 34 Neb. 240, 51 N. W. 842, 45 Neb. 453, 63 N. W. 787.

And, a railroad company having condemned one of two lots which adjoined each other, and which were used and occupied by the owner as a whole, it was held that the owner was entitled to recover for damages caused to the remaining lot, as the two lots constituted but one tract. Cummins v. Des Moines & St. L. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 397, 19 N. W. 268.

Likewise, in a proceeding to condemn a corner of one of two city lots used as one tract, it was held that the owner was entitled "to recover the actual damages sustained to the whole property." Reisner v. Atchison Union Depot & R. Co. 27 Kan. 382.

And where a party owned and occupied a tract of land containing 30 acres, a part of which had, some years previously, been platted and laid out into village lots, but such lots had never in any way been separated from each other or from the rest of the tract, and the whole had been used as a farm or tract for residence and general farming purposes, it was held in condemnation proceedings that the whole land, being a compact body used as an entirety, constituted only one tract. Sheldon v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 29 Minn. 318, 13 N. W. 134.

In condemnation proceedings for an elevated railway across a block where the plaintiff owned all except eleven and one half lots, it was held that the court properly admitted evidence of damages to such lands as were merely separated by lot lines. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. v. Johnson, 159 Ill. 434, 42 N. E. 871. In this case the court said: "Here there is no physical obstruction between the lots taken and those claimed to be injured. There is no line of division between them not under the absolute control of the respondents. The lot lines were designated by them upon their plat of the subdivision merely for the purpose of their own convenience in selling the property."

In Cox v. Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 20, 41 N. W. 475, it was held that, where a party owned the whole north half of a block, and also the whole of a block separated from the first tract by a street or alley, and a railroad was located across some lots in each of the blocks, the damages would not be limited to the lots on which the railroad was located. The case does not show, further than as stated, the existence of any other alley, but says: "The land in each of the blocks, as described, lay in a body, except that it was platted into lots for sale, and was a part of the town-site."

The damages to an owner for taking part of a block by a railroad company were held not to be confined to that particular block, where the owner had only made a plat, and had never sold the lots, and several blocks had been used as one tract of land. Currie v. Waverly & N. Y. Bay R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 381, 20 Atl. 56.

And a party owning lots contiguous to each other, and occupied as his homestead, was held entitled to damages for injury caused to lots not taken, where a part of one lot was condemned for railroad purposes. Port Huron & S. W. R. Co. v. Voorhels, 50 Mich. 508, 15 N. W. 882. In this case the lot taken was separated by a platted alley from the others, but the plat was not accepted by the city.

In estimating the damages caused by a railroad running diagonally through a tract of land, the property must be considered as a whole where the owner had platted it some twenty years previously, and divided it into lots and streets, but the map was not recorded, the streets never opened, no lot was ever sold, and the tract was used for pasture. New York, L. & W. R. Co. v. Arnot, 27 Hun, 151. In this case the court said: "If these defendants had owned another tract of land in the neighborhood through which the railroad did not run, we do not know of any principle which would permit the commissioners to take into account the depreciation to that other tract (Re New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 6 Hun, 149): unless, perhaps, the neighboring tract should be actually used in connection with that of which a part is taken, so that the two really formed one whole."

In Hetzel v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 169 U. S. 26, 42 L. ed. 648, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, it was held that a party owning a whole block, which, before she acquired title, had been platted into lots, with a provision that the alleys should never be closed unless by common consent of all the lot owners, could recover for damages to such of the property as she owned, even if she did not own the fee in the alleys.

owner, must be kept in mind in the practical application of the requirement to render just compensation for property taken for public uses. How it is applied must largely depend upon the facts of the particular case and the sound discretion of the court. All the testimony in this case tends to show the separateness of this tract which was the subject of the condemnation proceedings. It had never been farmed or used in connection with either of the other farms owned by the plaintiff in error. It was in no way reasonably or substantially necessary to the enjoyment of the other two tracts. Separated from it by a public road, the White farm, so called, had only been purchased by plaintiff in error ten days before the proceedings for condemnation were begun. The authorities cited by the defendant in error fully support their contention in this respect. In Currie v. Wocerly & N. Y. B. R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 392, 20 Atl. 56, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error for the proposition that, where a part of the tract is taken for condemnation, damages to the remaining land shall be given, the court also says: "It is an established rule in law, in proceedings for condemnation of land, that the just compensation which the landowner is entitled to receive for his lands and damages thereto must be limited to the tract a portion of which is actually taken. The propriety of this rule is quite apparent. It is solely by virtue of his ownership of the tract invaded that the owner is entitled to incidental damages. His ownership of other lands is without legal significance."

It is enough to say that, in our opinion, the two other farms or tracts of land owned

Where a railroad crossed the corner of a vacant lot by license, and subsequently parties acquired title to that lot and the adjoining lots, and built a factory on the other lots, and the railroad company condemned the lot which it crossed, it was held that the damages should not be restricted to that lot or the adjoining lot, where the whole was used and connected with the manufactory. Driver v. Western U. R. Co. 32 Wis. 569, 14 Am. Rep. 726.

In Potts v. Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. 119 Pa. 278, 13 Atl. 291, it was said: "Where a person resides upon one of a number of contiguous town lots, but uses all of them together as his homestead, as if the whole constituted but a single inclosure, and a railroad company appropriated a portion of one only of the lots, the damages will doubtless be assessed for the injury done to the whole property."

Peculiar and isolated cases may perhaps exist, also, where, although the lands are not in fact contiguous, yet the uses to which they are applied, respectively, are in their nature so intimate and dependent, one upon the other, that an injury to one must necessarily be taken as an injury to the whole taken together; for example, the land upon which a water mill is erected will ordinarily draw to it as an appurtenance, or rather will be regarded as embracing, the ground covered by the reservoir, so that the latter will be regarded as part and parcel of the former, although they are not contiguous." The land in this case was not occupied as a homestead, however, and the lot condemned was not contiguous to the other property for injury to which damages were also claimed. See infra, V., for a statement of the case.

In Mix v. Lafayette, B. & M. R. Co. 67 Ill. 319, the damages were limited on account of the pleadings. This was a proceeding to condemn a right of way on a street by a railroad, affecting four lots, where the party damaged also owned twenty-eight lots in the same blocks, adjoining upon and connecting with them as one lot or piece of ground. It was held that the damages to the two entire pieces of ground, of which the lots in question formed portions, could not be recovered, on the ground that the appellant should have filed his cross petition setting up that he was the owner of the other ground, not described in the petition, which would be damaged by the construction of the proposed side track. It was held that this would have entitled an assessment of damages to the entire piece of ground of which the lot in question formed a portion.

or where there is no permanent unity of use, it seems that courts refuse to extend the award of damages to other adjacent lots.

This was held in the following cases.

Where city property was unoccupied, but was platted into blocks and lots, and a railroad company condemned lots 1 and 10 in a block, it was held error to allow damages to lots 2 to 9, inclusive, in the same block. Wilcox v. St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 35 Minn. 439, 29 N. W. 148. In this case the court said: "It is perhaps impossible to establish any rule applicable to such cases which will not be subject to criticism. But in respect to city property, in fact unoccupied, but which appears to have been platted or divided into blocks and lots, nothing more being shown, the property should be treated as lots or blocks, intended for use as such, and not as one entire tract. Prima facie that character has been given to it by the proprietor. Presumably the division or platting was with a view to the use of the property, or to its disposal and ultimate use, in such subdivisions as have been made; and if any facts exist which might be considered sufficient to rebut this presumption, they should be disclosed."

A tract of land in a city having been platted and divided into lots, presumably with a view to its disposal and ultimate use in such subdivisions, each lot must be treated as a separate tract in ejectment proceedings by the owner to recover the property and damages from a railroad company which, in constructing its road in certain streets opposite two of such lots, had taken a portion thereof. The court held that, in the absence of evidence tending to overcome the prima facie character of the lots as separate tracts which had been given to them by the proprietors, the premises could not be treated as a whole in assessing damages, but the damages must be limited to the lots a part of which had been taken by the railroad company, and that the fact that the property was occupied by a lessee as one tract, for the purpose of piling lumber, could not affect the question, since this was a mere fugitive and temporary use, and not an actual and permanent one, such as would be necessary to constitute the whole premises one tract. Koerper v. St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 42 Minn. 340, 44 N. W. 195. In this case the court said: "So far as the plaintiffs are concerned, they have offered no evidence reasonably tending to overcome the prima facie character of the lots as separate or distinct tracts, or tending to show that they have devoted by plaintiff in error constituted such separate and independent parcels as regards the land in question that they cannot properly be spoken of as the residue of a tract of land from which the land in question was taken. The court, however, did allow the plaintiff in error to show what damage, if any, had resulted from separating these farms; that is, to show, if he could, that by reason of their severance they were made so small that it would be unprofitable to work them, and damage resulting from that the jury might so award. This certainly was as far as the court could be justified in going in favor of the contention of the plaintiff in error. We think the court were right, therefore, for the reasons stated, in refusing to allow the plaintiff in error to show what damage or inconvenience would probably result to these other tracts (otherwise than what resulted from the mere severance in farming) from the taking of the Gibbons tract for the military purposes aforesaid.

A second sufficient ground for the court's action in this respect is that the testimony offered was too vague and speculative in character. It dealt with possibilities more or less remote, and was not founded upon any clear, certain, or avowed obnoxious uses to which the property in question was to be put. The tract in question nearly surrounds the reservation of the United States, upon which permanent fortifications have already been erected, and emplacements for heavy ordnance already built, with the magazines and other appurtenances for the firing of large guns. These already existed, and there was no suggestion that the additional land embraced within the tract in question was to be used for en-them to actual and permanent use as one tract."

In proceedings for assessment of damages caused by building a railroad on a street intersecting diagonally a block of land, owned by a single person, which was laid out into lots extending across the block, two of which fronted on the diagonal street, it was held, in Evansville & R. R. Co. v. Charlton, 6 Ind. App. 56, 33 N. E. 129, that the owner of the block could recover damages only for those lots which abutted on the street appropriated.

For cases where a building or buildings which may or may not extend across plat lines are affected, see infra, II. c, Separating and severing buildings.

See also, as to effect of plat lines, Phillips v. St. Clair Incline Plane Co. 166 Pa. 21, 81 Atl. 69, supra, I.

c. Separating and severing buildings.

In regard to separating buildings where some are immediately affected by proximity to a railroad and the like, it seems that there is no inflexible rule in estimating damages. The property may be a unit although having several houses thereon. A New York case (Cooper v. Manhattan R. Co. 85 Hun, 217, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1054) went to the extent of refusing to separate the damages where several houses were on the corner property, taking judicial notice that property of that size and in that locality was adapted for a large single building. On the other hand, a partition wall dividing a building, with different tenants, may be sufficient to sever the damages. So, in Keene v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 79 Hun, 451, 29 N. Y. Supp. 971, it was held that, notwithstanding apparent architectural unity, a block of apartment houses on a corner could be severed in estimating damages caused by an elevated railroad on a side street.

Where a party owned a lot at the corner of a street and alley on which were two houses, one on the street and one on the alley, and a bridge company obstructed the street, it was held that he was entitled to recover damages for the whole lot. White v. Fifth Ave. & H. Street Bridge Co. 189 Pa. 500, 42 Atl. 136. In this case the court said: "As a matter of fact the plaintiff's property was a unit. It was a lot of ground, held by one title, and undivided by any lines, with two buildings on it."

32 N. Y. Supp. 1054, that a person who owned property on the corner of such streets, containing a three-story building fronting on the Bowery and some two-story stores fronting on Houston street, could recover for the damages to the property as a whole, notwithstanding the fact that the lots on Houston street did not abut on the railroad. The court said: "The only question necessary to be considered is the point made that Nos. 92, 94, and 96 East Houston street did not abut upon the elevated railroad, and, therefore, no damages could be awarded as to them. Under ordinary circumstances, of course, this would be a bar to recovery. But the improvements upon the lot in question are entirely different from those which would be suitable for the value of the lot; and when the lot comes to be improved, undoubtedly a single building will be erected covering the whole of the premises in question and fronting on the Bowery. The court may take judicial notice of the fact that lots in the city of New York are ordinarily at least 75 to 100 feet in depth, the buildings on corner lots frequently covering the whole lot in the business portion of the city. And although these premises may be divided in the manner stated, for the purpose of occupancy, yet in reality the buildings are upon the single lot fronting upon the Bowery. It would seem, therefore, that, in determining the question as to whether it had sustained fee damage, it should be treated as a single lot."

But where there are disconnected buildings, not depending on the same easements, and not used as a unit, the property may be severed in estimating damages.

This was held in Mooney v. New York Elev. R. Co. 16 Daly, 145, 9 N. Y. Supp. 522. In this case a lot ran through from street to street, and contained two disconnected buildings, one fronting on each street. In an action for damages for occupation of one street by an elevated railroad, it was held that damages to the building on the other side could not be estimated. In this case the court said: "The lot is 25 feet in width on Greenwich street, and 100 feet in depth on Beach street, and is covered by two buildings, one of which is built on the rear of the lot on Beach street, is 25 by 50 feet, is wholly unconnected with the building fronting on Greenwich street, and has its entrance and receives its light and air from Beach street. The elevated railroad structure does not extend in front of this rear building."

This case was distinguished in Stevens v. New York Elev. R. Co. 130 N. Y. 95, 28 N. E.

larging these permanent fortifications. No offer was made by the plaintiff in error to show for what purpose the land was to be used. "Military purposes" is a general description, and would cover its use as a parade ground, officers' quarters, barracks, etc. No proof was had showing that batteries were to be erected on this land. The only testimony actually offered by plaintiff in error was as to the batteries, emplacements, and magazines already erected within the permanent fortification, known as "Fort Mott." The court were right in refusing the offer to show possibilities or probabilities of damage from the use to which the land in question might be put. The court ruled that the offer was too broad. Under the circumstances of this case we are of opinion that it was right in so stating.

The second point of objection raised by the assignments of error is to the ruling of the court to the effect that the plaintiff in error could not be allowed to testify to offers of purchase made to him for the land in question for various uses. Such offers at best are unsatisfactory as a means of proving value. Many circumstances must be taken into the account, to give them any weight at all,—such as the time and place at which the offer is made, the facts bearing upon the bona fides of the offer, and a consideration of whether the offer was based on exceptional grounds. The present market value is the true criterion of the value of land to be taken. This market value is "the price that would in all probability—the probability being based upon the evidence in the case—result from fair negotiations, where the seller is willing to sell and the buyer desires to buy." Mere offers to buy, without setting forth the conditions under which they were made, and unconnected with the circumstances influencing the same, do not necessarily throw light upon the market value here referred to. But, however this may be with respect to offers proved by the persons who made them, who can be subjected to cross-examination, or by others than the owner of the land himself, who is a party to the proceedings, we are of opinion that offers proved merely by the testimony of the owner are not competent 667, infra, on the ground that in the present case there were two independent and wholly unconnected buildings on the lot, fronting on different streets, and that the light, air, and access to the building fronting on the street in which the road was not built were not interfered with.

Where a party owned corner lots with different houses thereon, it was held in Gibson v. Fifth Ave. & H. Street Bridge Co. 192 Pa. 55, 43 Atl. 339, that the damages caused by the building of a bridge on one street could not be extended to the whole property. This was on the ground that the different portions of the lots were purchased without any contemplation of unity of use, and were rented to different parties, and it was dwelling-house property held for rental by its owners before the present owner purchased it, and was held by her for the same use after she acquired title.

So, in assessing damages for injuries caused by the construction of an elevated railroad, it is held, in Keene v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 79 Hun, 451, 29 N. Y. Supp. 971, that premises covered by an apartment house, the different apartments in which are occupied as distinctly separate buildings, though connected on two floors, some of them having no frontage on the street in which the road is built, and having no easements of light, air, and access therefrom, cannot be treated as a whole, notwithstanding the unity of ownership and the unity in the construction of the buildings. The court said: "It has been urged that because of the fact of there being unity of construction in the building and unity of ownership a different rule should obtain. But it is apparent that, notwithstanding the unity of construction and unity of ownership, these premises are occupied as distinct and separate buildings, just as much as though there was no architectural unity and there was a division of ownership. It is difficult to see how mere architectural unity or single ownership can give an easement upon a street where none would exist, even if the occupation was the same and the interior arrangements were the same but the exterior appearance showed diversity." The case does not disclose whether or not there was more than one lot, but, as the ground was 100 by 120 feet, it must have contained several lots. The decision, however, 57 L. R. A.

is on the ground that the side of the building having the easement might have been separated from the balance of the building. The principle involved in this case is similar to that in Greenwood v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 26 Jones & S. 482, 12 N. Y. Supp. 910, infra, although the case is not referred to.

This case was followed by Reilly v. Manhattan R. Co. 43 App. Div. 80, 59 N. Y. Supp. 335, in which it was held that where a building was situated on two lots on the corner of a street, in estimating damages for the taking of the side street by an elevated railroad the damages should be limited to that part of the building adjacent to the street railroad. This was because there was a partition wall in the building. Both sides of the building were used for apartments and stores, and the stores were actually walled off. It was not clear that the apartments were walled off, but they were architecturally distinct. The dissenting opinion says, however: "There were no such two independent and wholly unconnected buildings on those lots as would bring the case within the ruling in Mooney v. New York Elev. R. Co. 16 Daly, 145, 9 N. Y. Supp. 522 [supra] and similar cases."

It had been held in Greenwood v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 26 Jones & S. 482, 12 N. Y. Supp. 919, that the severance of easements by a sale of two corner lots to different parties would prevent a unity in estimating damages from an elevated railroad on the side street, where the title to the property had become united in one owner, although one building covered both lots. But a similar case in the New York court of appeals (Stevens v. New York Elev. R. Co. 130 N. Y. 95, 28 N. E. 667) refused to apply that doctrine, and held that a building covering two lots on a corner would be treated as a unit in estimating the damages.

Land situated on the corner of two streets having been divided into two distinct lots and sold as such, it was held, in Greenwood v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 26 Jones & S. 482, 12 N. Y. Supp. 919, that where the two lots subsequently passed by mesne conveyances to one owner, who constructed a single building thereon, damages for the impairment of easements of light, etc., by the construction of an elevated railroad in one of such streets must be limited to the diminution of light to the lot for the purpose of proving market value. We think the court therefore was right in rejecting the testimony of the plaintiff in error in this regard.

The court was very liberal in allowing the jury to consider the testimony offered by the plaintiff in error, as to other criterions of value, and allowed testimony to show that the land in question was adapted to other purposes than agricultural purposes; that it was available as a hotel site; that projected trolley lines were likely to run near it, and enhance its value; that a railroad might be built in its neighborhood, which might have a like influence; stating to the jury that, if these or other purposes to which the land could be adapted add to the present value of the land, they might give the plaintiff in error the benefit of that in estimating the present worth of the property itself. There was considerable testimony of this kind, more or less vague, all of which was admitted for the reasons stated. In so admitting it, we think the court was quite as favorable as it ought to have been to the plaintiff in error.

The last assignment of error is that the court instructed the jury, as follows: "The jury must be satisfied as to the value and damage by the testimony which is produced before it, without reference to any testimony which was produced before the commissioners, or influenced by the commissioners' report."

We think the court were quite right in this instruction. The case on the appeal from the commissioners' award was tried before the district court de novo. All the evidence necessary to a finding was produced on both sides, and this only could the jury properly consider, uninfluenced by the action of the commissioners, from which appeal was taken.

Upon a careful consideration of the whole case, we see no error, either in the charge of the court to the jury or in its rulings as to the admissibility of evidence, and the judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

abutting on that street only, and cannot include compensation for the diminution of light to the other lot, since, although originally both lots, when owned as an entirety, were entitled to an easement of light and air from such street, the conveyance of each lot separately had destroyed that easement so far as the lot which did not abut on that street was concerned, and the subsequent reunion of the two lots could not have the effect to restore such right.

This decision, however, was disapproved and in effect overruled in Stevens v. New York Elev. R. Co. 180 N. Y. 95, 28 N. E. 667, a case quite similar in its facts, in which it was held that, although a piece of property extending from one street to another originally consisted of two lots, one fronting on each street, and the lots had separate owners, damages for the construction of an elevated railroad in one of the streets will not be limited to the injuries occasioned to that part of the property abutting on such street only, but will be awarded for the injury done to the property as a whole, where for many years prior to the construction of the railroad the property had been owned, used, and conveyed as a single lot abutting on both streets, and was occupied by a single four-story building under one roof, having no transverse partition wall and with but a single flight of stairs between the first and second stories, and at the time of bringing the action to recover damages the property was owned by a single person. The court said, in discussing the Greenwood Case: "The characterization of these street rights as easements, and implying that they are governed by the rules, and are subject to the limitations, of common-law easements, tends to obscure the rights of abutting owners on the one hand, and of the corporations on the other."

The judgment in the Greenwood Case was rested on the ground that, the street rights once appurtenant to both lots having been destroyed as to 83 by the prior conveyances of 81, they could not be restored by the subsequent reunion of both lots. This conclusion, as applied to such rights as are under consideration, we think cannot be supported.

In Meyer v. Newark (N. J.) 6 Am. Law Rev. 576, where only a part (about one half) of a house was within the lines of the proposed 57 L. R. A. street, the question was left for review before the court in banc, whether the city was compelled to take the whole, or merely to pay for the damages incident to the destruction of the half, of the house; the court, however, strongly intimated that in cases where the house was not entirely destroyed it was only necessary to pay damages sufficient to compensate the owner, and the whole need not be taken or paid for.

d. Part of lot or lots injured.

The rule of damages where a part of a lot or lots has been taken seems to be based upon the unity of use and purpose, taken in connection with the deprivation of easements.

So, where parts of three lots were taken by a railroad, it was held that the owner was entitled to have the damages assessed to the whole without regard to the division into lots. Sherwood v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 21 Minn. 122, 127.

And where a triangular part of a lot was condemned, and notice was given to the owners, who were constructing a large building thereon, whereupon they changed their plans, abandoned the structure, and erected the building on the remainder of the lot, the commissioners, in assessing damages, treated the triangle as a vacant, separate lot. It was held that the owners were entitled to recover, as compensation, both the value of the land taken, and the injury, if any, done to the value of the remaining land. It was further held that the owners should be allowed the actual cost and expenditure incurred in changing the plan of their structure. Re New York & B. Bridge, 18 App. Div. 8, 45 N. Y. Supp. 484.

In Haggard v. Independent School Dist. 113 Iowa, 486, 85 N. W. 777, the two halves of a lot were separated by an alley. One half was used for residence and the other half was condemned for school purposes. It was held that the owner was entitled to damages for injury to that portion of the lot on which was situated the residence. In this case the rule as to damages caused by inconvenience to the residence was held to be the same as where a part of a farm is taken for railroad purposes. The case does not show what inconvenience would be caused to the residence, or to what uses the parts separated by the alley were put; but the court said: "Who can say in this case, for instance, how much the inconvenience due to the proximity of the school building on the balance of this block would be increased by the fact that the half lot in question was included in the schoolhouse site?"

And where a party owned the south half of a lot, and there was appurtenant thereto a right of way across the north half, on which he owned an undivided half of a coal office, weighing scales, and switch, on condemnation of the south half of the lot it was held that the owner thereof was entitled to recover for his interest in the appurtenances, coal office, scales, and track situated on the north half. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. v. Ward, 128 Ill. 349, 18 N. E. 828, 21 N. E. 562.

III. Farm lands in a contiguous body.

Government subdivisions of 40, 80, 160 acres, etc., are not to be taken into consideration in estimating the damages, where land is contiguous and is used as one tract for farm purposes. The general rule is that where several distinct lots or subdivisions are in fact united by being used for one purpose, so that they are practically one piece, the damages for the whole are to be allotted, although but one part is taken.

So, where a man owned six 40-acre tracts in one body, it was held that damages caused by the construction of a railroad should be estimated as to the whole tract, although the road was built on only two of them. Parks v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 83 Wis. 413.

And in a proceeding to condemn a right of way for a railroad over a 40-acre tract which was part of 160 acres, it was held that the damages should not be limited to the 40-acre tract, but extended to the whole farm. Bigelow v. West Wisconsin R. Co. 27 Wis. 478.

Also, in Robbins v. Milwaukee & H. R. Co. 6 Wis. 636, it was held that damages to the owner of lands taken for railroad purposes are not limited to the particular strip taken, or to the particular parcel, inclosure, or lot, such as a 10, 20, or 40 acre tract, the court saying that the whole contiguous farm lying together in a body and cultivated as such may be considered, as to the effect thereon, the convenience or facility or its after use, the feasibility of communication and approach, as proper subjects in estimating the damages.

And where a number of tracts of land as described by the government surveys are used together as one farm or body of land, it was held that in determining the owner's damage by reason of the location of a railroad across one or more of the tracts the injury to the whole farm should be considered. Omaha Southern R. Co. v. Todd, 39 Neb. 818, 58 N. W. 289; Northeastern Nebraska R. Co. v. Frasier, 25 Neb. 42, 40 N. W. 604.

So, where a party owned 590 acres, all in one body, and a railroad ran diagonally over seven 40-acre tracts, it was held that the damages could be awarded to the bodies of land taken as a whole, and were not to be confined to the small government subdivisions over which the road might pass. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Baker, 102 Mo. 553, 15 S. W. 64.

Likewise, where several 40-acre pieces were contiguous to each other, and used as one farm, this was held to bring the case within the rule that where, in condemnation proceedings, several distinct lots or subdivisions are in fact united by being used for one purpose, so that they are practically one lot or piece,—as, for instance, one farm,—the damage for the whole is to be allowed, though but one part or subdivision is taken. Cedar Rapids, I. F. 57 L. R. A.

& N. W. R. Co. v. Ryan, 36 Minn. 546, 33 N. W. 35.

Three 40-acre tracts adjacent to each other being used as one farm, it was held that the owner was entitled to damages for injury to the whole, in condemnation proceedings for a railroad through two of the quarters. Wilmes v. Minneapolis & N. W. R. Co. 29 Minn. 242, 13 N. W. 39.

And where a farm was in one inclosure, and the land taken for a right of way was all in an 80-acre subdivision, it was held that damages to the entire farm could be allowed. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Brunson, 43 Kan. 371, 23 Pac. 495.

In Peden v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 78 Iowa, 131, 4 L. R. A. 401, 42 N. W. 625, the grantor conveyed a right of way through an 80-acre tract of land to a railroad, the deed containing a covenant that the railroad company would restrict the running of a stream to one side of its track and not allow it to pass through cattle guards or culverts to the other side. He owned, also, other lands, and subsequently sold 135 acres including 29 of the 80 affected by the covenant. It was held that his grantee could claim the benefit of the covenant as to his whole 135 acres, applying the rule of condemnation that where tracts together constituting but a single farm are sought to be taken by statutory proceedings, the landowner's right of recovery is not limited to the subdivision through which the right of way is to pass, but extends to all the tracts as a whole.

Government subdivisions in condemnation for a railroad are held to be entitled to no consideration, and cut no figure in the determination of the damages sustained. Hartshorn v. Burlington, C. & N. R. Co. 52 Iowa, 613, 3 N. W. 648.

So, section lines were held not to constitute different tracts where the farm was in a compact body, and a railroad condemned 12 acres out of the farm. Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 90 Ill. 316.

And in a proceeding by a railroad to condemn a right of way over a quarter section of land, omitting another quarter section which adjoined it and on which were buildings, the two tracts constituting a farm, it was insisted that it was erroneous to allow evidence as to damages sustained to land not described in the petition, in consequence of a portion of that which was described being cut off by the railroad from the balance of the farm. But it was held that it was too late to raise the objection on appeal. Galena & S. W. R. Co. v. Birkbeck, 70 Ill. 208.

In a proceeding by a railway to condemn a right of way, it was held that the assessment of damages need not necessarily be restricted to the injury done to the legal subdivision of land described in the petition; that if the tract described is a part of a larger connected body of land, the owner might recover for the injury done to the tract as a whole; that if the tract traversed by the railroad is part of the farm, its use as such is notice to the company that an injury to a part impairs the value of the whole, for a farm is a unit. Fayetteville & L. R. Co. v. Hunt, 51 Ark. 330, 11 S. W. 418. In this case the tract over which the road was located was unfenced woodland, but it adjoined, and was part of, the owner's farm.

And where no division of a farm had been contemplated or was necessary, the fact that a portion of the tract was bottom land near a river, and a portion high upland, was held not to prevent awarding damages for the whole tract in condemnation for a railroad right of way. Doud v. Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 488, 41 N. W. 65.

But where the land is not used as a unit, damages will not be extended to the whole, although the tracts may adjoin. This was held in Minnesota Valley R. Co. v. Doran, 15 Minn. 230, Gil. 179. In this case plaintiff owned two tracts of land, claiming that they constituted but one farm. The land was adjoining, and there was one tenant living on one tract and another on the other. The witnesses in the case spoke of the tracts as this farm and that farm. The plaintiff testified: "The bluff between the farms is not so steep but it can be passed. . . . I regard the farm in section 19 also injured." It was held that it was error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury to consider the land as two separate and distinct tracts.

IV. Farm lands separated by highways, railroads, canals, or other property.

The general rule seems to be that the division of farm lands by highways, railroads, canals, or other property will not of itself necessarily limit the damages to the piece of land condemned for public purposes. If the tract is used as a unit, it will be treated as a unit in estimating damages. On the other hand, if the use and enjoyment of the tract not taken do not depend on its connection with that taken, the damages will not be extended to the whole farm.

This latter rule was applied in SHARPE v. UNITED STATES, where farms severed by public roads, and occupied by different tenants, one portion being purchased ten days previous to condemnation, were held not to be a part of the same tract.

Where a railroad condemned a right of way along a highway wholly within a tract of land, it was held that damages could be allowed to the whole farm, constituting several tracts as fixed by the government survey and separated by a highway, and that the damages could not be restricted to one government subdivision on that side of the highway upon which the road was located. Ham v. Wisconsin, I. & N. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 716, 17 N. W. 157.

In estimating the damages to be recovered for the appropriation of a railroad right of way over an embankment built into a river by parties holding property fronting thereon under a lease, the road running between the mainland and a stone crib or pier erected by the lessees, the entire premises held by the lessees and necessarily and properly used in their business must be considered, notwithstanding the fact that the premises were divided by a street or highway. Kenwick v. Davenport & N. W. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 664. The state statutes provided that no railroad should be built between the lands of a riparian owner and the river, without compensation to the owner. On the leased property were located a sawmill, planing-mill, lumber yard, etc., and it was contended that the planing-mill, and perhaps other portions of the property, had no connection with the sawmill, and that it was therefore erroneous to direct the jury to take into consideration the whole premises; but the court held that, as there was evidence to the contrary, it was for the jury to decide whether or not the whole premises were "necessarily and properly" used by the lessees "in their business" and the extent of the damages, adding that for the purposes of their business the highway may have been an advantage, and that, if their leasehold interest was rendered less valuable by the construction of the railway, the fact that the premises leased were traversed by a street should not be considered in reduction of damages.

A railroad company condemned a right of way across lands north of a public road. An 80-acre tract lay south of the road, and this last tract was bought as a tract, and when purchased was occupied as a separate farm with a farm house thereon, and had been cultivated by a tenant for two years. It was held that it was a question for the jury whether the 80 acres were a separate parcel, and not within the farm and not to be considered in estimating the damages; and that, if they were a part of the farm, the jury might consider the effect of the railroad upon the convenience and safety in cultivating it. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. Murphy, 19 Minn. 500, Gil. 438. In this case the court said: "And if the imposition of a public easement upon and over a body of land does not divide it into two distinct farms, certainly, in buying land subject to such easement, the existence of the easement does not, of itself, operate to keep the land a separate farm from that which it adjoins. And as to the cultivation by a tenant, it seems still more unreasonable to hold that it would, in law, make this 80-acre tract a 'separate farm occupied by a tenant.'"

This case was distinguished in Cameron v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 42 Minn. 75, 43 N. W. 786, on the ground that in the Murphy Case the ownership was continuous. The court said: "The tracts were contiguous; the separation of the parts in question being not complete, but consisting only of the intervening public easement. The right to use the intervening land, to pass and repass, remained in the owner of the whole; and when, if ever, the public easement should be abandoned, the landowner's right in respect to the whole body of land would become unqualified." In the Cameron Case a farm was divided into two parts by an intervening strip of land occupied by a railroad, the fee of which had never been acquired by the owner of the farm, and the railroad company condemned a tract of 8¼ acres in one of these parts. The owner claimed the right to recover damages to the farm as a whole, but the court held that the land comprising the farm must be treated as two separate and distinct tracts for the purpose of the assessment of damages.

But in New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. v. Le Fevre, 27 Hun, 537, where a turnpike road ran through ten acres of land adjacent to and occupied in connection with a dwelling house, dividing the land into two parts, it was held that, in condemnation of part of the land for a railway, the owner was entitled to have the damages to the whole property estimated, including that on both sides of the turnpike.

So, where a highway ran through a tract of land, and a railroad company condemned a right of way through the strip between the highway and the river, it was held that damages to the whole tract on the other side of the highway could be considered in condemnation. Colvill v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 19 Minn. 283, Gil. 240. In this case the court said: "It seems that the highway ran through this property; this strip lay between it and the river, and the railroad went through it. Certainly, upon principle, there can be no objection to arriving at the damages to the whole property by estimating the damage to different subdivisions of it, whether such portion be divided from the rest by a railroad, or a highway, or by its nature, as if one portion be upland, and another pasture, and another plowland."

In assessing the damages to two tracts of land owned by a manufacturing company, separated by a cattle drive 16 feet wide, over and under which the landowners had a right of way, with privileges to bridge over or tunnel under as they might see fit, it was held that damages could be awarded to both tracts for injuries caused by a right of way appropriated on one of them. Union Terminal R. Co. v. Peet Bros. Mfg. Co. 58 Kan. 197, 48 Pac. 860.

Land consisting of 960 acres, lying in a body, was used for the purpose of a stock yard. A railroad ran diagonally through a quarter section, and cut off the water, timber, houses, and corrals from the main body, but did not touch the other quarters of the ranch. A highway separated the quarter through which the railroad ran from the whole section. It was held that the landowner was entitled to recover damages for injuries to the whole property, and not merely for that quarter over which the railroad was built. Kansas City, E. & S. R. Co. v. Merrill, 25 Kan. 421.

A farm consisted of land in different sections separated by a highway. A railroad ran north and south parallel with the highway through a tract in one section, and crossed over and cut 3 acres off of the corner of the other tract. It was held that the owner was entitled to have the damages assessed to the farm as a whole, and that it was error to limit the damages to the part of the quarter section on which the railroad was located. Lough v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (Iowa) 89 N. W. 77.

In Westbrook v. Muscatine N. & S. R. Co. (Iowa) 88 N. W. 202, where a farm was divided into two parts by an intervening tract of land, over which a private way existed by license from the owner, and a portion of one tract was condemned for a railroad right of way, a finding by the jury that the two tracts constituted but one farm and should be treated as a whole in assessing damages was sustained, and the fact that the way over the intervening tract existed only by license, and could be revoked at any time, was held not to be sufficient to show that the two tracts did not constitute a single farm, especially where they were also connected by a highway.

So, where a sewer was condemned through one side of a tract, and the tract was divided by a right of way or street, it was held that the mere intervention of a plat legally established, but not visible on the surface of the ground, was not conclusive that the two portions were different parcels of land. Lincoln v. Com. 164 Mass. 368, 41 N. E. 489. In this case the court said: "If, as here, the whole estate was practically one, the petitioner is entitled to have the damages to the whole of it considered. As was said by Dixon, Ch. J., we are to look at the land, and not at the map, to ascertain the plaintiff's damages." The case does not show whether the land was within corporate limits or not. The condemnation was for an outlet for a sewer through a way which was claimed to have been a street laid out by the town, but this was disputed, and the rule laid down by the court was on the theory that the land was practically one tract.

In Schuykill River E. S. R. Co. v. Stocker, 128 Pa. 233, 18 Atl. 399, a farm was situated partly within the southern limits of a city. A road intersected the farm, and a parallel street was planned within the city limits. A railroad condemned a right of way along the street. The court treated the damages as applicable to the whole farm, but the chief point in controversy was as to the testimony of an expert witness, who based his assessment of damages on the value of the land north of the street and road. This was held prejudicial error on the ground that the whole tract should have been considered in estimating the damages, as the jury might have inferred the remainder of the tract to be of the same value. The court said: "He does not give the depreciation of the whole, or even a view of the whole property, as affected by the road, but considers that one part has been depreciated by itself, and the other part has not been affected; and therefore his testimony might be used with the jury to show that the depreciation of the part is the representation of the effect of the building of the road upon the market value of the whole. This is certainly not in accord with the letter or spirit of the rule which has so long been the rule in this state, that the difference between the market value of the whole property, before and after the building of the railroad, is the measure of the damage to the owner."

In Chicago & P. R. Co. v. Hildebrand, 136 Ill. 467, 27 N. E. 69, after a railroad had condemned a strip across a tract, severing the land, it subsequently sought to condemn another strip for constructing an additional track on one side, and it was held that the lands on both sides should be regarded as contiguous to the land taken, and that the subsequent taking was fairly within the scope and design of the original taking. In this case the court said: "The farm may still be used, by means of crossings, as a unit, and therefore an injury to one part is an injury (because a depreciation of value) of the whole; and if contiguity to any part of it causes this depreciation, it will be sufficient."

And land leased for a rifle range was held to constitute one tract, although the leases were from different parties, and an intervening portion was held by a panel lease. Holt v. Gaslight & Coke Co. L. R. 7 Q. B. 728, 41 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 351, 27 L. T. N. S. 442. This was under land clauses consolidation act 1845, § 49 (8 Vict. chap. 18), providing that where an inquiry shall relate to the value of lands to be purchased and compensation for injury done to lands "held herewith," the jury shall give their verdict separately.

In Essex v. Acton Local Board, L. R. 14 A. C. 153, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 594, 61 L. T. N. S. 1, 38 Week. Rep. 209, 53 J. P. 756, Reversing Queen v. Essex, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 447, Affirming L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 753, a tract of land let on long building leases was condemned for sewerage works. This tract formed part of an estate laid out for building purposes, and damages were claimed, not only for the land taken, but also for other lands alleged to be injuriously affected. Part of the land alleged to be injured by the condemnation was separated from the lands actually taken by other land of the owner in respect of which no compensation was claimed, and the remainder was separated therefrom by a railroad. It was contended that the lands for which consequential damages were claimed were not lands that could be "injuriously affected" within the meaning of the land clauses consolidation act of 1845, because they were already severed from the land condemned, and were not "held therewith" for one and the same purpose. But it was held that it was not necessary that the lands claimed to be injuriously affected should be in contact with the lands taken; that it was sufficient if both parcels were held by one owner and the unity of ownership conduced to the advantage or protection of the property as one holding, and that the severance created by the railway was not in itself a bar to the claim for damages. Essex v. Acton Local Board, L. R. 14 A. C. 153, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S.

594, 61 L. T. N. S. 1, 38 Week. Rep. 208, 53 J. P. 756, Reversing Queen v. Essex, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 447, Amrming L. R. 14 Q. B. Div. 753. In this case Lord Bramwell said: "My lords, I think it convenient to consider, first, whether the land injuriously affected, or which will be injuriously affected, by the works of the respondents on the lands taken, is land held with the land taken, within the meaning of 8 & 9 Vict. chap. 18, § 49. I think it is. . . . The lands have one owner. I cannot think it matters that they are separated by a railway. I suppose it would hardly be said that one part of a part separated from another part by a railway was not land held with that other part. Here the lands are close. What is done on one part must or might affect what would be done on the other. For example, what I mean is this: Houses of a particular class or character built on one part would influence the class or character of what would or might be built on the other. The class of occupants of one part would in like way influence the character of that on the other. On these considerations I am of the opinion that the land in respect of which the claim is made here was land held with the piece taken."

A party owned a tract of land used as a paper plant having a spring and reservoir thereon, separated by a grant of a right of way to a railroad that used anthracite coal, and that had covenanted not to pollute the water. Another railroad that used soft coal condemned a right of way through one of the tracts, destroying the use of the water. It was held that, both tracts being necessary for the use of the paper plant, they were both to be considered in estimating damages. Rudolph v. Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. 186 Pa. 541, 47 L. R. A. 782, 40 Atl. 1083.

A railroad company having acquired by prescription a strip 14 feet wide across 120 acres of land, in an action to condemn a strip 43 feet wide along this right of way it was held that it was not error to consider damages to the whole farm, although it had previously been severed by the railroad. Hedmond v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 39 Minn. 248, 40 N. W. 64. In this case the court said: "It is argued that the court also committed an error in charging that the jury might consider damages to the land west of the strip occupied by defendant; but upon a careful examination of the testimony we fail to discover that the part of the charge excepted to was erroneous. . . . The attention of each witness was specially called to the fact that the farm was already severed by defendant, and that by appropriating an additional 43 feet it merely widened its already acquired right of way. If these cases had been separately tried, the tracts upon the east and west of defendant's 14 feet could have been more clearly treated as distinct farms, and possibly better results attained; but the measure of damages would have been the same as that adopted, without objection, upon the examination of plaintiff's witnesses."

And where a 1000-acre tract was intersected by two railroads, it was held that it might still be treated as one farm in a subsequent proceeding by another railroad to condemn a right of way through a part of the same. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. v. Hunccheon, 130 Ind. 529, 30 N. E. 636.

A farm of 200 acres was divided into two nearly equal parts by the Erie canal, and connected by a farm bridge. One side was cultivated, and contained the farm buildings. The other side was hilly, and contained no buildings, but there was a never failing spring thereon. The water from which was conducted under the canal to the buildings. A railroad condemned a strip along the canal which covered the spring. It was held that the owner was entitled to recover damages to the farm as a whole. Re Boston, H. T. & W. R. Co. 31 Hun, 461.

Where a canal intersected a farm, and a railroad company, by trespass, took possession of the canal bed, and occupied the same for many years, and the owner of the land sold a strip adjacent to this railroad to another railroad company,—it was held in condemnation proceedings subsequently brought by the railroad company occupying the canal bed that, although the land was separated into two tracts by the sale to another railroad company, yet damages to the farm as a whole should be allowed because at the time of the entry on the canal bed there had been no sale, and the condemnation proceedings should relate back, for assessing damages, to the time of the entry. Graham v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. 145 Pa. 504, 22 Atl. 983. In this case the court said: "This necessarily involves a knowledge and consideration of the condition of the land before the railroad was built. For, although the damages are to be computed as of the date of the divestiture of the plaintiff's title to the right of way, yet it is plain that the land must be valued, in the first instance, free from the obstructions of the plaintiff's road, and in the condition in which the defendant company found it upon their first entry."

In Cameron v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. 157 Pa. 617, 22 L. R. A. 443, 27 Atl. 668, a farm was intersected by a canal, the fee of which was not in the owner of the farm. The canal was bridged over by the state, and the two pieces were used as a whole. In condemnation proceedings for a right of way through one piece it was held that the damages were not limited to that tract, and that the two pieces were to be considered as one farm.

But in Bergen Neck R. Co. v. Point Breeze Ferry & Improv. Co. 57 N. J. L. 163, 30 Atl. 584, 31 Atl. 724, it was held error in condemnation of one tract to consider the damages caused to the other tract, where a canal divided land, and the access across the canal was the reservation of a draw-bridge right, and the bridge had long since fallen, and was not repaired, although the owner claimed that a railroad bridge could be built to unite the tracts.

Where a party owned property partly within and partly south of a village, the southern end of which was intersected by two railroads, cutting off 16 acres adapted and used for farming, it was held that upon the subsequent condemnation by another railroad company of a portion of the land between the two former railroads and the village, damages could not be recovered for the injury to the 16-acre tract, on the theory that it was adapted to be divided into suburban lots, and that its value for such purpose had been depreciated by the taking of the other lands. Haines v. St. Louis, D. M. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 216, 21 N. W. 573. In this case the court said: "We are of the opinion that, on plaintiff's theory as to the use to which the portion of the land through which defendant's road is built is adapted, and its special value because of its adaptability to that use, she is not entitled to have the effect of the appropriation of the right of way on the value of the agricultural land lying south of the railroads considered in the assessment of her damages. . . . The different portions of the property being adapted to different uses, and being, in effect, devoted to different objects, they cannot, we think, be regarded as constituting one property."

In considering whether land taken in condemnation is part of a larger tract, it was held in Ohio Southern R. Co. v. Snyder, 5 Ohio N. P. 461, that only such land can be considered as remaining lands, for which damages may be allowed, as adjoins, and in its use and enjoyment is connected with, the lands taken; and that if any part taken is part of another farm, the remaining lands will not include the same.

Damages to the entire farm cannot be included in estimating the amount to be paid for the condemnation of a triangular piece of land at the junction of two intersecting lines of railroad crossing a farm, the fee in the strip covered by one of such lines having never been owned by the owner of the farm, and the land condemned being entirely within one of the two sections into which the farm was divided by such intervening strip, but the lands comprising the farm must be treated as two separate and distinct tracts for the purpose of the assessment of damages. Cameron v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 42 Minn. 75, 43 N. W. 785. In this case the court said: "The case here presented did not justify treating the lands east of the railroad and those west of it as one entire body of land. The most significant and controlling fact is that these parcels are physically separated by the intervening fee. In this respect they are as really separate and distinct tracts of land as if they had been miles apart, instead of perhaps a hundred feet. Different tracts of land, being in fact and physically separate and distinct, cannot, in general at least, be reasonably regarded as constituting one entire body of land, or be treated as such, from the fact that they may be under one ownership, and be profitably and appropriately used together for the same purpose."

A quarry and a shipping lot, entirely disconnected except for business use, were held not to constitute one tract in Potts v. Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. 119 Pa. 278, 13 Atl. 291. See supra I.

In Harrisburg & P. R. Co. v. Moore, 4 W. N. C. 532, it was said: "An independent and separate tract of land, not touched by the railroad, and constituting no part of the tract which the railroad passes upon, has the same separateness in the hands of the same person as it has in the hands of different owners. The law has regard to the land out of which the property is taken considered as a whole, and not to the person of the owner."

In Sloan v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 181 Pa. 568, 18 Atl. 903, where a railroad right of way was condemned through an 8-acre tract of land and evidence was given, without objection, as to the value of a detached 16-acre tract owned by the same party and separated from the other tract by a public road, it was held that where the jury were properly instructed as to estimating the damages to the 8-acre tract, and not to award damages for the 16-acre tract, it was not error. In this case it was said that the latter tract would probably bring more if sold separately.

V. Lands in different counties.

Where a creek formed the boundary between two counties, and some 60 acres of a farm were in one county and the balance in the other county, it was held that damages to the farm as a whole, including that in both counties, was properly considered in rendering judgment in condemnation proceedings for land wholly in one county. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Gough, 29 Kan. 94. The court said: "The statute only authorizes condemnation proceedings in a county in which the corporation proposes to construct its road, and no part of his proposed road is shown to run through the county of Atchison. So that, unless Gough can recover in this action, he can recover only a partial amount of the injury to his farm. Still again, the district court is a court of general jurisdiction. Both Gough and the railroad company were parties to this action, and if by the proceedings it affirmatively appears that Gough has recovered all the damages done to his entire farm, such judgment would be a bar to any claim which he might hereafter make for damages to any particular portion.

The same rule of compensation exists in one county as another, and in view of the fact that the railroad tract did not touch any portion of the farm in Atchison county, and that the injury before the commissioners extended without apparent question to the damages to the entire farm, we think that the ruling of the district court must be sustained."

In Potts v. Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. 119 Pa. 278, 13 Atl. 291, it was held that a sales yard in another county was not a part of a shipping lot that was condemned. The court said: "An extensive business partnership may conduct a variety of operations, as distinct in their character as the location of its various departments; and if their different and disconnected properties are to be regarded as one property because they are used in one business, the assessment of damages for right of way would become liable to such complications as would greatly embarrass the administration of the law, in this form of proceeding."

This note is not intended to include the subject of damages in condemnation of railroad property by other railroads for crossings and the like.

VI. Summary.

The general rule is that where property is so situated that it is used as a unit, and each part is dependent upon the other, the damages will not be limited in eminent domain to the particular piece taken, but will extend to the whole. This seems to be the general rule whether applied to farm, to city property, or to a plant. In applying this rule it seems that a purchase of property in several parcels, that are separated by highways, will not be regarded as a unit where the use as a whole is only in contemplation. If tracts are held by different titles or estates, or if one parcel that is needed for public improvements is acquired shortly before condemnation, it seems that damages will not extend to the other pieces. Government subdivisions, section lines, and plat lines are of no consequence if the property is in a body and used as one tract. So, farms that are separated by highways, railroads, or other property, may still be treated as one farm where each piece is a necessary adjunct of the other; and so, even where a plant extends over several blocks that are divided by streets, if each piece is necessary for the actual operation of the plant, the whole plant will be regarded as damaged in condemning a part. If the use is only intended, or if the several pieces can be separated without affecting the value of the other, the damages will be limited to the particular piece taken or injured. It is held in some cases that a building divided by partition walls with independent entrances and easements may be severed in estimating damages on one side. Where a farm extended over into another county damages to the whole were allowed under a particular statute, as in that case it seemed to be the only remedy; but ordinarily in the absence of a statutory proceeding the damages will be limited to lands in the county in which the proceeding was had.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

Elizabeth REYNOLDS, Admr., etc.,
v.
BURGESS SULPHITE FIBRE COMPANY.

(.....N. H.....)

1. A bill of discovery will lie to compel an employer to produce, for the inspection of plaintiff, the broken parts of machinery, defects in which are alleged to have caused a death, to recover damages for which an action has been instituted at law which cannot be satisfactorily prepared for trial without such inspection.
2. The production of broken machinery may be compelled for examination by persons intending to testify as experts in an action at law for personal injuries caused by its breaking.
3. That an action at law seeks damages for a personal tort will not defeat a bill for discovery in aid of it, if it does not involve moral turpitude or immoral conduct on the part of defendant.
4. Jurisdiction to grant discovery of broken machinery in aid of an action for injuries caused by its breaking is not ousted by statutes removing the disability of parties as witnesses, authorizing the taking of depositions before trial, or giving the court authority to order a view at the trial.

(April 1, 1902.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to a ruling of the Coos County Court sustaining a demurrer to a bill filed to obtain inspection of the fragments of machinery, defects in which were alleged to have occasioned the death of plaintiff's intestate. Sustained.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. Crawford D. Hening for plaintiff.
Messrs. Chamberlin & Rich and Orville D. Baker, for defendant:

Bills of discovery were for the purpose of obtaining evidence, not to manufacture it. They were to discover evidence to be used in court, not for the purpose of making or qualifying witnesses.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 205.

Under the practice of New Hampshire, at least, discovery was never based upon any necessity for preparation for trial, but, if used at all, it was based upon the principle of obtaining proof of the issues in the case at the trial.

Langdell, Eq. Pl. 2d ed. p. 242; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 205.

The argument that because papers, documents, letters, writings, and other things are subjects of discovery, property must also be subject to like orders, has neither legal reasoning, principle, nor authority for its support.

Narramore v. Clark, 63 N. H. 166; Oorey v. Bath, 35 N. H. 538; Somers v. Emerson, 58 N. H. 49.

There is a clear distinction between cases in which the production of documents is sought for the purpose of discovery, and cases in which the delivering up of documents alleged to be improperly withheld is the object of the suit.

Kerr, Discovery, chap. 1, p. 3, note.

It may happen that a suit is instituted for the purpose of obtaining possession of documents alleged to be improperly withheld from the plaintiff; and, if that be the object, and the discovery be not barred by demurrer or plea, the plaintiff is entitled to have them described in the answer, and to be informed whether they are in the defendant's possession.

Adams, Eq. 13; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. chap. 17, § 708, p. 23.

If an action is brought for the recovery of personal property wherein the title is in question, if the title is proved, or not denied, to be in the plaintiff, courts undoubtedly have power to order a surrender or an inspection of it for the purpose of bringing appropriate remedies for its recovery.

See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. chap. 17, §§ 708, 709, p. 23.

But, with respect to property not evidence in a case, where the title is not involved, there can be no right to discovery or inspection.

It is a great mistake to suppose that parties to a litigation have a promiscuous right to the production and inspection of the papers and documents in the possession of their adversary.

The action is for a mere personal tort, and discovery, unless authorized by statute, is never ordered in such cases.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Whatever may have been the fact prior to 1842 (Laws 1832, chap. 89, § 9; Dover v. Portsmouth Bridge, 17 N. H. 200), there can be no doubt that ever since that date courts of this state have possessed full equity powers in respect to discovery. Rev. Stat. chap. 171, § 6; Gen. Stat. chap. 190, § 1; Gen. Laws, chap. 209, § 1; Pub. Stat. chap. 205, § 1. In the grant of equity powers by the last-named statute, which is now in force, discovery is specially mentioned. The jurisdiction of the court over the subject generally is not questioned, but it is said that this case does not fall within the jurisdiction. In considering the reasons that have been offered in support of this position, it is necessary to have in mind the origin, purpose, and general nature of this remedy. "The common law laid down as a maxim, Nemo tenetur armare adversarium suum contra se, and in furtherance of this principle it generally allowed litigant parties to conceal from each other, up to the time of trial, the evidence on which they meant to rely, and would not compel either of them to supply the other with any evidence, parol or otherwise, to assist him in the conduct of his cause." Best, Ev. § 264; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 329. A different rule grew up in equity. The defendant there was obliged to answer under oath the allegations of the bill, and might be compelled to produce, for inspection by the plaintiff, documents that were in the defendant's possession and control, and were material to the issues involved in the suit. In such cases the discovery was incident to the equitable relief sought. But it was not limited to the issues arising in suits in equity. "Many cases existed in which the plaintiff had a legal title, or a legal right, or was pursuing a legal remedy, but wherein no redress could be actually obtained, simply because the plaintiff's evidence either rested in the breast of the defendant, or consisted, in whole or in part, of documents in the defendant's possession. Hence there was a failure of justice at common law, and hence there arose the equitable remedy of bills for discovery, which was made use of simply for the purpose of assisting or supplementing the plaintiff's remedy at common law." Bispham, Eq. § 557; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1484, 1485; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 191, 195. The law excepted from the testimony which a party might be compelled to furnish against himself in this way testimony tending to convict him of a violation of the criminal law, or to subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; also communications between him and his attorney relating to the matters in suit, and, if a public officer, testimony a publication of which would be prejudicial to the community. With these exceptions, a party could be compelled "to discover and set forth upon oath every fact and circumstance within his knowledge, information, or belief," and to produce and allow his adversary to inspect and copy every document in the party's possession material to the other's case. Adams, Eq. chap. 1.

The defendant says that this case is not within this equitable jurisdiction, because the discovery and inspection sought is of articles of personal property belonging to it, in which the plaintiff has no right of property or possession. The gist of the action at law, in aid of which this suit was brought, is the negligence of the defendant in furnishing the plaintiff's intestate, an employee of it, with improper, unsuitable, and dangerous machinery for use in his employment. It is a necessary inference from the allegations of the bill that the "improper, unsuitable, and dangerous" element in the machinery existed in the strap on the connecting rod of the engine. This broke, and, it is alleged, caused the intestate's death. The alleged unsuitableness of the strap may be due to inadequacy of size, error in form, imperfection in construction, or inferiority of materials from which it was made. An inspection of the fragments will evidently aid in determining whether there was either of these defects in it, and, if so, which one. As matters of proof, the fragments would at least be ancillary to other testimony on the point. 3 Greenl. Ev. §§ 328, 329; Best, Ev. § 200. They may be the most reliable and weighty testimony, one way or the other. The bill alleges that the plaintiff cannot properly prepare her action at law for trial without an inspection and examination of them. By reason of the demurrer, this allegation must be taken as true. Unless the equitable remedy of discovery has been superseded by the provision of some plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, or is not applicable to a case of tort like that alleged in the plaintiff's action at law,—points that are hereinafter considered,—it is certain that the defendant, through its officers and agents, might be compelled in a suit like the present one to discover the form in which the strap was constructed, the character of the workmanship by which and the materials from which it was made; in short, all the facts within its knowledge, information, or belief tending to show that it was defective. If it had in its possession a plan of the strap or of the broken pieces, it might be compelled to produce it for examination by the plaintiff. Why, then, may it not be compelled to produce the broken pieces themselves? Two reasons are suggested: One—positive, and, if well founded, substantial—that the defendant's right to possess and control the property, growing out of its ownership of it, cannot be infringed in this way; and the other—negative, and not applying to the merits of the question—that there is no precedent for a discovery and inspection of such property. It must be admitted that the defendant's right of property in the broken strap will be interfered with to some extent if it is required to produce it, and allow the plaintiff and others to examine it. But such interference will not differ in kind or degree from that which occurs when a party is required to produce his letters, deeds, plans, other documents, or books for inspection. The rights of the defendant arising from the ownership of the strap are no more as-cred than would be its rights arising from the ownership of a plan of the strap, if it had one. The infringement of property rights in such cases is justified upon the ground that it is necessary to the administration of justice. Such necessity is alleged by the plaintiff and admitted by the defendant. It is apparent that an examination of the strap will afford a better means of ascertaining the truth in respect to its suitability or unsuitableness for the office it was to perform than any possible description or plan of it could afford, and the necessity for an inspection of it is correspondingly greater than the necessity for an oral description or a plan.

The following cases illustrate the application that has been made of the doctrine of discovery in aid of actions at law in respect to documents and books: Anonymous, 2 Ves. Sr. 620; Moodalay v. Morton, 1 Bro. Ch. 469; Burrell v. Nicholson, 1 Myl. & K. 680; Storey v. Lennox, 1 Myl. & C. 525; Smith v. Beaufort, 1 Hare, 507; Chadwick v. Bowman, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 561; Peck v. Ashley, 12 Met. 478. The documents, a discovery of which was sought in these cases, were not muniments of title, or documents containing evidence bearing upon an accounting between the parties, but were letters, books, and papers supposed to contain evidence in support of the plaintiff's case in actions at law. Indeed, no cases have been found in which it is held that the right to discovery in respect to documents depends upon the fact that the documents are muniments of title to property in dispute in the action at law, or that they are relevant to an accounting between the parties sought in such action. The right to the discovery of documents, etc., is as extensive as the right to discovery by oral testimony, and depends upon the same principles. Marsden v. Panshall, 1 Vern. 407, decided in 1686, is an authority that discovery may be had of personal property other than documents, etc. The plaintiff in the suit—a clothier—intrusted clothes to B. for sale in London, and B. pawned them to the defendant. The defendant confessed that B. pawned clothes to him, but did not admit that they were the plaintiff's. The report says: "Sergeant Maynard this day moved for the plaintiff that the defendant might be ordered to let the plaintiff, with two or more persons present, have a sight of the cloths pawned by Bumpus, which was ordered accordingly; the meaning of which was, and so it was taken by the court, that the plaintiff should thereby be enabled to bring an action at law." The defendant says that this was not an order compelling inspection of the defendant's property, as the title was alleged to be in the plaintiff, and this was not denied. But the title to the clothes was the fact to be determined in the action at law. It might turn out that they belonged to the defendant. Macclesfield v. Davis, 3 Ves. & B. 16, is to the same effect. These cases must be regarded as authorities for the plaintiff in this action. Occasion for the use of the remedy for the discovery of chattels and for their inspection has undoubtedly arisen more frequently in patent cases than in others, but the remedy itself has no special features peculiar to such cases. Their peculiarity consists in the manner of affording relief. "It may be by an interlocutory injunction in the first instance. But much more frequently, unless the case is of the strongest possible kind, it is by merely putting the matter in train for determination of the right at law, and then at the hearing a perpetual injunction is granted, upon the plaintiff succeeding in the action at law." Patent Type Founding Co. v. Walter, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 727, 730. It should be noted in this connection, also, that the same principles govern discovery, whether it be invoked in aid of other issues involved in the suit in equity or be invoked in aid of an action at law. Drake v. Drake, 3 Hare, 525; Lyell v. Kennedy, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 222; Wigram, Discovery, 123. If discovery of personal chattels may be had in the former case, it may be had in the latter. In Bovill v. Moore, 2 Coop. Ch. Cas. 56, Lord Eldon, in 1815, said: "There is no use in this court directing an action to be brought if it does not possess the power to have the action properly tried. The plaintiff has a patent for a machine used in making bobbin lace. The defendant is a manufacturer of that article, and, as the plaintiff alleges, he is making it with a machine constructed upon the principle of the machine protected by the plaintiff's patent. Now, the manufactory of the defendant is carried on in secret. The machine which the defendant uses to make bobbin lace, and which the plaintiff alleges to be a piracy of his invention, is in the defendant's own possession, and no one can have access to it without his permission. The evidence of the piracy at present is the bobbin lace made by the defendant. The witnesses say that the lace must have been manufactured by the plaintiff's machine, or by a machine similar to it in principle. This is obviously, in a great measure, conjecture. No court can be content with evidence of this description. There must be an order that the plaintiff's witnesses shall be permitted before the trial of the action to inspect the defendant's machine, and to see it work." It is true, as the defendants in this case say in their brief, that the order was placed "upon the general doctrine that without such inspection the case could not be properly tried." As has been seen, the remedy for discovery in aid of actions at law was introduced for the very purpose of securing proper trials therein. The application of the remedy to the case was in accordance with the general rule. An action for infringing the patent was brought,—probably by direction of the court after compliance with this order,—and was tried by a jury. Id., 2 Marsh. 211. Broune v. Moore, 3 Bligh, 178 note, was a similar case, in which the plaintiff was permitted to inspect the machine which he alleged infringed his patent. Russell v. Cowley, 1 Webster Patent Cases, 457, was a bill for discovery as to the defendant's infringement of the plain-tiff's patent right for making iron tubing, and for an accounting. The plaintiff's counsel acceded to terms proposed by the other side that an account should be kept, and two persons appointed on each side as inspectors of the defendant's works, for the purpose of giving evidence at the trial of an action at law to be begun forthwith. An order was made accordingly, and an action was thereupon brought, at the trial of which the inspectors testified, giving expert testimony. The defendants questioned the authority of this case on the point under consideration, on the ground that the order of inspection was made with the consent of the parties. Whether the consent was of the nature which the defendants infer it was, is at least doubtful. It may have resulted from a consciousness that the court had power to make the order sought, and may have been given merely to expedite the proceedings. The case is cited as a precedent for the jurisdiction of the court to order an inspection in such cases in Patent Type Founding Co. v. Lloyd, 5 Hurlst. & N. 192. In Morgan v. Seaward, 1 Webster Patent Cases, 167, an order of inspection of paddle wheels and machinery was ordered. Patent Type Founding Co. v. Lloyd was an action at law, in which the plaintiffs claimed to own a patent for type, the novelty being the use of a large proportion of tin, which made the type hard, tough, and enduring. They moved, under 15 & 16 Vict. chap. 83, § 42, for leave to inspect the defendant's type, and, if necessary, to take specimens for analysis, in order that they might produce evidence of the analysis at the trial. The court, being of opinion that the statute did not give them authority to grant an order for specimens, denied the motion. 5 Hurlst. & N. 192. A few days later the plaintiffs filed a bill in equity praying for an injunction, and for liberty to inspect the type and take samples. Liberty was granted,—the parties to make the inspection being named in the order,—and the defendant was ordered to furnish not exceeding 4 ounces of type for analysis. Patent Type Founding Co. v. Walter (the defendant in one of the two actions reported in 5 Hurlst. & N. 192), Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 727.

There is also a line of cases in which an inspection of real estate has been ordered. Lonsdale v. Curwen, 3 Bligh, 168; Walker v. Fletcher, 3 Bligh, 172; United Co. v. Kynaston, 3 Bligh, 153; Atty. Gen. v. Chambers, 12 Beav. 159; Lewis v. Marsh, 8 Hare, 97. In a note to the first-named case, Bligh, the reporter, says: "The practice in courts of equity of granting orders for inspection of mines, machinery, etc., is well settled. But no notice has ever been taken of the point in the books of practice, and no authorities are to be found upon the subject in the reports of cases in equity, except the case in the court below of Kynaston v. East India Co., as reported 3 Swanst. 249, and upon appeal to the House of Lords, now reported in the text, and which case, as it relates to warehouses, is distinct from former authorities, and new in its kind. Two cases of orders for inspection extracted from the register's book are therefore subjoined,"—being Walker v. Fletcher, 3 Bligh, 172, and Broune v. Moore, 3 Bligh, 178, note; the former providing for an inspection of mines, and the latter, as has already been stated, for an inspection of machinery in a case for an infringement of a patent. Story, after speaking of the defect in the administration of justice in courts of common law, arising from their want of power to "compel the production of deeds, books, writings, and other things" material to the issues on trial, says the defect is "remediable in courts of equity, which will compel the production of such books, deeds, writings, and other things." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1484, 1485. See also 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 191. It would seem that these authors had in mind something besides books and documents. One reason suggested by the defendant why these cases do not support the plaintiff's claim is because, as it says in all of them the plaintiffs set up an interest in the property to be inspected. As has already been observed, it is not perceived how this affects the question. The inspection was ordered in each case while the interest was undetermined, and there was no presumption that it would be determined in favor of the plaintiffs. If determined in favor of the defendants, the inspection would in fact be of their property, the same as in the cases cited in which letters and other documents were subjected to inspection. The defendant in United Co. v. Kynaston had no interest whatever in the warehouse for the examination of which he sought an order. The facts of this case, at least, do not support the defendant's contention. It is also to be noticed that none of the cases places the right of discovery upon this circumstance. The right, as in all other cases, depends upon the necessity for discovery in the administration of justice. To warrant discovery, it is not necessary that there should be absolutely no means of proving the plaintiff's case without it. In Bouill v. Moore there were witnesses who would say that the lace made by the defendant was manufactured by the plaintiff's machine, or one constructed on the same principle. The plaintiff had some evidence to sustain his case, but it was not satisfactory. A party may maintain a bill for discovery "either because he has no proof or because he wants it in aid of other proof." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1483; Merwin, Eq. §§ 853, 854: "Where the plaintiff has any case to make out, he has a right to discovery of anything that may assist him in proving his case, or even the smallest tittle of it." Jenkins v. Bushby, 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 400.

The defendant cites three New York cases in support of its contention: Kennedy v. Nichols, 33 Misc. 726, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1053; Ansen v. Tuska, 1 Robt. 663, and Cooke v. Lalance Grojean, Mfg. Co. 29 Hun, 641. In the first case provisions of the Code and of general rules of practice adopted under the authority of the Code, relating to discovery upon a motion in an action at law, are construed, and what is said respecting discovery is based upon Ansen v. Tuska. That was an action at law, in which there was a motion under the Code, by the defendant, for the production of the goods involved in the action, and an inspection of them by persons to be selected by him, to enable them to testify as experts. In denying the motion, the court refers to the equitable remedy of discovery, and says in general terms that there is no authority or principle for discovery, such as was asked for in the case. There is no discussion of the principles, and no authorities are cited relating to the matter. In Cooke v. Lalante Grojean Mfg. Co. the question is disposed of without an examination of authorities. The reasons given for the holding are that a discovery and inspection of the personal property of an adverse party would be a usurpation of authority to search and inspect his private premises, and that discovery of books and documents is discretionary with the court, and is exercised only where the party applying has some right or interest in the books and documents. While the defendant may be compelled to disclose whether he has the article in his possession and control, and, if he has, to produce it for inspection, the procedure is not a search in the sense indicated. It affords no just cause for the fear expressed by the court that "the dwellings of our citizens will be of small security to them if they may be invaded by their enemies, and searched for articles of personal property to be inspected under an order of a court." Neither does the right of discovery of books and documents depend upon the discretion of the court (Wigram, Discovery, 51; Drake v. Drake, 3 Hare, 525), nor upon the party's having some right or interest in them other than as items of testimony in his favor (Wigram, Discovery, 209, 210, 256; Kerr, Discovery, 202; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1490; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 205; Atty. Gen. v. Thompson, 8 Hare, 106; Arnold v. Pawtucket Valley Water Co. 18 R. I. 189, 19 L. R. A. 602, 26 Atl. 55). The slight infringement of the right of property that is involved in an inspection of it under an order of a court of equity is justified by "due process of law" or "the law of the land," and is in no sense a violation of the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures. The origin of the equitable remedy for discovery, and its nature and purpose, lead to the conclusion that it may be employed to compel the production of personal chattels, as well as books, deeds, letters, and other documents, for inspection and examination, in aid of an action at law; and the foregoing cases confirm this conclusion.

The defendant's second objection is because the discovery and inspection are sought for the purpose of having the broken strap examined by persons with a view of enabling them to testify as experts in the action at law. This objection must also be overruled. It is evident that expert testimony may be competent upon the issue to be tried, whether it relate to the form of the strap, the manner of its construction, or the character of the materials from which it was made. The defendant has ample opportunity to procure such testimony. Justice requires that the plaintiff shall also have an opportunity to have the strap examined by persons in whose skill and scientific knowledge she has confidence. There cannot be a fair trial of the case unless such opportunity is given to the plaintiff. Indeed, it may be that she cannot establish her right—if she have one—without having the opportunity. The necessity for it is alleged, and admitted by the demurrer. The object of the plaintiff's bill is the discovery of testimony for use at the trial, but the discovery must necessarily take place prior to the trial. In Marsden v. Panshall, 1 Vern. 407, the suit in equity was begun before the action at law, in order that "the plaintiff should thereby be enabled to bring an action at law." See also Bovill v. Moore, 2 Coop. Ch. Cas. 56; Heathcote v. Fleete, 2 Vern. 442; Morse v. Buckworth, 2 Vern. 443; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1495; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 197. In Russell v. Cowley, 1 Webster, Patent Cases, 457; Patent Type Founding Co. v. Walter, Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 727, 730, and apparently in the other patent cases cited, the inspection was ordered to enable witnesses to give expert testimony at the trial of the actions at law. See also Burrell v. Nicholson, 1 Myl. & K. 680; Arnold v. Pawtucket Valley Water Co. 18 R. I. 189, 19 L. R. A. 602, 26 Atl. 55.

The defendant places much reliance upon its third point, viz., that the equitable remedy for discovery cannot be invoked in aid of an action at law for a personal tort. They do not question, and, in view of the authorities, cannot question, the proposition that discovery may be had in aid of actions of tort relating to property, such as trover, detinue, trespass, waste, etc. East India Co. v. Evans, 1 Vern. 307; Marsden v. Panshall, 1 Vern. 407; Heathcote v. Fleete, 2 Vern. 442; Morse v. Buckworth, 2 Vern. 443; Sloane v. Heatfield, Bunbury, 18; Taylor v. Crompton, Bunbury, 95; Macclesfield v. Davis, 3 Ves. & B. 16; Burrell v. Nicholson, 3 Barn. & Ad. 649, 1 Myl. & K. 680. But it says that a defendant cannot be called upon to implicate himself directly or indirectly in a personal tort, because it would tend to show moral turpitude, and so is inconsistent with principles of natural justice. It is true, as has already been stated, that a person cannot be called upon to furnish testimony in aid of such an action, or any other which tends to show that he has committed a crime or misdemeanor, or that he is liable to a penalty or a forfeiture of property. Testimony of this kind is excepted from the operation of the remedy in deference to the fundamental law that no subject shall be compelled to accuse or furnish evidence against himself in a criminal proceeding. It is said also that this equitable jurisdiction will not be exercised in controversies involving moral turpitude, and arising from acts clearly immoral, even though brought for the purpose of recovering pecuniary compensation. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 197; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1404; Wigram, Discovery, 83; and authorities cited in notes. If this be so, this case is not thereby excluded from the jurisdiction, for, so far as appears, it does not involve moral turpitude or immoral conduct on the part of the defendant. It is charged with negligence, merely, consisting of a failure to perform its implied contractual obligation to provide the plaintiff with suitable machinery for the performance of his duties, or a suitable place in which to work. Although the action at law is in form tort, it is in fact based upon the failure to perform a duty arising from an implied promise. It is as distinguishable in this respect from an action of trespass to the person as an action against a common carrier for the loss of goods in his custody is distinguishable from an action for setting fire to one's house. Morse v. Buckworth, 2 Vern. 443. If the case is excepted from the equitable jurisdiction pertaining to discovery, it must be for some other reason than that a discovery would show moral turpitude or immoral conduct on the part of the defendant; and none has been suggested, excepting an absence of precedents supporting the jurisdiction. The plaintiff cites and relies upon Macaulay v. Shackell, 1 Bligh N. R. 96, as an authority in her favor upon this point. Macaulay brought an action at law against Shackell and others for libel, and the defendants pleaded the truth of the alleged libelous matter, and in aid of their defense filed a bill for discovery and a commission for examining witnesses abroad. Macaulay filed a demurrer to the bill, which was overruled by Lord Eldon, Ch., and Macaulay appealed to the House of Lords, where the judgment of the lord chancellor was affirmed, so far, at least, as it granted a commission for taking testimony abroad. There seems to be a difference of opinion regarding the scope of the decision, some holding that it required Macaulay to answer the bill and make the discovery sought, and others that it only granted a commission to take testimony abroad. See Redfield's note to 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1494. The decision was rendered in 1827, and Mr. Shadwell (presumably Sir Lancelot) was senior counsel for Macaulay. Four years later the case of Wilmot v. Maccabe, 4 Sim. 263, was before Sir Lancelot Shadwell as vice chancellor. This was also a bill for discovery in aid of a defense alleging the truth of the libelous matter with which the party was charged in an action at law. The vice chancellor, referring to Macaulay v. Shackell, said: "Lord Eldon, and the House of Lords on appeal, decided that, where a person brings an action for a libel, it follows, as commensurate with the right to bring the action, that the party who complains is bound to give the discovery which the defendant at law claims to have by his bill." The vice chancellor must have been familiar with the decision in the Macaulay Case, and, if the report of the case leaves a doubt regarding the decision, the statement of the vice chancellor would seem to be sufficient to remove the doubt. In an earlier case of the same 57 L. R. A.

kind (Thorpe v. Macaulay, 5 Madd. 218) the discovery sought was denied on the ground that it would show that the party had committed a misdemeanor, but the vice chancellor, Sir John Leach, used the following language in disposing of the question: "It was next argued that a court of equity would not lend its aid either for discovery or commission to either party in an action at law proceeding ex delicto. . . . No such limitation of the jurisdiction as to discovery is hinted at in any book of practice or by the dictum of any judge. Courts of equity exercise a direct jurisdiction in matters of waste and public nuisance, which are ex delicto. I am not, therefore, prepared to say that a court of equity will refuse its ordinary aid to parties in any action at law proceeding for a civil remedy." This cannot be regarded as authority on the point, but it is worthy of notice in this connection. Chancellor Walworth regarded these same cases as authorities in favor of the right of discovery in actions for libel unless the discovery would tend to incriminate the party or render him infamous. March v. Davison, 9 Paige, 580, 584-586. A dictum of Lord Langdale, M. R. (who, Lord Campbell, in his Lives of the Lord Chancellors, vol. 12, p. 351, says "is without vigor, and has not a judicial mind"), in Glynn v. Houston, 1 Keen, 329, decided in 1836, has added to the doubts regarding the decision in Macaulay v. Shackell. The case was a bill for the discovery of books and documents in aid of an action at law for an assault and false imprisonment. The discovery was denied on the ground that it would incriminate the party called on to make it. The dictum referred to is as follows: "I have looked into the authorities, which tend very much to confirm my opinion that a bill of discovery cannot be sustained in aid of an action for a mere personal tort. If it were necessary expressly to decide this point, I think it is clear what the course of my duty would be; but it is not here necessary; because a bill of discovery cannot be sustained in any case where the matter sought to be discovered may be made the subject of a criminal charge." The defendant says that this is a decision upon the point, but it is apparent that it is far from being such. If it had been necessary to decide the point, it is highly probable that Macaulay v. Shackell and Wilmot v. Maccabe would have been noticed, and either distinguished, overruled, or set right. There is no distinction between libel and assault, as personal torts, which would account for a difference in the application of the doctrine of discovery to them. There are similar dicta, by Cockburn, Ch. J., in Pye v. Butterfield, 5 Best & S. 829, 836, and by Lord Fitz Gerald in Lyell v. Kennedy, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 217, 233. These dicta certainly cannot be regarded as settling the law on the subject. Attention has not been called to any English case in which they have been adopted as the law. The industry of the counsel on both sides in searching for English and American authorities bearing upon the case, manifested by the numerous citations which they have made, justifies a conclusion that no such case exists. Wigram cites Glynn v. Houston three times, but makes no mention of the point in Lord Langdale's dictum. Wigram, Discovery, 5, 81, 85. Kerr says "it seems" that a bill for discovery will not be entertained in aid of an action for a mere personal tort, citing Glynn v. Houston. In the next paragraph he says: "It is no objection that the discovery be sought in aid of actions which sound in tort. Bills may also be brought for discovery in aid of or in defense to actions of trespass and trover; and, in general, there seems to be no civil right the trial of which will not be aided by a bill of discovery." Kerr, Discovery, 6, 7. Evidently Lord Langdale's dictum did not appeal to him as having much weight. One American case has been cited in which the point was decided in favor of the defendant's contention. Robinson v. Craig, 16 Ala. 50. The decision was based solely upon Glynn v. Houston and the absence of authorities the other way. There was no consideration whatever of the principles involved in the question. If the absence of authorities is entitled to any weight, it is, under the circumstances, very slight. Cases for personal torts arising from the action of the defendant,—willful torts, so to speak, — in which the defendant could make discovery without incriminating himself, must, from the nature of the case, be very rare. It is possible that there have been none excepting Macaulay v. Shackell, and cases of like nature that have been decided in accordance therewith without again raising the question. Cases for negligence were not common prior to the middle of the last century. The use of steam and electricity, and the commercial activity consequent thereon, have immensely multiplied cases of this kind. Lord Campbell's act for giving compensation to the families of persons killed by the negligence of others was enacted in 1846. Eight years later a procedure bill was passed, largely through the agency of Lord Campbell (17 & 18 Vict. chap. 125), by which, among other things, it was provided that either party to a civil action in the superior courts "shall be at liberty to apply to the court or a judge for a rule or order for the inspection by the jury, or by himself, or by his witnesses of any real or personal property, the inspection of which may be material to the proper determination of the question in dispute." Id. § 58. In speaking of this act, Lord Campbell says: "It brings about, as far as is now practicable, the fusion of law and equity, and establishes the principle on which our jurisprudence must henceforth be molded, 'one court for one cause,'—i. e., that the court in which the suit commences shall carry it through all its stages, and finally determine it and everything connected with it. Thus, parties will no longer be kept oscillating between law and equity till the subject-matter in controversy is wasted in costs." Lives of the Lord Chancellors, vol. 12, p. 395. In passing, it may be remarked that if the act and the reason of its enactment do not show that its author understood that courts of equity had jurisdiction to order an inspection of real or personal property when such inspection was material to the proper determination of an issue, it certainly shows that he felt there was a necessity for such inspection in the administration of justice. The act relieved parties from the necessity of resorting to equity for discovery, and reasonably accounts for the absence, in England, of bill of discovery in aid of actions at law for negligence since that time. "Cases must arise from time to time which are new cases in specie, but which are not new cases with respect to the general principle by which they must be decided." 1 Bligh N. R. 133; Walker v. Walker, 63 N. H. 321, 56 Am. Rep. 514; Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 162, 9 Atl. 794; Gage v. Gage, 66 N. H. 282, 28 L. R. A. 829, 29 Atl. 543. If Macaulay v. Shackell and Wilmot v. Maccabe are not authorities in favor of the maintenance of the plaintiff's bill, the general principles governing the remedy of discovery certainly justify its maintenance. The case may be a new case in specie, so far as discovery is concerned, but it belongs to a class to which the remedy of discovery is applicable.

It has been suggested that this is a "fishing bill," and should be dismissed for that reason. The plaintiff is not endeavoring to ascertain what defense the defendant contemplates making, nor facts that exclusively relate to the defendant's case, but is seeking discovery of facts that will enable her to prove her case. It is not a fishing bill.

The defendant further says that the statutes of the state removing the disability of parties as witnesses (Pub. Stat. chap. 224, § 13), authorizing the taking of depositions before trial (Id. chap. 225), and giving the court authority to order a view at the trial (Id. chap. 227, § 19), furnish a full, complete, and adequate remedy at law for obtaining the testimony which the plaintiff seeks, and so ousts the court of its equitable jurisdiction. If these statutes have such effect in cases where the testimony sought may be obtained under them, — which is doubtful (Whceler v. Wadleigh, 37 N. H. 55; Howell v. Ashmore, 9 N. J. Eq. 82, 57 Am. Dec. 371; Shotwell v. Smith, 20 N. J. Eq. 81; Union Pass. R. Co. v. Baltimore, 71 Md. 238, 17 Atl. 933; Russell v. Dickeschied, 24 W. Va. 61, 68; Lovell v. Galloway, 17 Beav. 1; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 64), — it does not appear that the plaintiff could obtain, by virtue of them, an inspection of the broken strap prior to the trial. The size and character of the strap are not stated, but it is reasonably certain that a subpoena duces tecum would be powerless to cause its production at the taking of depositions. A view of it at the trial would not answer the requirements of justice, according to the allegations of the bill.

The demurrer should be overruled.
Exceptions sustained.

All concur.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Thomas E. FRENCH, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Thomas ROBB, Exr., etc., of William Oscar Robb, Deceased, Impleaded, etc.

(.....N. J.....)

- *1. In an action of ejectment for land occupied by the defendant, a plea of not guilty admits such possession as excludes the plaintiff.
2. The owner of the soil in a street may maintain ejectment against any person wrongfully taking or claiming exclusive possession of the same.
3. A person occupying part of a street with poles and appliances for lighting the street, in pursuance of a contract made with the municipal authorities under act May 22, 1894 (P. L. p. 477), has such rightful, exclusive possession of the part so occupied as will support a plea of not guilty in an action of ejectment brought by the owner of the soil.
4. But the right of such a person to use the street in the immediate vicinity of his poles and appliances for the purpose of maintaining them is not capable of supporting such a plea.
5. If a person who has rightfully placed poles and wires in a street for the purpose of lighting the street uses them wrongfully for private lighting, he does not thereby lose his right to maintain them as against the owner of the soil.

DIXON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought an action of ejectment in the supreme court against the Delaware & Atlantic Telegraph & Telephone Company, Joseph Q. Williams, receiver of the Franklin Electric Light Company, and Thomas Robb, executor of William P. Robb, deceased, for the possession of a plot of land 5 feet square within the limits of Washington and Jefferson streets in the city of Cape May. The receiver did not plead, but the telegraph company and Robb each pleaded not guilty. At the trial in the Cape May circuit of the issues thus raised the facts appeared as follows: The plaintiff, as owner of the land abutting upon the streets, owned also the locus in quo, subject to the public easement. Under an ordinance and a contract between the city of Cape May and the Franklin Electric Light Company, dated November 30, 1897, and running to July 23, 1902, the company became bound to light the streets of the city with electricity, and to furnish, erect, and maintain all necessary poles, wires, etc.; the location and erection of the appliances in the streets being subject to the approval of the city council. Accordingly a pole was placed about the center of the locus in quo, and wires strung thereon. In June, 1899, the electric company had passed into the hands of a receiver, and, the pole being then in poor condition, the receiver permitted the telegraph company to erect a new pole in its stead, and to string thereon a telephone wire; the pole, however, to be the property of the electric company. Afterwards, by virtue of an order of the court of chancery, the plant of the electric company was turned over by the receiver to the defendant Robb, and when this suit was brought he was carrying out the contract with the city for lighting the streets, and for that purpose he was in possession and use of the pole and some of the wires. Other wires on the pole were used by him for private lighting, and the telegraph company was using its wire for telephone purposes. On this state of facts the trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff against the telegraph company, of which no complaint is now made; and also directed a verdict in favor of Robb for so much of the land as was occupied by the pole, and instructed the jury to find further in his favor for so much of the land around the pole as they should think reasonably necessary to be used in maintaining and taking care of the pole. To such direction and instruction the plaintiff excepted, and, the jury having found Robb not guilty, the plaintiff seeks to reverse the consequent judgment.

Before considering the special aspects of the controversy, it may be helpful to advert to the real nature of an action of ejectment. Originally it was designed to recover only damages for the wrongful ejection of the plaintiff from the possession of land in which he had a term of years. Later the recovery was extended to the possession of the land. To succeed, the plaintiff was required to prove a lease to himself for a term of years, made by a lessor entitled to the possession, and on the land when the lease was made, his entry under the lease, and 57 L. R. A.

oustery by the defendant. The action was usually instituted against a person not interested in the land, called the "casual ejector," who gave notice of the suit to the actual possessor, and he, on application to the court, was substituted as defendant. But, as a condition of such substitution, the court required him to stipulate that at the trial he would confess the lease, entry, and ouster alleged by the plaintiff, thus leaving the only fact to be proved by the plaintiff the title of his lessor. If, however, the claim of the applicant was such as would not warrant him in ousting the plaintiff, and yet would justify his own possession, as if he claimed only as joint tenant with the lessor, then he stipulated to confess ouster of the plaintiff only in case the plaintiff should prove actual ouster of the lessor. If, at the trial, the plaintiff showed such title in his lessor as made the confessed ouster wrongful, or if, when ouster was only conditionally confessed, he showed an actual ouster of the lessor, or a title against which any possession by the defendant was wrongful,—then he recovered damages and possession; otherwise his suit failed. Thus the technical issue in the case was always whether the defendant had wrongfully ousted the plaintiff. Under our statute the technical issue remains the same, although presented by a different procedure. The real claimant, the old lessor, is the plaintiff, and his complaint is that the defendant wrongfully deprives him of possession. The defendant is the real counterclaimant, and if he means to defend absolutely he pleads not guilty, and by that plea admits a possession or claim of title which should exclude or oust the plaintiff; while, if he means to defend only for a possession or claim of title which does not exclude the plaintiff,—e. g., as joint tenant with him,—he must give notice with his plea that he admits the right of the plaintiff to an undivided share of the land and denies actual ouster. Brown v. Combs, 29 N. J. L. 36. Then if, at the trial on the simple plea, the plaintiff shows a title against which the defendant's exclusive possession or claim would be wrongful, or, on the plea and notice, he shows an actual ouster, wrongful in view of his admitted right, or a greater right, which makes the defendant's possession a wrongful ouster, the plaintiff will be entitled to judgment; otherwise not. In the present case, the locus in quo being within the limits of public streets, a preliminary question arises whether the plaintiff, as owner of the soil, has such a right of possession as is capable of supporting the action of ejectment. In Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452, Mr. Justice Thompson urged with much force the negative of this query; but in New Jersey the affirmative must be regarded as settled by the decision of this court reversing the judgment of the supreme court in Wright v. Carter, 27 N. J. L. 70. See State v. Laverack, 34 N. J. L. 207; Burnet v. Crane, 56 N. J. L. 288, 28 Atl. 591. The plea of the defendant Robb is simply not guilty; i. e., that he has a possession or claim which rightly excludes the owner of the soil. It is established by express decision in this state that the public corporation, which represents the public right to the use of streets, may maintain ejectment against any person, even the owner of the soil, who occupies a street in a manner inconsistent with the public use. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. v. Hoboken, 36 N. J. L. 540. From this it logically follows that the owner of the soil cannot maintain ejectment against such public corporation occupying the street within the limits of the public right. This was so adjudged by the Federal Supreme Court in Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452, and Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet. 498, 8 L. ed. 477, cases which are cited with evident approval by Mr. Justice Depue in Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. v. Hoboken, 36 N. J. L. 540. The same exemption from successful attack must be conceded to the agencies through which the public corporation exercises its rights, whether those agencies be designated by employment or by contract; for its rights would be fruitless if they could not be used to protect the individuals through whom they may be lawfully exercised, and without whose intervention the corporation could not enjoy them. One of the rights belonging to the corporation is to occupy the streets with poles and wires for public lighting. This right was expressly conferred by act May 22, 1894 (P. L. 1894, p. 477), according to which it may be exercised either directly by the city itself or indirectly through parties contracting with the city, and is not conditioned upon consent of the owner of the soil. Meyers v. Hudson County Electric Co. 63 N. J. L. 573, 44 Atl. 713. When the contract under which Robb claims was made, this statute was in complete force; and, although "An Act Concerning Townships," approved March 24, 1899 (P. L. 1899, pp. 372, 476), attempts to repeal it, yet, as the title of this act limits its operation to townships, the statute still remains effective in cities. So far, therefore, as Robb occupied the streets with poles and other appliances for public lighting, and thereby excluded the plaintiff, the ouster was not tortious, and a verdict of not guilty was properly directed.

But the defendant pleaded not guilty for the entire locus in quo, and we must consider whether, outside of the space occupied by these appliances for public lighting, he has shown a right to the exclusive possession which his plea sets up. No color of right is shown for maintaining apparatus for private lighting, and as to the wire strung for that purpose the defendant was clearly guilty. The plaintiff urges that the wrongful use of the pole to sustain this wire should be visited with the forfeiture of the entire right; but we find no ground for such contention. Such a judgment would inflict a loss upon the public for the private fault of one of its instruments. The plaintiff does not need such rigor for his protection. So far as the appliances are not used for public purposes, this suit will result in abating them; so far as those required for public purposes have been wrongfully used, the plaintiff can be compensated by an action on the case for damages, and equity will restrain their misuse in the future.

There remains for consideration the defendant's claim to the land around the pole and appliances, found by the jury to be necessary for his use in maintaining them. The right to use that land for such a purpose did not justify the exclusive possession admitted by the plea. It was only the right enjoyed by every member of the community while in actual use of the street. It was discontinuous, and lacked the permanent and exclusive characteristics which are necessary to support or defend an action of ejectment. As a personal right, it was, in essence, like a private right of way, which cannot constitute a defense in an action of ejectment brought by the owner of the soil. Burnet v. Crane, 56 N. J. L. 285, 28 Atl. 591. The proper conduct of the trial at the circuit required a verdict that the defendant Robb was not guilty as to that part of the locus in quo which was actually occupied by the pole and other appliances used for public lighting, and that as to the residue he was guilty.

The present judgment should be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

B. W. HERRING

v.

W. H. ARMWOOD, Appt.

(130 N. C. 177.)

Damage from diminution of yield because of breach of contract to furnish fertilizer to assist in making a crop is not too remote to sustain an action for the breach.

NOTE.—As to damages for failure of crop through breach of warranty that seeds will grow, see, in this series, Shaw v. Smith (Kan.) 11 L. R. A. 681, and Reiger v. Worth Co. (N. C.) 52 L. R. A. 362.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Duplin County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain cotton. Reversed.

Statement by Cook, J.:

This is an action to recover, under claim and delivery proceedings, the possession of 2 bales of cotton, alleged by plaintiff to be his property and to be worth $81, wrongfully withheld by defendant. Defendant denies plaintiff's ownership, and that his withholding possession is unlawful, and alleges that the cotton is worth greatly more than $81; and for a second defense and counterclaim alleges that he rented the farm, upon which the cotton was raised, from plaintiff in August, 1898, under the following written contract: "I, B. W. Herring, do hereby agree to rent my farm to Henry Armwood for the year of 1899 for 5 bales of cotton of the first picking, weighing 500 pounds, or the equivalent in money. I do also agree to dig marl to the amount of 2,000 bushels, more or less, and Henry Armwood agrees to haul the same and scatter on the land,"—and that it was understood and agreed that defendant was to use the marl, which was a valuable fertilizer, upon the crops in lieu of commercial fertilizers, and for the purpose of increasing the yield of the crops of cotton, corn, and other crops, and materially benefit the land, and that it would have increased the yield; that plaintiff failed and refused to dig the marl, and wholly failed to perform his part of the contract in this respect; that he was ready, able, and willing to perform his part of the contract at all times; that by reason of plaintiff's breach of contract he lost greatly in the decrease of the yield of his crops, and time and labor spent upon said land in cultivating said crops, to his damage $150. Plaintiff admitted the written contract, but denied the other allegations set up in the second defense and counterclaim.

Upon the trial his honor submitted the following issues: (1) Is the plaintiff the owner and entitled to the possession of the 2 bales of cotton claimed by plaintiff? (2) Was the property in the possession of the defendant at the time of the seizure? And he refused to submit the following issues tendered by defendant: (1) Was it agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff should dig and furnish 2,000 bushels of marl, more or less, and the defendant should haul the same on the land rented, to be used under the crops of 1899? (2) Did the plaintiff fail and refuse to perform his part of the contract? (3) Was the defendant able, ready, and willing to perform his part of the contract? (4) What damage has defendant sustained? To which defendant excepted. B. W. Herring, the plaintiff, then testified that "the defendant was to pay 5 bales of cotton as rent for the land, and that he had paid only 3 bales. The 2 bales in controversy were raised on the land rented from him by the defendant, and were carried by the defendant to Ruffin Cameron's gin to be ginned. The 2 bales were seized, at Cameron's gin, in this action. The defendant was present when the cotton was seized, and forbade Cameron to deliver it to me, and I forbade Cameron to deliver it to him. I did not agree to dig any marl for the crop of 1899. I wanted the marl dug and used, because I wanted to experiment. It takes twelve months for marl to do much good. The defendant did not use guano. He was to cultivate about 40 acres of land. The marl was on 16 acres of the land he rented in the year 1898. The land on which the marl was, was new ground cleared recently, and 57 L. R. A.

it only had three crops on it." And plaintiff rested. The defendant offered the following evidence, which was objected to by the plaintiff, and excluded. (Defendant excepts.) W. H. Armwood, the defendant, testified: "It was agreed that the 2,000 bushels of marl should be hauled on the crop for 1899. I lived on the plaintiff's land in 1898, and hauled marl on 15 or 16 acres. The crops were increased by the use of the marl 50 to 75 per cent. I hauled the marl from Mr. Dan Lee Flowers.' He had the bed, and furnished Mr. Faison Hicks, Mr. Ab Herring, Andrew Barfield, and others in the neighborhood. My crop was decreased by a failure to use the marl at least 50 per cent. I demanded of the plaintiff to dig the marl, and it was agreed he would dig it in September, 1898, so that I could use it on the crop for 1899." (All evidence of this witness in reference to the marl and its increase upon the crops was objected to by the plaintiff, upon the ground that it was too remote. Objection sustained. Defendant excepted.) 'Dan Lee Flowers testified: "I bargained to sell to the plaintiff 2,000 bushels of marl to be used by the defendant, and the same was to be dug in 1898. I have used marl from my bed for a number of years, and it always increases the production of my crops from 50 to 100 per cent; in other words, I make twice as much the year I use marl upon the same land as I do without it." Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant excepted, and assigned the following as error: (1) For that the court failed to submit an issue as to the value of the property; (2) for that the court erred in refusing to submit the issues tendered by the defendant; (3) for that the court erred in excluding the evidence of defendant, Armwood, and Flowers, tending to show the decreased yield of the crop by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to furnish the marl to be used thereon. Defendant appealed.

Messrs. Stevens, Beasley, & Weeks for appellant.

Messrs. Allen & Dortch for appellee.

Cook, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question involved in this appeal, when stripped of its technical paraphernalia, is whether an action for damages will lie for a breach of contract in failing to furnish fertilizers, whereby the yield of the crop was decreased, because such damage or failure in the yield would be too remote. His honor held in the negative, which we think was error. The rule as stated in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch., on page 353, is as follows: "Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it." This rule is substantially repeated, but more succinctly, by Pearson, J., in Ashe v. De Rossett, 50 N. C. (5 Jones L.) on page 301, 72 Am. Dec. 552, which is quoted verbatim in Spencer v. Hamilton, 113 N. C., on page 50, 18 S. E. 167. Recognizing the fact that the yield of crops is increased by the use of fertilizers, and applying this rule to the case at bar, the conclusion is irresistible that a lessening in the yield would be the natural result of a failure to use the marl, if marl be beneficial to the growth and development of the crops, and that the lessened yield would be incidental to such breach, and therefore plaintiff would be liable. It is common knowledge that the use of manure, manipulated fertilizers, and compost increases the yield of cotton, corn, peanuts, etc., and in some sections are considered absolutely necessary for the production of a profitable yield. It is likewise well known that the use of marl in some sections of the state greatly increases the production. And it appears from the contract set up by defendant, and admitted by plaintiff, that he (the plaintiff), in renting the farm, agreed to dig 2,000 bushels of marl to be hauled and scattered upon the land, and by his failure to do so it is alleged that the yield was greatly lessened. And it seems to have been within the contemplation of both parties that the use of the marl would be beneficial in raising the crops; and, if so, then the failure to use it would necessarily lesssen the yield, which would be the direct result of the breach of the contract in not furnishing it. How much that net additional yield, if any, would have been, according to the usual and natural course of things, was a question of fact to be found by the jury; and by the "net additional yield" we mean its value after deducting its necessary expenses in harvesting, etc., as is held in Spencer v. Hamilton, 113 N. C. 50, 18 S. E. 167. In the case last cited, our court held that the tenant could plead, as a counterclaim for damages, a breach of contract upon the part of the landlord in not draining the land as he had agreed to do, thereby decreasing the yield, in an action brought to recover the rent. So, it must necessarily follow that, if damages be recoverable for a breach of contract which decreased the yield, they can also be recovered for a breach of contract whereby the yield was not increased. It requires the same time, labor, and expense in preparing the land, and in plowing and hoeing crops, upon thin and unimproved land, as it does upon well improved, manured, and fertilized land; and we know that the products of the former are less than those of the latter, according to the usual and natural order of events. The defendant had a right to have the issues tendered by him submitted to the jury; and, if he could sustain them by proper proof, he would be entitled to recover such amount of damages as he might show had been done him by reason of the breach of the contract.

For the error above pointed out, a new trial will be awarded.

RÉSUMÉ OF THE DECISIONS PUBLISHED IN THIS BOOK.

SHOWING the Changes, Progress, and Development of the Law during the First Quarter of the Judicial Year Beginning with October 1, 1903, Classified as Follows:

- I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.
- II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.
- III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.
- IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.
- V. FIDUCIARY AND TRUST RELATIONS.
- VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.
- VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS: WILLS.
- VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.
- IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

A statute making a contract for the construction of a building, in which the contract price is payable with something besides money, so far invalid as to furnish the owner no protection from the claims of subcontractors and materialmen, is held to be an unconstitutional infringement of the owner's right to the possession and enjoyment of his property. (Cal.) 726.

Torrens law.

A statute providing for the Torrens system of registering land titles is held not to be unconstitutional. (Minn.) 297.

Eminent domain.

A statute requiring payment of damages for injuries to a business through the taking of property for public use is held not to be unconstitutional on the ground that taxes cannot be levied for such purpose. (Mass.) 292.

In awarding damage to one, a portion of whose land is sought to be condemned for public use, for injury to his remaining land, it is held that injury to tracts not connected with, and held under different titles from, although adjoining, that from which the parcel is taken, cannot be considered. (C. A. 3d C.) 932.

Public improvements.

The cost of a street improvement is held not to be lawfully assessable against abutting property, where the contractor is required by the ordinance to sustain all loss or damage arising from the nature of the work to be done under the specifications, since this requirement would tend to increase the cost of the work. (Cal.) 213.

Highways.

A person who has rightfully placed poles and wires in a street for the purpose of lighting the street is held not to lose his right to maintain them as against the owner of the soil because he uses them wrongfully for private lighting. (N. J. Err. & App.) 956.

Ordinance as to sidewalks.

An ordinance providing for the construction of a cement sidewalk 20 feet wide on each side of a street, at the expense of the abutting property, is held not to be unreasonable where the locality is one of residence and business, the property is worth from $150 to $300 per front foot, and the existing walks, varying from 6 to 20 feet in width, are in bad condition. (Ill.) 127.

Bicycles.

An ordinance requiring bicycle riders to carry lamps is held not to be unconstitutional as infringing the equal privileges and immunities of bicycle riders because not applying to other silently running vehicles. (Iowa) 243.

Probate judges.

A statute giving the probate judge of one county a salary, and requiring him to account for all fees received, while the judges of all other counties are permitted to retain the fees as their compensation, is held to be in violation of a constitutional provision requiring the general assembly, by a law uniform in its operation, to provide for and regulate the fees of all county officers. (Mo.) 659.

Foreign partnership.

A statute imposing a penalty on agents transacting business within the state for foreign partnerships which have not complied with conditions not required of local partnerships is held to be void as discriminating against such agents in favor of those of local firms. (Vt.) 666.

Foreign insurance companies.

Under a statute requiring insurance commissioners to issue a license to a foreign insurance company to do business in the state, if satisfied with its statement showing its financial condition and standing, it is held that the commissioners have no authority to question the method of computing the reserve set forth in the statement, or to enter upon an independent valuation of such reserve. (Vt.) 374.

Telegraph companies.

A statute rendering telegraph companies liable for mental anguish caused by failure promptly to transmit and deliver a message is held not to deprive them of property without due process of law, or deny them the equal protection of the laws. (S. C.) 607.

A telegraph company is held not to be guilty of maintaining a common nuisance because it delivers, at a place not under its control, which is used and resorted to for selling pools and betting on horse races, to the common nuisance and annoyance of all good citizens in the neighborhood, messages containing the information necessary to such transactions. (Ky.) 614.

Rules of evidence.

A statute making the specification of weights in bills of lading issued by railroad companies for hay, grain, etc., shipped over their lines, conclusive evidence of the correctness of such weights, is held to be unconstitutional. (Kan.) 765.

Removal of garbage.

A city is held to have no right to grant a monopoly to one individual, by contract, to enter upon the private premises of the inhabitants of the city, and at their expense collect and remove those innoxious substances, such as ashes, cinder, and other substances not in themselves nuisances, though if allowed to accumulate they would become such, or which may be utilized for some beneficial purpose. (Neb.) 895.

Food laws.

Prohibiting the sale of dairy products containing any preservative other than salt, sugar, or spirituous liquors in specified cases, or the sale of preservatives for such use, is held to be beyond the power of the legislature, when the use of preservatives is not declared to be an adulteration, and the statute is not aimed at adulteration generally. (N. Y.) 178.

Statutes forbidding the manufacture or sale of any article in imitation of butter or of oleomargarine, which contains any coloring matter, or the sale of any substance not butter, but having the appearance of butter, unless sold under its true name and plainly marked, and requiring that all persons dealing in food shall, upon proper application and tender of price, furnish a sample for analysis, are held to be a proper exercise of the police power. (Ohio) 181.

Taxes.

The exemption of corporations which do not have any special privileges and franchises from the operation of a statute imposing a franchise tax on corporations which do have such franchises or privileges is held not to make the statute unconstitutional for lack of uniformity. (Ky.) 33.

An ad valorem tax upon the franchises of a street railway is held to be required by a constitutional provision which declares that all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations, shall be taxed in proportion to its value. (Ky.) 50.

The deduction from the value of the capital stock of a corporation, in assessing it for taxation, of the total amount of corporate indebtedness except indebtedness for current expenses, is held to be invalid because in violation of the constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity in taxation. (Minn.) 63.

The franchise of an electric light and power company which has a right to use streets and alleys of the city is held to be subject to taxation under laws authorizing in general terms the taxation of real and personal property, although there is no special provision for ascertaining the value of the franchise. (Wash.) 78.

The renting of a church parsonage, and using the rent to procure another residence for the parson, is held not to deprive it of its exemption from taxation, under a provision that exemption of parsonages shall not extend beyond the buildings and premises actually occupied as such. (S. C.) 606.

A tax on all remainders or reversions which vested prior to a certain date, but which shall not come into possession until after the passage of the act, even if it can be regarded as a tax on property, and not on transfers, is held to be invalid as not bearing equally upon the entire class to which the property belongs. (N. Y.) 540.

The privileges and immunities of citizens of other states are held not to be violated by a statute taxing the resident stockholders of certain corporations in the town in which they reside, deducting from the market value of the stock the value of the capital invested in real estate on which the company pays taxes, but imposing a state tax on nonresident shareholders on the market value of their shares, without any provision for deduction of capital invested in real estate. (Conn.) 481.

Local self-government.

The establishment and control of a water supply system is held to be a matter that pertains to the municipality, and the legislature is held to have no power to take the management of the system away from the appointees of the municipality, and vest it in persons for whose selection it provides. (Iowa) 244.

An act creating a board of police commissioners which shall have exclusive control of the police officers of the city, naming the first members of the board, prescribing the manner in which their successors shall be chosen, and setting forth their powers and duties, is held not to be an unconstitutional deprivation of local self-government. (Ga.) 230.

The legislature is held to have no power to fix the salaries of firemen employed by municipalities, although there is no limitation on such power in the Constitution, since that is a matter of local government never delegated to the legislature. (Ky.) 775.

License tax.

The exemption of real-estate dealers and contractors, whose business does not amount to $1,000 per annum, from the operation of an ordinance imposing a license tax for the privilege of transacting business is held to be unconstitutional and void as class legislation, where such contractors and dealers are classified with other persons effecting sales, to whom a similar exemption is not allowed. (Pa.) 348.

The exemption of persons who go from house to house, or place to place, vending their own products, from the payment of a license tax imposed by statute on peddlers, is held not to render the act invalid as in violation of the uniformity clause of the Constitution. (Neb.) 922.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

The validity of a sale of land by a husband to his wife is held to be determined by the law of the state where the land is situated. (La.) 353.

Repudiation of contract.

An intention to repudiate the contract, by a buyer of scrap iron who is to pay for each 100 tons as delivered, justifying a rescission by the seller, is held to be shown where, after receiving 100 tons, he insists on having two or three carloads more delivered before remitting for the 100 tons. (Del.) 225.

Validity; public policy.

An accepted offer to sell or deliver articles at specified prices during a limited time, in such amounts or quantities as the acceptor may want or desire in his business, without any statement of the amount or quantity, is held to be without consideration, and void. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 696.

A contract between a sheriff and his deputy, providing that the deputy as such shall collect all the taxes and do all the work of the sheriff's office in one district, and that he shall have all the fees and commissions allowed by law upon the work done by him, and in consideration thereof shall pay the sheriff $100 a year, is held to be in violation of the state statutes prohibiting the sale or farming of any office under the laws of the state. (W. Va.) 417.

Married woman's contract.

A married woman is held to be liable on her guaranty of a promissory note owned by her and made payable to her order, and the purchaser of such a note is held not to be driven to an inquiry of the purpose to which she intends to devote the proceeds of a sale thereof. (Neb.) 914.

The contract of a married woman as surety on a note is held to be governed by the law of the place where her signature is affixed and the instrument delivered to the payee, although the note is payable in another state, and, as against the makers, has no valid inception until its negotiation in the latter state, if the surety has no knowledge that it is to be negotiated there, or intention that her contract shall be governed by the laws of that state. (N. Y.) 513.

Infant's contract.

An infant is held not to be bound by his warranties in a contract for life insurance. (R. I.) 496.

Insurance.

An insurance company is held not to be able to defeat liability on its policy because of misrepresentations in the application as to the title to the property or the encumbrances thereon, if they were correctly stated to the agent, and he failed to make out the application in accordance with the information given. (Iowa) 328.

An agreement by an applicant for life insurance, that the medical examiner appointed and paid by the insurer shall be the agent of the applicant in recording the medical examination, is held to be prohibited by public policy. (N. Y.) 318.

A policy insuring a railroad company against loss from liability to persons who should accidentally "sustain personal injuries" on its road under circumstances which impose upon the insured a common-law or statutory liability for the injuries is held not to cover cases of instantaneous death without conscious suffering through injuries for which insured is responsible, where the statutes give a new right of action to the personal representatives in case of death, and not a right of action to deceased which survives. (Mass.) 629.

The loss to be made good under a policy of fire insurance is held not to be limited to the cost of replacing the structure described in the survey, if, when the fire occurs, the statutes require, as a condition of rebuilding, more substantial and expensive structural work. (Pa.) 510.

The surrender of an insurance policy to the insurer for its cash value is held not to be a sale which can be disaffirmed by the administrator of the insured, on the ground of the latter's infancy, but to be merely a rescission of the contract. (N. C.) 505.

A life insurance agent is held to have no implied authority to accept as payment of a premium on a policy an agreement to give him credit upon his individual account, which he shall trade out with the insured in the ordinary course of business. (Wis.) 455.

Insurance against loss through liability for personal injuries is held not to constitute a trust fund for the benefit of the injured person, and he is held to have no right to maintain an action against the insurer to reach such fund, where, before his claim against the insured is established, the insurer satisfies its obligation to him under the policy, although by reason of the insolvency of the insured the claim will be otherwise unenforceable. (Mass.) 791.

A clause in a policy of fire insurance requiring the assured to keep the books and inventories of his business securely locked in a fire-proof safe at night and at all times when the building is not actually open for business, is held not to apply to a suspension of business caused by a fire raging in the vicinity and threatening the consumption of the building, the same not being actually shut up, and business operations being interrupted because of the threatened danger. (Ga.) 752.

An insurer which receives an assignment of the mortgagee's claims against the mortgagor upon paying him the amount due by it under its policy on mortgaged property is held to have no right, in an accounting of all sums received from the various policies on the property by the mortgagee, who is seeking to enforce his mortgage for an unpaid balance, to insist that he should be charged with the portion of the sum received under another policy which he is charged to have wrongfully permitted to have gone to the mortgagor, where the amount kept by him out of such payment was more than the share of the mortgage indebtedness chargeable to that policy. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 692.

Banks.

False representations by a defaulting bank president as to his liability to the bank and the value and condition of securities already furnished by him, are held not to be binding upon the bank, so as to enable a person furnishing securities at his request, with knowledge of the purpose for which he intends to use the same, to rely upon such representations as a defense in a subsequent action by the bank to foreclose its lien on such securities. (Neb.) 811.

A depositor who, by negligence in failing to detect forgeries among the vouchers returned by the bank, and to give the bank notice thereof, causes loss to the bank, either by enabling the forger to repeat his fraud, or by depriving the bank of an opportunity to obtain restitution, is held to be responsible for the damage caused by his default. (N. Y.) 529.

The payee of a cashier's check indorsed in payment of chips to be used in gambling may enforce payment thereof against the maker, notwithstanding the check has already been paid to the indorsee, where payment was made to the latter after notice of the invalidity of the consideration for the indorsement. (N. D.) 341.

Bills and notes.

A note given to reimburse a surety on a fidelity bond for what it has been compelled to pay because of the principal's embezzlement, on condition that the surety would not prosecute the principal for the defalcation, is held to be void. (Ala.) 212.

Bonds.

A county treasurer and sureties on his bond are held to be liable for the loss of money by the failure of a bank in which it was deposited for safe keeping, in good faith, in the belief that the bank was solvent. (Neb.) 303.

Bills of lading.

Money paid by the drawee upon a draft drawn against "indorsed bills of lading" which are in fact fictitious, and accepted "against" such bills in ignorance of the fraud, is held to be recoverable from the payee. (C. C. A. 2d C.) 689.

Judicial sales.

Annual crops growing on the land are held not to pass to a purchaser at judicial sale. (Neb.) 920.

An executor offering land for sale at public outcry is held to have the right to withhold. 57 L. R. A.

draw the same at any time before the hammer falls. (Ga.) 784.

Brokers.

Refusal to comply with a contract to purchase real estate, by reason of which the broker who negotiated the sale is deprived of his commission, is held to render the intending purchaser liable for the damages thereby inflicted on the broker, although he had agreed to look to the seller for his commission. (Wash.) 401.

Warehousemen.

The value of wheat stored in a public warehouse at the owner's risk of fire is held not to be recoverable by the owner from the warehouseman in case of a subsequent fire, where the identical wheat stored was sold according to the custom of the warehouseman, known to the owner, to commingle grain so deposited for storage with like quality belonging to him, and from such mass to sell from time to time and replenish with such other grain as should be brought to him for storage or he should buy, and when the warehouse burned it contained enough wheat of the quality stored to replace the same, and the warehouseman had at all times kept on hand sufficient in quantity and quality to replace all wheat stored with him. (Kan.) 287.

For the deterioration of goods while in cold storage the warehouseman is held to be responsible notwithstanding a stipulation, in the receipt issued for the goods, to the effect that he will not be responsible for "damage" to the goods. (La.) 271.

Gas.

A natural gas company having authority to lay its mains in a public street and supply gas to consumers, charging a flat rate by the month, or a certain meter rate per thousand feet, is held to have no right to enforce the latter rate against a single consumer if it makes an unjust discrimination against him. (Ind.) 761.

Principal and agent.

One purchasing a piano from an agent is held to be bound to take notice that, unless it is expressly given, the agent has no authority to take a note for the purchase price payable to himself, and that no title can be acquired to the instrument in exchange for such note, unless the transaction is ratified by the principal, or a custom to take such notes is shown. (Ky.) 451.

Carriers.

A carrier is held not to be obliged to honor a coupon from a commutation book of tickets intended for passage between designated points, and which provide that they are not "good unless detached by the conductor," when the coupon has been detached by the commuter and the book left with a member of his family, so that it is not present when he tenders the coupon in payment of fare. (Md.) 275.

A passenger who leaves his car of his own volition, for some purpose of his own not incident to the journey he is pursuing, and at a place not designed for the discharge of passengers, is held not to be entitled to the protection of a statute making a carrier liable for all personal damage inflicted on a passenger being transported over its road. (Neb.) 890.

An agreement by a passenger, when procuring a mileage ticket at a reduced rate, not to hold the railway company liable for injuries received while riding on freight trains, is held to be unenforceable with respect to such freight trains as are designated by the carrier to carry passengers generally. (Or.) 616.

A carrier's contract limiting liability for loss to a specified amount is held to have no application to the damages to be recovered for its failure to comply with a notice of stoppage in transitu after it had agreed to do so. (N. Y.) 527.

Holidays.

The owner of an option which matures on a holiday is held to have no right to exercise the option on the succeeding day, where the statutes make no provision for the suspension of general business on the holiday. (N. Y.) 173.

Guaranty.

A written guaranty of the salary and expenses of a detective in working up a murder case is held not to continue after conviction of a suspect, and settlement of the bill for services to that time, although the guaranty is not canceled or recalled. (Wyo.) 468.

Landlord and tenant.

Keeping the keys for five days after the expiration of a monthly period, and remaining in possession of the leased property for the purpose of cleaning up rubbish, after the refusal of the landlord to accept the keys at the expiration of the month, are held to render the tenant liable for another month's rent. (Conn.) 222.

A covenant in a lease against assigning or subletting is held not to be violated by placing a care taker in possession during the tenant's absence. (N. Y.) 317.

A tenant is held to have no right to remove fixtures annexed to the freehold, which are placed on leased land, in the absence of a contract giving him the right to do so. (Ga.) 669.

Usury.

Whether or not a loan by a foreign building and loan association to a resident of the state, secured by mortgage on land within the state, is usurious, is held to be determined by the local laws, notwithstanding the notes are payable at the domicile of the corporation, if it has localized its business by establishing boards throughout the state to which payments on loans are to be made. (Miss.) 793.

Where a debtor executes a note and mortgage for a loan of money at a lawful rate of interest, and at its maturity enters into a new contract with the lender for a further extension of the loan, which is tainted with the vice of usury, and the lender by agreement retains the note and mortgage as collateral security to the usurious contract, it is held that, in a suit to enforce the mortgage security, the lender is restricted in his recovery to the amount due on the indebtedness at the time of making the usurious contract, after which all interest is by force of the suit forfeited. (Neb.) 910.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

As to taxation of corporate franchises, and discrimination against foreign corporations, see supra, I.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

As to contracts of married women, see supra, II., infra, VIII.

The validity of a marriage is held to be determined by the law of the place where the marriage is solemnized; and a marriage legal where solemnized is held to be valid everywhere. (Neb.) 155.

Although the beginning of a cohabitation was meretricious, each of the parties having a lawful spouse then living, it is held that there is sufficient evidence of a lawful marriage where, after the obstacles thereto were removed by decree of divorce, the parties continued for a long term of years to live together as husband and wife, and continuously represented themselves to the public as such, and five children were born of the union, whom the parents unitedly represented to the public and caused to be baptized into church as the children of lawful wedlock. (Neb.) 917.

A man who receives property in trust for the support of his wife and children is held to have no right, after mingling the income with his own funds for a period of years, without keeping or stating an account, and making improvements on the trust property, to go back, charge himself with the income received, and credit the account with the costs of the improvements, leaving himself debtor to the beneficiaries, on the theory that it was his personal duty to support his family, for the purpose of preventing his creditors from reaching the improvements. (Va.) 728.

V. FIDUCIARY AND TRUST RELATIONS.

In order to obtain a preference over general creditors of an insolvent trustee, it is held that the cestui que trust must show 57 L. R. A.

that the estate out of which he claims such preference has been increased to some extent by the misappropriation of trust property, and he is held to be entitled to a preference to the extent of such increase only. (Neb.) 885.

(TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.)

The title of land sold and deeded by a guardian to her husband is held not to pass to a purchaser who has notice of their relationship; and ejectment for its recovery is held to be maintainable by the ward. (Kan.) 575.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

A bank falsely certifying that an insurance company has its authorized capital on deposit, for the purpose of inducing the insurance commissioner to grant it a license, is held to be liable to persons who are damaged by the purchase of the stock in reliance thereon. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 108.

Vacation or obstruction of street.

Damages for injury to property by discontinuing a portion of the street on which it is situated, so that traffic is diverted from it, trade diminished, and its value lessened, although access to it still exists by a longer route, are held not to be recoverable under a statute providing for the payment of damages sustained by the discontinuance of a highway. (N. H.) 282.

One whose property is cut off from access to markets, and from communication with his fellow men, by neglect of the county commissioners to keep the highway leading to it in repair, is held to suffer a special injury which will entitle him to maintain an action against the commissioners. (Md.) 279.

The permanent obstruction of a street within 200 feet of the property of an abutting owner, cutting him off from his usual and only direct access to the business portion of the town, thereby depreciating the value of his property, is held to inflict special injury on him, for which he may recover damages. (Ind.) 508.

Liability of municipal corporations.

The operation of a stone-crushing machine to prepare material for constructing and repairing its highways is held to be a governmental act of a municipality, so that it will be exempt from liability for injury to an employee through a defect in the machine, although the machine is located several miles from the place where the material is to be used. (Conn.) 218.

The mere fact of an explosion of gas in a sewer is held not to be sufficient to charge the municipality with liability for the injury caused thereby. (Mo.) 136.

An unorganized assemblage of merry-makers to the number of 1,000 in the main street of a city, exploding fireworks, obstructing the use of the street, and endangering life and property, is held to be a "riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people," within the meaning of a statute making the municipality liable for injuries done by such an assemblage. (Ky.) 130.

Injury to servants.

Injury received by a young man seventeen years old while helping brakemen, at their request, to load a piano, is held to be within the rule which exempts the master from liability to one who is injured while helping his servants, at their request, by reason of their negligence. (Ky.) 266.

The negligent act of a foreman with general control and authority to employ and discharge workmen, in ordering a subworkman upon an elevator, and himself operating the elevator with negligence, to the workman's injury, is held not to be the act of a fellow servant, but of a vice principal. (Neb.) 147.

The duty of using a fender provided by the owner of a vessel to aid in docking it is held not to rest upon him, and he is therefore held not to be liable for injuries to an employee resulting from the neglect of the mate to use it in bringing the vessel into the dock, although the injured employee works under the immediate orders of the mate. (Conn.) 494.

The death of a servant, caused by criminal violence of a mob of strikers, is held to impose no liability on the master, under a statute making him liable for death resulting from injuries inflicted by his negligence or wrongful act. (Ky.) 447.

Using a switch engine without a handhold on the tender is held not to constitute an assumption of the risk of such defect by the employee, where the statute makes railroad companies liable for injuries to employees from "any defect in the machinery, ways, or appliances," and makes void any agreement to waive the benefit of the statute. (N. C.) 817.

A servant having authority to direct and control others is held to be a vice principal of the master, for whose negligence the master is liable, although he is not engaged in performing the absolute duties of the master, when he commits a negligent act causing injury to one under his control, and is not actually engaged in exercising his power of superintendence over the injured servant, under a statute making all servants who have authority to direct and superintend other servants vice principals of the master. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 707.

A railroad company running its trains over another road by permission is held to be liable to its employees for the negligence of the servants of the licensing corporation in the discharge of the absolute duties of the master, but not to be liable for their negligence in discharge of their duties as servants. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 712.

Injury to passengers.

A carrier is held to be liable for nervous shock to a passenger, resulting from a jar to the nervous system which accompanies a blow to the person, caused by being thrown from the seat through the carrier's negligence; and it is held not to be necessary to show that the shock is the consequence of the blow. (Mass.) 291.

The voluntary exposure of the body beyond the sides of a moving train, by a passenger riding on the platform, is held to be such negligence as will preclude recovery for his death, caused by coming in contact with an iron post near the track. (Minn.) 639.

Injury to a passenger by reason of the unsafe condition of the depot premises, which the passenger must use to reach his train, is held to render the carrier liable, notwithstanding the fact that the premises are used by, and are in possession of, a union depot company or its receiver, with whom the railroad company contracts for terminal facilities. (Wash.) 390.

One who enters and rides upon a train which he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could know, is prohibited from carrying passengers, is held to be a trespasser, and not a passenger; and the only duty of the railroad company toward him is held to be to abstain from wanton or reckless injury to him. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 700.

Railroads.

A railroad company operating a portion of its railroad bridge as a toll bridge for travelers with horses is held to be under a duty to keep a lookout for the purpose of discovering whether or not teams on the bridge have become so frightened by trains also on it as to become unmanageable and dangerous. (Ky.) 781.

Elevated railroads.

The owner of an apartment house is held to have no right to recover damages from an electric elevated railroad company whose tracks cross the highway within 19 feet of his property, where the injury differs from that suffered by the general public only in the proximity of the tracks. (Ill.) 237.

Street railways.

The removal, by a street railway company, of snow from its tracks to the adjacent roadway in such a manner as to leave a deep ditch and render the street unsafe and dangerous for public travel, is held to render the company liable for injuries to travelers caused thereby. (Wis.) 465.

Turntables.

A railroad company is held to be liable to infants of tender years for injuries inflicted by a turntable maintained by it in an unfenced lot so near a public way as to be likely to attract children to play on it, unless it exercises reasonable care to have it safely fastened. (Iowa) 561.

Explosion of boiler.

Liability for damages to a neighbor, caused by the explosion of a steam boiler, is held not to arise where one places the boiler upon his premises, and operates it in a lawful business, with care and skill. (W. Va.) 410.

Falling walls.

The owner of walls left standing after the destruction of the building by fire is held to be under no obligation to adjoining property owners to remove or protect the walls, until he has had a reasonable time to make necessary investigation and take such precautions as are required. (Mass.) 132.

Libel.

A communication transmitted by a commercial agency, that a certain person had made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, when the information received by it was that he had made an assignment to secure the indorser of a note, is held not to be privileged as a matter of law. (C. C. A. 1st C.) 475.

Fright.

One frightening a woman so as to cause nervous prostration, by stealthily entering her home in the night-time and committing a trespass on her husband's property, is held to be liable to her in damages therefor. (Iowa) 559.

Injury by horse.

From the fact that a quiet, gentle horse was left standing untied in the public street, free from the presence of anything which might frighten or disturb him, it appearing that the driver had been accustomed to use the horse in that way for many years without an accident, it is held that no inference can arise that the act was negligent. (N. J. Err. & App.) 627.

Druggists.

One who by mistake sells to a person a poisonous drug for a harmless medicine is held to be liable to a third person who without negligence takes the drug for medicine, for damages resulting to him therefrom. (W. Va.) 428.

Ice on sidewalk.

A landlord is held not to be liable for injury received by a person from falling on ice which had been allowed by the tenant to accumulate and remain on a sidewalk abutting the rented premises, although the ice resulted from water flowing from the landlord's property through a ditch placed there by the landlord for the purpose of carrying off the refuse water across the sidewalk. (Ga.) 749.

Negligence of infants.

Negligence of an infant in performance of his contract to thresh grain, which results in the destruction of the grain and the shed covering it by fire set by sparks from the engine, is held not to render him liable for the loss. (Tenn.) 673.

Dangerous premises.

The liability of one who by express invitation induces a person to make use of a portion of premises for an expressed purpose is held to be confined within the limits of the invitation, and not to extend to injuries received by the person invited while using the premises for a purpose not expressed, and not authorized by the invitation. (N. J. Err. & App.) 307.

A boy six years old, knowing that hot water will burn, is held to have no right to recover damages for injuries received from voluntarily or carelessly walking into a pool of it formed by emptying a boiler on premises upon which he is trespassing. (Ark.) 724.

Fraudulent conveyance.

A wife who takes a conveyance of property from her husband with knowledge that he intends thereby to hinder and defraud his creditors, and who, in order to procure a loan to herself, conveys the property as security to one ignorant of the fraud, is held to be personally liable to a judgment creditor of her husband for the amount of the loan, or a sufficiency thereof to satisfy such judgment, although the property was conveyed to her in payment of an alleged debt due her by her husband. (Ga.) 754.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; WILLS.

The vendor's interest in a partially performed contract to purchase land of which the vendee has been put in possession is held to pass to his personal representative on his death, and not to be subject to execution for the debts of his heir. (Mich.) 643.

Revocation of license.

The revocation of a parol license to construct a dam and ditch on the land of the licensor is held not to be prevented by the fact that large expenditures had been made on the faith of it, or that it was given with knowledge that such expenditures would be made. (Ala.) 720.

Fixtures.

Heating apparatus bought by a man under a contract reserving title to the seller, and permanently placed in a building owned by himself and his wife by entirety, is held not to become a fixture so as to prevent its removal for nonpayment of the purchase money, if removal will not materially injure it or the building. (Mich.) 632.

Partition.

Including the husband as grantee in a deed to partition to the wife her share of property in which she has an undivided interest is held to give him no greater interest than though the deed had been to the wife alone. (Tenn.) 332.

Wills.

Revocation of a will is held to be effected by adopting its mutilation as such. (N. C.) 209.

The negligent placing of a will so that its existence is not known for several years after testator's death, and the laches of the devisee in not producing it, are held not to estop him from asserting his claim against one who has acquired title from the heir, at any time before the right to probate or register the will is barred. (Ky.) 253.

The widow of a beneficiary is held not to be entitled to share under a will directing that, in case of the death of a beneficiary before the time for distribution arrives, his share shall be paid over to his next of kin, as, according to the statute of distributions, his personal estate would be divided and distributed. (N. Y.) 536.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.

A judgment for plaintiff in an action for injury to his vehicle through negligent obstruction of a highway is held to be no bar to another action for injury to his person, arising out of the same accident. (N. Y.) 176.

For the purpose of determining the proper recipient of a pension due the widow of a deceased person, it is held that the court will inquire into the validity of a divorce which he had obtained. (Iowa) 583.

Damage from diminution of yield because of breach of contract to furnish fertilizer to assist in making a crop is held not to be too remote to sustain an action for the breach. (N. C.) 958.

Limitation of actions.

The fact that a mortgage is given to secure payment of an entire sum which is payable in instalments is held not to prevent the running of the statute of limitations against each instalment as it becomes due. (Wash.) 396.

Estoppel.

The owner of a piano who leases it to a retail dealer in musical instruments is held not to be estopped to claim it from one who first hired and then purchased it from the retail dealer, who held it only under a lease providing that it should be kept in the purchaser's house, although the lessor failed to notify such purchaser of his claim to the instrument for nearly two years, during which time the latter bought and paid for 57 L. R. A.

it, believing it to belong to the retail dealer. (Mass.) 289.

The enforcement of taxes against property by a city is held not to be restrainable by injunction, on the ground of equitable estoppel, because the city treasurer erroneously marked taxes paid on the tax records, and a third party, relying on the record and believing the taxes were paid, loaned money on the property and acquired title thereto by foreclosure. (Neb.) 150.

Garnishment.

The right to garnish a debtor is held not to be limited to the situs of the chose in action; and the garnishment, by a citizen of one state, of a debtor of the same state, whose creditor resides, and whose debt was contracted and is payable, in another state, is held to be such an attachment of the chose in action as will authorize the court to obtain jurisdiction to dispose of it by publication of the summons against the defendant. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 120.

Injunction.

A combination of mercantile dealers to compel another dealing in similar goods to sell at prices fixed by it, or, upon his refusal to do so, to prevent those of whom its members are purchasing customers from selling goods to him, is held to be void; and an injunction is held to be properly granted to restrain the members of such combination from carrying into effect their purpose. (Ga.) 547.

The maintenance of a tower by a land-owner on his land in such a way that ice formed on it, from freezing rain or spray from a cataract, falls on to adjoining property so as to injure it and endanger human life, is held to be properly enjoined. (N. Y.) 545.

Specific performance.

In case of an agreement to convey an interest in land to one for services in securing the location of a railroad depot thereon, it is held that specific performance will not be enforced where the grantee has agreed to divide with certain officials of the road all money received by him from sales of land during the construction of the road. (Wash.) 404.

Evidence.

A declaration by a motorman running an electric car, in regard to the cause of the accident, made while the car was still on the body of a child whom it had run down, is held to be admissible in evidence as a part of the res gesta, in an action for the injury. (W. Va.) 186.

A presumption of negligence on the part of an electric company is held to arise when injury results to a traveler in a public street from one of its live wires, which has broken and is hanging so near the ground as to be within reach therefrom. (Or.) 619.

Proof that an electric-light wire controlled by a private corporation, and normally suspended upon poles along a public street, was trailing broken on the sidewalk, is held to afford a presumption of negligence, in a suit against such corporation by a person injured through electric shock by coming in contact with such wire. (N. J. Err. & App.) 624.

The admission of testimony of physicians appointed by the court to examine plaintiff in an action for negligent injuries, as to the result of an examination made after defendant's motion for such examination was withdrawn, is held to be erroneous. (Ky.) 875.

Discovery.

The production of broken machinery is held to be compellable for examination by persons intending to testify as experts in an action at law for personal injuries caused by its breaking. (N. H.) 949.

Equity.

In case of a conveyance by an aged parent to his son to secure support for himself for the remainder of his life, and the failure of the son to comply with his agreement, rendering impossible of realization the purpose of the grantor, it is held that if the grantor elects to rescind the transaction a court of equity will take jurisdiction to give a protective remedy to him by establishing his status as owner of the property. (Wis.) 458.

A suit in equity to reach assets included in a general assignment for creditors, and also included within the terms of prior deeds of trust purporting to cover such assets as after-acquired property of the debtor, is held not to be maintainable by an 57 L. R. A.

execution creditor who had levied on the property before possession was taken by the assignee, on the ground that the deeds of trust were void as to such property. (W. Va.) 869.

Subrogation.

One who furnishes money for the purpose of discharging a mortgage lien upon real estate is held to have no right to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, in the absence of an agreement or understanding that the mortgage is to be kept alive for his benefit, or that he shall be given a lien on the premises in lieu of the one which has been discharged. (Neb.) 901.

Execution.

The interest of the assured in a twenty-year distribution policy of insurance on his life, which will cease on his failure to pay premiums, is held not to be an estate within the meaning of a statute making an execution a lien, from the time it is placed in the hands of the officer, on all the personal estate of or to which the judgment debtor is, or may afterwards and before the return date of the writ become, entitled. (Va.) 380.

A bicycle used by a painter, paper hanger, and billposter to earn a livelihood is held to be within the provisions of a statute exempting from execution the team of a laborer who is the head of a family, and the wagon or other vehicle, by the use of which he earns his living, although the bicycle was not known when the statute was enacted. (Iowa.) 764.

An equitable life estate created by a wife in favor of her husband, which shall be free from the debts of the beneficiary, is held to be void where the statute provides that estates of every kind, holden or possessed in trust shall be subject to debts and charges of the persons for whose benefit they are holden, as they would be if those persons owned the like interest in the things holden or possessed, as in the uses or trusts thereof. (Va.) 384.

Damages.

The measure of damages for breach of warranty of the capacity of a kiln for drying lumber, when there is no kiln of the agreed capacity on the market, is held not to be the difference between the value of the kiln sold and one of the required capacity, but the difference between the value of the apparatus delivered and the contract price. (N. C.) 193.

Damages for the death of the child are held not to be allowable in an action by husband and wife for the physician's abandonment of the wife during her confinement. (Cal.) 215.

Damages for mental anguish caused by breach by a telegraph company of its contract to transmit money promptly are held not to be recoverable. (Ky.) 611.

Substantial damages are held to be recoverable for breach of a contract to transmit promptly a telegram which the company knew to be addressed to a physician directing him to come to the sender's house at once. (Neb.) 905.

RÉSUMÉ OF DECISIONS.
(CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.)

In assessing the damages against a carrier for breach of its contract to transport a corpse, it is held that mental suffering may be considered. (Ky.) 771.

The liability of a municipality to damages for permitting a drainage ditch to become obstructed and filled with filth and offal, so that the water flows onto adjoining land and causes sickness in the family of its owner, is held to be limited to the injury to the property, and not to include injury by sickness or death, or by loss of time, etc., resulting from sickness. (N. C.) 207.

In an action of tort, if it be impossible, in the nature of the case, to distinguish between the damage arising from the actionable injury, and damage which has another origin, it is held that the jury should be left to make from the evidence the best estimate in their power as reasonable men, and award to the plaintiff compensatory damages for the actionable injury. (N. J.) 309.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

The adoption of a new Constitution reserving the right of trial by jury "as heretofore enjoyed" is held not to include the right, which had existed by statute for many years, of having the jury assess the punishment in criminal cases whenever there is an alternative or discretion in regard to it. (Mo.) 846.

The granting of a reprieve and the fixing of a date for the execution of a convicted criminal is held to be by the common law a judicial power, and not to be exercised by the governor except in so far as it is expressly permitted by the Constitution. (N. J. L.) 312.

In case of a conviction of selling intoxicating liquors without a license in violation of a statute forbidding such sale, and providing that the punishment therefor shall be a fine and, at the discretion of the court, imprisonment in the county jail, it is held that the court has no power, in addition to imposing a fine and costs, to require of the defendant sureties for good behavior. (W. Va.) 426.

The carrying of deadly weapons, being an offense fully provided for and punished by state law, it is held to be beyond the power of a municipal corporation to make it an offense punishable under a city ordinance, unless such power is expressly conveyed by the municipal charter. (W. Va.) 413.

Forgery.

To add to a canceled check the words "in full of account to date," with intent to alter its effect as a receipt, is held to constitute forgery. (Va.) 744.

Jeopardy.

One accused of a capital offense is held

not to have been in jeopardy, so as to bar a subsequent trial, where, after the jury had been impaneled and the trial begun, the judge discharged them after ascertaining, by independent investigation, that some of them were so prejudiced in favor of the accused as to be incompetent, and had endeavored to prejudice other jurors, belittled the state's evidence, procured the intoxication of the bailiff, and obtained communication with persons not jurors. (Mich.) 808.

Robbery.

Grabbing a purse from one's hand so quickly that he has no opportunity to resist is held to involve sufficient force to constitute robbery. (Ky.) 432.

Self-incrimination.

Merely exempting a witness in a criminal case from liability to have his testimony used against him in case he is subsequently prosecuted for an offense to which it relates is held not to be sufficient to prevent his claiming the protection of a constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in any criminal case. (Mo.) 654.

Extradition.

A prisoner charged with violation of the Federal laws, who is transferred from one state to another for trial under process from a Federal court, is held to be properly turned over to the authorities of the latter state for trial upon a charge of violation of its laws, without being afforded an opportunity to return to the former state. (Mich.) 295.

of the appellate court to the court in banc on motion of the losing party when a judge dissents from the opinion applies in favor of the state; and the rule that in such cases the state is not entitled to a review of a judgment of the trial court, except in special cases allowed by statute, is not applicable. State v. Hamey (Mo.) 846

975

Assignments of error.

2. An assignment of error upon the refusal of the court to allow a witness to answer a specified question propounded by the party calling him is not properly made unless it states what evidence was thus sought to be elicited, and that the court was informed thereof at the time of the ruling. Bigby v. Warnock (Ga.) 754

Bill of exceptions.

3. In the absence of a bill of exceptions the findings of the trial court on a question of fact will not be reviewed. University of Michigan v. McGuckin (Neb.) 917

4. The statement of facts in a bill of exceptions is conclusive in an appellate court, unless it is excepted to and the exceptions are recorded in the bill when it is settled. Purple v. Union P. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 700

Exceptions.

5. An exception covering several distinct propositions of the charge to the jury is insufficient if either proposition is correct. Hindman v. First Nat. Bank (C. C. App. 6th C.) 108

6. An exception "to the court's measure of damages" is sufficient if the charge on the measure of damages constitutes a single subject, and the circumstances are such that the judge could not have misapprehended the scope of the exception. Id.

7. Preserving an exception to the refusal by the trial court of a peremptory instruction to find for defendant on the whole evidence requires the appellate court to review the evidence as a whole. Fuchs v. St. Louis (Mo.) 136

Hearing and determination.

8. A defendant in a criminal case cannot complain of error in the admission of evidence which he himself draws out. State v. Hamey (Mo.) 846

9. Objections to the form of hypothetical questions addressed to expert witnesses must be made in the trial court. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Church (Neb.) 905

10. Objection to the overruling of a demurrer to plaintiff's evidence is waived by the introduction of evidence on behalf of defendant. Fuchs v. St. Louis (Mo.) 136

11. The question whether or not a petition to recover damages for injuries to the person and for wrongful death, to which a demurrer was sustained, states a cause of action, may be reviewed on appeal, although the causes of action were improperly joined, where no motion to require plaintiff to elect on which he would proceed was made. Foreman v. Taylor Coal Co. (Ky.) 447

12. Defects in a motion for a new trial, caused by the failure to properly assign error upon the rulings of which complaint is made, cannot be cured by setting out in the bill of exceptions the various grounds of the motion, and specifically assigning error upon the overruling of each ground. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Schwartz (Ga.) 752

Grounds for reversal.

13. Error without prejudice is no ground for reversal. Southern P. Co. v. Schoer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 707

14. The admission of testimony of physicians appointed by the court to examine plaintiff in an action for negligent injuries, as to the result of an examination made after defendant's motion for such examination was withdrawn, is erroneous. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Stroh (Ky.) 875

15. The rejection of evidence that a car in which goods were shipped was sealed at the loading point and remained under seal until the delivery of the goods to the consignee is error, where the issue is whether the railroad company delivered to the consignee all the goods it received. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simonson (Kan.) 765

16. Remarks by the court in the presence of the jury, in a colloquy with counsel as to the propriety of submitting a special finding, will not require reversal because they indicate the court's opinion upon the defense of contributory negligence, if the jury have been fully instructed on that question, and the remarks are not intended for their guidance, and do not prejudice defendant's case. Boyd v. Portland General Electric Co. (Or.) 619

17. The court's telling the jury the legal effect of their answers to questions submitted to them for a special verdict is ground for reversal. Gerrard v. La Crosse City R. Co. (Wis.) 465

18. An instruction in an action for personal injuries, that defendant's answer denied the lameness of plaintiff, is prejudicial error, where the answer really denied that the lameness was caused by defendant, and by the means alleged, and there was evidence tending to show a previously existing lameness. Swift v. Bleise (Neb.) 147

19. The refusal of an instruction in an action for personal injuries, to the effect that defendant was not responsible for damage caused by want of reasonable care on plaintiff's part after the alleged injury, is erroneous, where evidence has been admitted, without objection, tending to show that plaintiff's condition, expense, and suffering were in part due to his failure to exercise reasonable care after the hurt was received. Id.

20. Insufficient finding upon certain issues in the case does not require reversal unless the finding of those issues in favor of appellant would entitle him to a judgment. Blochman v. Spreckels (Cal.) 213

Judgment.

21. A judgment in plaintiff's favor on his appeal from an involuntary nonsuit granted at the close of his evidence is not conclusive on an appeal by defendant from a judgment in plaintiff's favor at the close of all the evidence, which differs in many essential particulars from that introduced at the first trial. Fuchs v. St. Louis (Mo.) 136

22. A verdict for an entire sum to be awarded to a man and wife for injury to her by a physician's abandonment of her during confinement will be set aside if the court's instructions authorized a consideration of the fact of the child's death in fixing the damages. Lathrope v. Flood (Cal.) 215

1. Storage charges may be recovered, although the goods stored are damaged through the negligence of the storer, where 57 L. R. A.

he has been compelled to make good the loss by paying damages. Marks v. New Orleans Cold Storage Co. (La.) 271

2. The owner of a cold-storage warehouse may retain possession of goods stored until the storage charges are paid; and the amount due for storage cannot be compensated by an unliquidated claim for damages suffered by the goods. Id.

3. A cold-storage company may by contract limit its liability, provided such limitation does not contravene rules and laws enacted on grounds of public policy; but the limited liability clause should be specific, and include in its terms all damages and acts for which the cold storer does not hold himself responsible. Id.

4. The undertaking of the owner of a cold-storage warehouse being to preserve goods liable to undergo or actually undergoing deterioration through the development in them of insect life, it is not necessary, in order to recover against him for damage to goods, to prove more than that the goods, when delivered into his cold storage, were, according to the usual and ordinary test of commerce, sound. Id.

5. For the deterioration of goods while in cold storage the cold storer is responsible, notwithstanding that in the heading of the receipt issued for the goods there is printed a limited-liability clause to the effect that goods are not examined when received, and therefore the warehouseman will not be responsible for the contents or damage, or for leakage, depreciation, or damage by rats. Id.

6. While the holder of a warehouse receipt is entitled to delivery of the property stored, upon tender of payment of charges on the particular property for which the receipt calls, under La. act No. 156 of 1886, and payment of charges on other property which has been withdrawn cannot be required as a condition of delivery, there must be an actual tender, in due form, of the charges, in order to enable the holder of the receipt to recover damages for delay in not delivering the goods. Id.

1. A statement by the cashier of a bank to one inquiring into the condition of one of its corporation customers, dividing its deposit into capital and surplus, is binding on the bank. Hindman v. First Nat. Bank (C. C. App. 6th C.) 108

2. A bank is liable for the act of its cashier in falsely certifying that the capital of an insurance company is all paid in and on deposit in the bank, if made in the general course of the bank's business from facts supposed to be known to him, although the giving of such a certificate is ultra vires the bank, if it is not sufficiently so to carry notice to all of its ultra vires character. Id.

3. A bank falsely certifying that an insurance company has its authorized capital on deposit, for the purpose of inducing the insurance commissioner to grant it a license, is liable to persons who are damaged by the purchase of the stock in reliance thereon, if it is intended for the information of all who shall be disposed to deal in the company's stock, or to one who, desiring to purchase stock, applies to the bank for information and is referred to the certificate, and who purchases in reliance thereon. Id.

4. A bank examiner who takes charge of the assets of a national bank under the directions of the comptroller is not the agent for the bank in such negotiations as it may be permitted to enter into with a view to the resumption of business. Teumseh Nat. Bank v. Chamberlain Bkg. House (Neb.) 811

5. Statements by a bank examiner who takes charge of the assets of a national bank under the direction of the comptroller, as to the liabilities of, and the value and condition of securities already furnished by, a defaulting officer of such bank, who, for the purpose of replenishing its assets and enabling it to resume business, is allowed to furnish collateral securities for his indorsements upon paper previously sold by him to the bank,—are not binding upon the bank; and one who furnishes collateral securities to such defaulting officer, to be so used by him, cannot rely upon such representations of the examiner as a defense in an action by the bank to foreclose its lien upon such securities. Id.

6. False representations by a defaulting bank president as to his liability to the bank and the value and condition of securities already furnished by him are not binding upon the bank, so as to enable a person furnishing securities at his request, with knowledge of the purpose for which he intends to use the same, to rely upon such representations as a defense in a subsequent action by the bank to foreclose its lien upon such securities. Id.

Cashier's check.

See also CHECKS.

7. A cashier's check, being merely a bill of exchange drawn by a bank upon itself, and accepted in advance by the act of its issuance, is not subject to countermand like an ordinary check; and the relations of the parties to such an instrument are analogous to those of the parties to a negotiable promissory note payable on demand. Drinkall v. Movius State Bank (N. D.) 341

8. The payee of a cashier's check indorsed in payment of chips to be used in gambling may enforce payment thereof against the maker, notwithstanding the check has already been paid to the indorsee, where payment was made to the latter after notice of the invalidity of the consideration for the indorsement. Id.

9. A bank has sufficient notice of the invalidity of an indorsement on a cashier's check to render it liable for paying it to the indorsee, where it knows that the latter is the keeper of a gambling establishment, and he presents the check the day after it is drawn, before the regular hour for opening the bank, and the indorser is present at the time, and repeatedly protests against the payment of the check and demands its cancellation. Id.

Forged checks.

See also EVIDENCE, 17; NOTICE, 3.

10. The drawer of a check is not bound to prepare it so that no one else can successfully tamper with it, to charge the bank with the loss in case it pays it after its amount has been fraudulently raised. Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 529

11. The drawer of a check owes no duty to detect a fraudulent alteration of it, to a bank in which it is deposited for collection, and to which the proceeds are paid by the drawee. Id.

12. By failing to discover forgeries among the vouchers returned by the bank on balancing the depositor's account, and to notify the bank thereof, the depositor does not adopt the checks as genuine, ratify their payment, or estop himself from asserting that they are forgeries. Id.

13. A depositor who, by negligence in failing to detect forgeries among the vouchers returned by the bank, and give the bank notice thereof, causes loss to the bank, either by enabling the forger to repeat his fraud, or by depriving the bank of an opportunity to obtain restitution, will be responsible for the damage caused by his default. Id.

14. A depositor owes the bank the duty to exercise reasonable care to verify the vouchers returned by the bank on balancing the account by the record of issued checks, if he has kept one. Id.

15. Whether or not the drawer of a check was negligent in signing it in the condition in which it was prepared is a question of fact to be determined largely by an inspection of the check itself. Id.

16. A bank which pays to a clerk of the drawer a plainly altered check without requiring an explanation of the alteration from his employer cannot throw the loss occasioned by subsequent payment of a series of such checks upon the employer, on the ground that he negligently failed to detect the frauds when the vouchers were returned to him. Of passengers.

See also EVIDENCE, 10.

1. A railroad company is not relieved from liability for injury to its passenger by reason of the unsafe condition of the depot premises which the passenger must use to reach its trains, by the fact that the premises are used by, and in possession of, a union depot company or its receiver, with whom the railroad company contracts for terminal facilities. Herrman v. Great Northern R. Co. (Wash.) 390

2. While it is the absolute duty of a railway carrier of passengers to provide a safe and secure place for its patrons to ride within its cars, when such duty is performed the passenger has no right to voluntarily extend his person beyond the line of a moving car, or ride upon its platform; and if he does so, and injury follows, no recovery can be had therefor. Benedict v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (Minn.) 639

3. The voluntary exposure of the body beyond the sides of a moving train by a passenger riding on the platform is such negligence as will preclude recovery for his death caused by coming in contact with an iron post near the track, although he was forced to ride on the platform because of the overcrowded condition of the car, and the carrier would have been liable for injury resulting to him therefrom, in the absence of any negligence on his part. Id.

4. A youth sixteen years of age, traveling alone, cannot be held, merely on account of his immature years, to have been incapable in law of exercising sufficient discretion and judgment to avoid incurring the risk of a voluntary exposure of his person beyond the sides of a moving train. Id.

5. A passenger who leaves his car while the train is standing on a side track awaiting the arrival of another train, at a place not designed for the discharge of passengers, and crosses the track to a pump to get a drink of water, but, on hearing the whistle of the incoming train, starts back on a rapid run to regain his car, and attempts to cross in front of the train when it is about 50 feet distant from him, and is struck and killed, is guilty of such negligence as will preclude recovery for his death from the railroad company. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sattler (Neb.) 890

6. A passenger who leaves his train before the completion of his trip must assume all the ordinary risks incident to his action, where the train is run upon a switch to allow the passage of another train, or is stopped at a place other than that used by the carrier for receiving and discharging passengers, and the stoppage is not for the purpose of allowing passengers to board the train or alight therefrom. Id.

Who are passengers.

See also EVIDENCE, 9.

7. A passenger on a railroad train does not lose his character as such by leaving his car at a regular station from motives of either business or curiosity, where he has not yet arrived at the terminus of his journey. Id.

8. A passenger who leaves his car of his own volition, for some purpose of his own, not incident to the journey he is pursuing, as, for instance, to get a drink of water while the train is standing on a side track, and at a place not designed for the discharge of passengers,—cannot claim the protection of Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 72, art. 1, § 3, making a carrier liable for all personal damage inflicted on a passenger being transported. Id.

9. All passengers actually on a train, whether the same is moving or not, and passengers who have left the train at the express or implied invitation of the carrier, for any necessary purpose incident to their journey, are passengers "being transported over the road," within the meaning of Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 72, art. 1, § 3, making a carrier liable for all personal damage inflicted on a passenger while being transported over its road. Id.

10. One who enters and rides upon a car or train which he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence would know, is prohibited from carrying passengers, is a trespasser, and not a passenger; and the only duty of the railroad company toward him is to abstain from wanton or reckless injury to him. Purple v. Union P. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 700

11. No one who, knowing that a conductor has no authority to grant free transportation, enters and rides upon his train, with the deliberate intention not to pay his fare, under an agreement, or under a tacit understanding, with the conductor that he shall ride free, commits a fraud upon the railroad company, and is not a passenger, but is a mere trespasser, to whom the only duty of the company is to abstain from wilful or reckless injury. Id.

Tickets.

See also infra, 16.

12. A person on a street car does not acquire the right to be carried to his destination by the fact that the conductor rings up his fare on taking from him a void coupon ticket. United Railways & Electric Co. v. Hardesty (Md.) 275

13. A carrier is not obliged to honor a coupon from a commutation book of tickets intended for passage between designated points and which provide that they are not "good unless detached by the conductor," when it has been detached by the commuter and the book left with a member of his family, so that it is not present when he tenders the coupon in payment of fare. Id.

14. A second demand for fare need not be made by a street-car conductor before ejecting from the car a person who, in response to his first demand, tendered a worthless ticket, and was informed that it was insufficient. Id.

Limitation of liability.

15. A carrier's contract limiting liability for loss to a specified amount has no application to the damages to be recovered for its failure to comply with a notice of stoppage in transitu after it had agreed to do so. Rosenthal v. Weir (N. Y.) 527

16. An agreement by a passenger when procuring a mileage ticket at a reduced rate, not to hold the carrier liable for injuries received while riding on freight trains, is unenforceable with respect to such freight trains as are designated by the carrier to carry passengers generally. *Richmond v. 1. The validity of a marriage is to be determined by the law of the place where the marriage is solemnized; and a marriage legal where solemnized is valid everywhere. Hills v. State (Neb.) 155

2. The validity of a sale by a husband to his wife, of land situated in Louisiana, is to be determined by the law of Louisiana. Rush v. Landers (La.) 353

3. Whether a husband becomes the debtor of his wife by receiving and using money which she has received from her first husband must be determined by the law of their domicile. Id.

4. The contract of a surety on a note is complete when his signature is affixed and the instrument delivered to the payee, and is therefore governed by the law of the place where those transactions occur, although the note is payable in another state, and as against the makers has no valid inception until its negotiation in the latter state, if the surety has no knowledge that it is to be negotiated there, or intention that his contract shall be governed by the laws of that state. Union National Bank v. Chapman (N. Y.) 513

CONSPIRACY.

A combination of mercantile dealers to compel another dealing in similar goods to sell at prices fixed by it, or, upon his refusal so to do, to prevent those of whom its members are purchasing customers from selling goods to him, is, upon general legal principles, contrary to public policy and void, and the members of such a combination may be restrained collectively or individually, by appropriate injunction, from carrying into effect such purpose. 1. The written Constitution will be construed in the light of the right of municipal self-government. State ex rel. White v. Barker (Iowa) 244

2. A statute making a contract for the construction of a building, in which the contract price is payable with something besides money, so far invalid as to furnish the owner no protection from the claims of subcontractors and materialmen, is an unconstitutional infringement of the owner's right to the possession and enjoyment of his property. Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun (Cal.) 728

Separation and delegation of powers. See also infra, 24; COURTS, 1; CRIMINAL LAW, 2.

3. The power of choosing the managers of a municipal water-supply system cannot be vested by the legislature in the judges of a court created by the Constitution. State ex rel. White v. Barker (Iov a) 244

4. The power to appoint examiners of titles, given to the district courts by Minn. Laws 1901, chap. 237, providing for the Torrens system of registering land titles, is not in violation of Minn. Const. art. 3, vesting the powers of government in three distinct departments. State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall (Minn.) 297

5. Judicial duties are not conferred on registrars of land titles, in violation of Minn. Const. art. 3, by Minn. Laws 1901, chap. 237, providing for the Torrens system of registering land titles, since the act expressly provides that all acts performed by registrars shall be performed under rules and instructions established and given by the district court having jurisdiction of the county in which they act. Id.

6. The power to appoint public officers is not purely an executive function, but this power may be exercised by the general assembly, when not otherwise provided in the Constitution, either by naming a given person for the office, or providing the manner in which the officer shall be chosen; and the general assembly also has authority to provide for the appointment of a number of officers to discharge a given duty, and to provide that vacancies in such number may be filled by those remaining in office, thus creating a self-perpetuating body. Americus v. Perry (Ga.) 230

Local self-government.

See also MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, 3, 4.

7. The legislature cannot fix the salaries of firemen employed by municipalities, although there is no limitation on such power in the Constitution, since that is a matter of local government never delegated to the legislature. Lexington v. Thompson (Ky.) 775

8. The establishment and control of a water-supply system is a matter that pertains to the municipality, and the legislature cannot take the management of the system away from the appointees of the municipality, and vest it in persons for whose selection it provides. State ex rel. White v. Barker (Iowa) 244

9. An act creating a board of police commissioners which shall have exclusive control of the police officers of a city (Ga. Acts 1889, p. 961), naming the first members of the board, prescribing the manner in which their successors shall be chosen, and setting forth their powers and duties, is not an unconstitutional deprivation of local self-government, but is a proper exercise of legislative power. Americus v. Perry (Ga.) 230

Equal protection or privileges.

Uniformity in Taxes, see TAXES, 1, 2.

See also infra, 23; BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

10. The exemption of agricultural products and live stock from the provisions of the Georgia anti-trust act (Ga. Acts 1896, p. 68) renders the act void because in violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amend., declaring that no state shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. Brown v. Jacobs Pharmacy Co. (Ga.) 547

11. The equal privileges and immunities of a bicycle rider are not infringed by requiring him to carry a light after dark. Des Moines v. Keller (Iowa) 243

12. An ordinance requiring bicycle riders to carry lamps is not unconstitutional because not applying to other silently running vehicles. Id.

13. The provision for an attorneys' fee for the successful prosecution of an action under Kan. Laws 1893, chap. 100, for failure of a carrier to safely transport and deliver goods committed to its charge, is constitutional. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simonson (Kan.) 765

14. The allowance of damages and attorneys' fees to plaintiff in an action upon an insurance policy, provided for by Ga. Civ. Code, § 2140, in case of the refusal of an insurance company to pay a loss within sixty days after demand has been made, where it shall appear to the jury that the refusal to pay was in bad faith, is in violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amend., as a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Schwartz (Ga.) 752

15. The mere organization of a partnership under the laws of another state is not sufficient to justify the imposition of conditions upon its doing business within the 57 L. R. A.

state not required of local partnerships. State v. Cadigan (Vt.) 666

16. A statute imposing a penalty on agents transacting business within the state for foreign partnerships which have not complied with conditions not required of local partnerships discriminates against such agents in favor of those of local firms so as to be void under the Federal Constitution and those provisions of a state Constitution protecting equal rights and privileges. Id.

17. The classification of counties according to population, for the purposes of Minn. Laws 1901, chap. 237, providing for the Torrens system of registering land titles, does not render the act void as special legislation in violation of Minn. Const. art. 4, §§ 33, 34. State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall (Minn.) 297

18. The probate judge of one county cannot be given a salary and required to account for all fees received, while the judges of all other counties are permitted to retain the fees as their compensation, under a constitutional provision requiring the general assembly, by a law uniform in its operation, to provide for and regulate the fees of all county officers. Henderson v. Koenig (Mo.) 659

19. An ordinance authorizing a license tax for revenue purposes, which classifies the different subjects of taxation according to the amount of business transacted, providing a graduated rate for the various classes, and which places wholesalers in a separate class from retailers, and imposes on them a lower rate, is not in violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amend., or Pa. Const. art. 9, § 1, providing that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, where no discrimination is made between the different members of the same class. Com. use of Titusville v. Clark (Pa.) 348

20. The provision in an ordinance requiring a license tax from all dealers or vendors of merchandise, that no manufacturer who is a citizen of the municipality shall be considered a dealer or vendor unless he sells goods not of his own manufacture, is a proper classification and a valid exercise of legislative power. Id.

21. The exemption of persons who go from house to house or place to place, vending their own products, from the payment of the license tax imposed by Neb. Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 77, art. 1, § 152, on peddlers, does not render the act invalid as in violation of the uniformity clause of the Constitution, since there is such a real distinction between the two classes that the legislature, acting on considerations of general policy, may make it the basis of classification for the purpose of taxation. Rosenbloom v. State (Neb.) 922

22. The exemption of real-estate dealers and contractors, whose business does not amount to $1,000 per annum, from the operation of an ordinance imposing a license tax for the privilege of transacting business is unconstitutional and void as class legislation, where such contractors and dealers are classified with other persons effecting sales, to whom a similar exemption is not allowed. Com. use of Titusville v. Clark (Pa.) 348

Due process of law.

23. A statute rendering telegraph companies liable for mental anguish caused by failure to promptly transmit and deliver messages does not deprive them of property without due process of law, or deny them the equal protection of the laws. Simmons v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (S. C.) 607

24. The provision of Kan. Laws 1893, chap. 100, making the specification of weights in bills of lading issued by railroad companies for hay, grain, etc., shipped over their lines, conclusive evidence of the correctness of such weights, is unconstitutional because denying to the companies due process of law, and because wrongfully depriving the courts of the judicial power to determine the weight and sufficiency of evidence. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Simonson (Kan.) 765

25. The Torrens system of registering land titles, provided for by Minn. Laws 1901, chap. 237, is not unconstitutional as a taking of property without due process of law, where the adjudication is made after an investigation as to the title and as to whether the land is occupied or not, and after personal service of summons on resident parties, and service upon nonresidents and unknown parties by publication, and mailing a copy of the publication notice to nonresidents whose address is known, and a right of appeal is given and reimbursement provided for anyone sustaining loss by the operation of the act out of an assurance fund raised by a percentage charge upon all property adjudicated; although the act provides that a decree confirming a title and ordering registration shall be forever binding and conclusive, and shall not be opened by reason of any disability, and that no proceedings shall be had for reversing the judgment, except that any person having an interest in the land who has not been actually served or notified of the application for registration may, within sixty days from the entry of the decree, appear and assert his rights, provided no innocent purchaser for value has acquired an interest. State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall (Minn.) 297

26. The legislature cannot prohibit the sale of dairy products containing a preservative other than salt, sugar, or spirituous liquors in specified cases, or the sale of preservatives for such use, when the use of preservatives is not declared to be an adulteration, and the statute is not aimed at adulteration generally, regardless of whether or not their effect is to render the products unwholesome. People v. Biesacker (N. Y.) 178

27. Statutes forbidding the manufacture of any article in imitation of butter, which is not pure butter, or the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine which contains any coloring matter, or the sale of any substance which is not butter, but has the appearance of butter, unless it is sold under its true name and has its true name plainly marked thereon; and requiring that all persons dealing in food shall, upon proper application and tender of price, furnish a sample for analysis; the purpose of which is to prevent deception in the sale of dairy products and preserve the public health,—are a proper exercise of the police power, and do not violate the constitutional right to liberty and the enjoyment of property. State ex rel. Monnett v. Capital City Dairy Co. (Ohio) 181

1. A contract for the future delivery of personal property is void for want of consideration and mutuality, if the quantity to be delivered is conditioned by the will, wish, or want of one of the parties; but it may be sustained if the quantity is ascertainable otherwise, with reasonable certainty. Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.)

2. An accepted offer to sell or deliver articles at specified prices during a limited time, in such amounts or quantities as the acceptor may want or desire in his business, without any statement of the amount or quantity, is without consideration and void because the acceptor is not bound to want, desire, or take any.

Id.

3. Accepted orders for goods under a contract which is void because of uncertainty as to the quantity constitute sales of the goods thus ordered, on the terms of the contract; but they do not validate the agreements as to articles which the one refuses to purchase or the other refuses to sell or deliver, under the void contracts, because neither party is bound to take or deliver any amount or quantity of these articles thereunder.

Id.

4. Tender of a check is not a compliance with a contract by a telegraph company to promptly transmit and deliver money. Robinson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Ky.)

611

Option.

5. The nonexercise of an option at the appointed time is not waived by a reply, by the one who offered it, to a belated demand that he comply with his offer, asking time to consider, and a subsequent offer of a compromise, which is rejected. Page v. Shainwald (N. Y.)

6. The intention of parties cannot be imported into a contract, where its terms are plain and unambiguous, and they do not express it. Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.)

7. If an aged parent conveys his property to his son to secure support for himself during the remainder of his life, whether the agreement calls for support generally, or by paying to the grantor money or property in specific amounts at specified times, the contract must be construed to require personal performance by the grantee of the obligations incurred by him. *Glocke v. 8. No recovery can be had for losses which have arisen under an illegal contract. Reed v. Johnson (Wash.)

404

9. Specific performance will not be enforced of an agreement to convey an interest in land to one for services in securing the location of a railroad depot thereon, where he has agreed to divide with certain officials of the road all money received by him from sales of land during the construction of the road, since its tendency is to induce the officers of the corporation to disregard their duties to it, and it is therefore against public policy.

Id.

10. A contract between a sheriff and his deputy, providing that the deputy shall collect all the taxes, with slight exceptions, and do all the work of the sheriff's office in one district, and attend the sessions of the court during stated portions of the time each year, and that he shall have all the fees and commissions allowed by law upon the work done by him, and shall pay the sheriff $100 a year,—violates W. Va. Code, chap. 7, § 5, prohibiting the sale or farming, in whole or in part, of any office under the laws of the state. White v. Cook (W. Va.)

417

11. The contract of a defaulting bank officer to furnish collateral security for his indorsement upon paper previously sold to the bank by him, so as to replenish the assets of the bank and enable it to resume business, is not illegal; and after such securities have been furnished and the bank has resumed business, the person furnishing such securities at the request of such defaulting officer, with knowledge of the use to be made thereof by him, cannot be heard to say that there was no consideration for furnishing the same. Tecumseh Nat. Bank v. Chamberlain Bkg. House (Neb.)

811

Rescission.

13. An intention to repudiate the contract by a buyer of scrap iron who is to pay for each 100 tons as delivered, justifying a rescission by the seller, is shown where, after receiving 100 tons, he insists on having two or three car loads more delivered before remitting for the 100 tons. Johnson Forge Co. v. Leonard (Del.)

225

14. The question whether or not a letter by a purchaser of scrap iron to be paid for as each 100 tons was delivered, stating that he would not remit until he had enough of the balance of the contract in his hands to know that he would receive the amount purchased, and that as soon as he had two or three cars above the 100 tons he would remit, amounts to a repudiation of the contract justifying a rescission on the part of the seller, is for the court. Id.

J. Const. 1844, art. 5, cl. 9, gives the executive power to grant a reprieve to extend until the expiration of a time not exceeding ninety days after conviction, and art. 3 prohibits the exercise by the governor of any legislative or judicial power except as expressly provided in the Constitution. Id.

4. In case of conviction for a statutory misdemeanor, or a common-law misdemeanor for which punishment is prescribed by statute, courts of record have no jurisdiction to require of the defendant sureties for good behavior. State v. Gillilan (W. Va.) 426

5. Courts of record have a discretionary jurisdiction, in case of conviction for a gross common-law misdemeanor, punishment for which has not been prescribed by statute, to require of the defendant sureties for good behavior. Id.

6. In case of a conviction of selling intoxicating liquors without a license in violation of W. Va. Code, chap. 32, §§ 1, 3, forbidding such sale and providing that the punishment for such an offense shall be a fine and, at the discretion of the court, imprisonment in the county jail, the court has no power, in addition to imposing a fine and costs, to require of the defendant sureties for good behavior. State v. Gillilan (W. Va.) 426

1. Damage from diminution of yield because of breach of contract to furnish fertilizer to assist in making a crop is not too remote to sustain an action for the breach. Herring v. Armwood (N. C.) 958

2. The measure of damages for breach of warranty of the capacity of a kiln for drying lumber is not, when there is no kiln of the agreed capacity on the market, the 57 L. R. A.

difference between the value of the kiln sold and one of the required capacity, but is the difference between the value of the apparatus delivered and the contract price. Huyett-Smith Mfg. Co. v. Gray (N. C.) 193

3. Substantial damages may be given for breach of a contract to transmit promptly a telegram which the company knew to be addressed to a physician and to direct him to come to the sender's house at once. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Church (Neb.) 905

4. Damages for breach of a contract promptly to transmit and deliver a telegram from a sick person summoning his physician "at once" may include an allowance for the pain and suffering endured during the physician's absence because of such breach. Id.

5. Damages cannot be recovered for mental anguish caused by breach by a telegraph company of its contract to transmit money promptly. Robinson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Ky.) 611

6. Mental suffering may be considered in assessing the damages against a carrier for breach of its contract to transport a corpse. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hull (Ky.) 771

7. The sum of $1,640 is excessive damages for failure to forward a corpse by a certain train, whereby its interment was delayed from afternoon until the next morning, where its condition did not render speedy interment necessary, and the person complaining was treated with proper courtesy. Id.

8. A carrier is liable for nervous shock to a passenger resulting from a jar to the nervous system which accompanies a blow to the person caused by being thrown from a seat through the carrier's negligence, and it is not necessary to show that the shock is the consequence of the blow. Homans v. Boston Elevated Ry. Co. (Mass.) 291

9. Damages for the death of the child cannot be allowed in an action by husband and wife for a physician's abandonment of the wife during her confinement. Lathrope v. Flood (Cal.) 215

10. An award of $950 damages is not excessive where, on account of the failure of a telegraph company to transmit and deliver a telegram summoning a physician, a woman was left in labor for thirty minutes, with the child partly born, which resulted in the death of the child and great pain of body and mind to the woman. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Church (Neb.) 905

11. The general rule is that damages for which a party is liable in tort are such, and only such, as are the reasonable and probable consequence of his acts. Peters v. Jackson (W. Va.) 428

12. In an action of tort, if it be impossible, in the nature of the case, to distinguish between the damage arising from the actionable injury and damage which has another origin, the jury should be left to make from the evidence the best estimate in their power as reasonable men, and award to the plaintiff compensatory damages for the actionable injury. Jenkins v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 309

13. Instances of loss of particular customers need not be alleged or proved to warrant an assessment of damages for diminution of business and loss of credit by reason of a false publication by a mercantile agency. Douglass v. Daisley (C. C. App. 1st C.) 475

14. The damages for fraudulent representations inducing the purchase of corporate stock cannot be limited to the difference in the value of the stock on the day the representations were made and on the day of purchase, if at both dates it was of much less intrinsic value than the price paid for it, but should represent the difference between the price paid and the intrinsic value of the stock as ascertained by events in the subsequent history of the corporation, and not by the market price. Hindman v. First Nat. Bank (C. C. App. 6th C.) 108

15. In an action to recover damages for injuries to property from the negligent operation of railroad locomotives in such manner as to cause them to emit smoke denser and more offensive in quality and greater in volume than reasonably required for the proper operation of the railroad, where the evidence shows such negligent operation, and substantial damage to the plaintiff's property directly attributable thereto, recovery cannot be limited to nominal damages, on the ground of inherent impossibility of determining how much of the damage was caused by smoke necessarily emitted in the careful operation of the railroad, and how much was caused by the smoke that was due to negligent operation. Jenkins v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 309

16. The damage for injury to one "owning a business on land within a town" by the taking of property for public use for which a statute requires compensation to be made is not limited to the decrease in market value of the business. Earle v. Com. (Mass.) 292

Punitive.

17. Exemplary damages may be awarded for wilfully attempting to enjoy a parol license to maintain a ditch over another's land after the license has been revoked. Hicks Brothers v. Swift Creek Mill Co. (Ala.) 720

18. The damages for a personal injury caused by negligence may be the "present cash value" of the injury to the injured person, taking into consideration pain and mental suffering, and not allowing anything as a punishment, or punitive damages. Coley v. North Carolina R. Co. (N. C.) 817

DISCOVERY.

1. The production of broken machinery may be compelled for examination by persons intending to testify as experts in an action at law for personal injuries caused by its breaking. Reynolds v. Burgess Sulphite Fibre Co. (N. H.) 949

2. That an action at law seeks damages for a personal tort will not defeat a bill for discovery in aid of it, if it does not involve moral turpitude or immoral conduct on the part of defendant. Id.

3. Jurisdiction to grant discovery of broken machinery in aid of an action for injuries caused by its breaking is not ousted by statutes removing the disability of parties as witnesses, authorizing the taking of depositions before trial, or giving the court authority to order a view at the trial. Id.

4. A bill of discovery will lie to compel an employer to produce, for the inspection of plaintiff, the broken parts of machinery, defects in which are alleged to have caused a death, to recover damages for which an action has been instituted at law which cannot be satisfactorily prepared for trial without such inspection. 2. The owner of the soil in a street may maintain ejectment against any person wrongfully taking or claiming exclusive possession of the same. French v. Robb (N. J. Err. & App.) 956

3. A person occupying part of a street with poles and appliances for lighting the street, in pursuance of a contract made with the municipal authorities under N. J. act May 22, 1894 (P. L. p. 477), has such rightful, exclusive possession of the part so occupied as will support a plea of not guilty in an action of ejectment brought by the owner of the soil; but the right of such a person to use the street in the immediate 57 L. Evidence on Appeal from Commissioners, see EVIDENCE, 28, 32, 33.

1. A statute requiring payment of damages for injuries to a business through the taking of property for public use is not unconstitutional on the ground that taxes cannot be levied for such purposes. Earle v. Com. (Mass.) 292

2. In awarding damage to one, a portion of whose land is sought to be condemned for public use, for injury to his remaining land, injury to tracts not connected with, and held under different titles from, although adjoining, that from which the parcel is taken, cannot be considered. Sharpe v. United States (C. C. App. 3d C.) 932

3. A doctor having an office in, and a practice extending throughout, a town in which land is taken for a public purpose, is within the protection of a statute providing for compensation to any individual owning an established business on land within the town, which is injured by the taking. Earle v. Com. (Mass.) 292

4. The owner of an apartment house cannot recover damages from an electric elevated railroad company whose tracks cross the highway within 19 feet of his property, where the injury differs from that suffered by the general public only in the proximity of the tracks, even under a constitutional provision that private property shall not be damaged for public use without compensation. *Aldrich v. 1. Validity cannot be given to an illegal contract by estoppel. Reed v. Johnson (Wash.) 404

2. The negligent placing of a will so that its existence is not known for several years after testator's death, and the laches of the devisee in not producing it, will not estop him from asserting his claim against one who has acquired a title from the heir, at any time before the right to probate or register the will is barred. Reid v. Benge (Ky.) 253

3. The owner of a piano who leases it to a retail dealer in musical instruments is not estopped to claim it from one who first hired and then purchased it from the retail dealer, who held it only under a lease providing that it should be kept in the purchaser's house, although the lessor failed to notify such purchaser of his claim to the instrument for nearly two years, during which time the latter bought and paid for it, believing it to belong to the retail dealer. Oliver Ditson Co. v. Bates (Mass.) 289

4. One who removes a case from a state to the Federal court is estopped from attacking the jurisdiction of the latter upon any ground except that the court from which it was removed had no jurisdiction. Tootle v. Coleman (C. C. App. 8th C.) 120

EVIDENCE.

Review of Errors as to, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 14, 15.

Presumptions and burden of proof. See also DAMAGES, 13.

1. Preliminary evidence is not necessary of the truth of warranties in an application for life insurance, in a suit on the policy. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. (R. I.) 496

2. The burden is upon a cestui que trust seeking a preference over general creditors of an insolvent trustee to show that the trust money did in fact increase the estate out of which he seeks a preference, or is represented therein in some form. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. v. Morrison (Neb.) 885

3. It is presumed that moneys drawn out of a fund wherein a trustee has mingled his own money and that of the cestui que trust are his own, and, so long as any portion of the fund so constituted remains it may be followed, and the charge of the cestui que trust thereon may be asserted. Id.

4. To entitle a consumer to an order requiring a gas company having authority to charge flat or meter rates to supply him at the flat rate the same as all other consumers are supplied, he must show that the enforcement of the meter rate against him will be an unjust discrimination. Indian Natural & Illum. Gas Co. v. State ex rel. Ball (Ind.) 761

5. In order to sustain a conveyance of land by a husband to his wife, both being domiciled in another state, which is claimed to have been made in consideration of an indebtedness of the husband to the wife for money said to have belonged to her, and to have been received and used by the husband, it must be shown that by reason of such receipt and use the husband became the debtor of the wife, that the debt existed at the time of the conveyance, and that the property was conveyed in satisfaction, or in part satisfaction, of such debt. Rush v. Landers (La.) 353

6. Where answers of a wife to interrogatories propounded to her by creditors of her husband show that property in another state has been conveyed by the husband to her for a particular consideration arising under the laws of that state, the court will not assume, even though it should be made to appear that such consideration was inadequate, that a different consideration, testified to as moving in the matter of the conveyance of property in the state, was therefore included and exhausted for the purposes of the conveyance in such other state. Id.

7. If a sale of property by a husband to his wife is attacked by a party in interest, and the conveyance appears on its face to be invalid because the consideration expressed is not within the exceptions of La. Civ. Code, art. 2446, prohibiting sales between husband and wife except in certain cases, the burden of proof is on the party seeking to maintain the validity of the conveyance to show that the real consideration was different from that expressed, and was within the exceptions provided by the law. Id.

8. When a will produced from the testator's custody is mutilated and the signature destroyed the burden is on proponents to account for the mutilation, and not on the caveators to show that the mutilation was purposely done. Cutler v. Cutler (N. C.) 209

9. In the absence of any rule or practice permitting freight trains to carry passengers, the presumption is that one riding for his own convenience on a freight train, an engine, a hand car, or any other carriage of a common carrier not designed for the transportation of passengers, is unlawfully

there, and is a trespasser. Purple v. Union P. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 700

10. A person resorting to a railroad depot to purchase a ticket for transportation over a railroad which makes use of the depot to receive and discharge passengers is not bound to show that the person at the ticket window is the agent of the company, and not a mere broker, to avoid the application of the rule that a railroad company is not liable for the condition of premises where its tickets are sold by a broker in whose hands they have been placed. Herrman v. Great Northern R. Co. (Wash.) 390

11. A presumption of negligence does not arise from the mere fact of the explosion of a steam boiler used by one engaged in lawful business. Vieth v. Hope Salt & Coal Co. (W. Va.) 410

12. A presumption of negligence on the part of an electric company arises when injury results to a traveler in a public street from one of its live wires, which has broken and is hanging so near the ground as to be within reach therefrom. Boyd v. Portland General Electric Co. (Or.) 619

13. An allegation in an action to recover for injuries to a passerby from a broken live electric wire, that it was weak and defective, and insufficiently stretched and fastened, does not require proof of these facts, since the happening of the accident is presumptive evidence of negligence in that regard. Id.

14. Proof that an electric-light wire controlled by a private corporation, and normally suspended upon poles along a public street, was trailing broken on the sidewalk, affords a presumption of negligence, in a suit against such corporation by a person injured through electric shock by contact with such wire. Newark Electric Light & P. Co. v. Ruddy (N. J. Err. & App.) 624

15. No presumption of negligence arises from the fact that a quiet, gentle horse was left standing untied in the public street, free from the presence of anything which might frighten or disturb him; the driver being within 5 to 8 feet of the wagon to which the horse was hitched; and it appearing that the driver had used the horse in that way for many years without an accident. Belles v. Kellner (N. J. Err. & App.) 627

16. The presumption is that a depot company has promulgated reasonable rules for, and exercised proper supervision over, the operation of its railroads and yards, and in an action to recover for injuries received while using the yards the burden is on plaintiff to prove a failure of the company to comply with its duty in this respect. Brady v. Chicago & G. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 712

17. To relieve itself from liability to make good the amounts which it has paid on raised checks, a bank must affirmatively establish negligence on the part of the drawer which facilitated the commission of the fraud. Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 529

Best and secondary evidence.

18. Although a written rule regulating the running of railway trains is the best evidence of its terms, it is competent for a witness to testify whether or not the rule applied to all the trains of the company or only to a portion thereof. Southern P. Co. v. Schoer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 707

Documentary evidence.

19. A writing which contains competent evidence upon a material issue cannot be lawfully rejected because it also contains evidence which is incompetent and irrelevant. Id.

20. In an action by one claiming title, for possession of property which defendant had purchased from a third person, a lease from plaintiff to such third person is admissible in evidence to show the nature of such person's right to possession of the property, and to rebut any presumption of agency on his part to sell it. Oliver Ditson Co. v. Bates (Mass.) 289

Opinions.

When Objection to Form of Hypothetical Question Made, see APPEAL AND ERROR, 9.

21. A physician may state his opinion as to the probable further duration of a confinement case had he reached the mother at a time when all but the head and one arm of the child had been delivered. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Church (Neb.) 905

22. Testimony of a mining engineer who has never investigated the ventilation of sewers, as to a method of preventing an explosion in a sewer, is not admissible in an action to recover for loss caused by such explosion, where he states that he never saw any practical attempt made to utilize the method suggested, and never knew of such attempt, and has made no experiments himself. Fuchs v. St. Louis (Mo.) 136

Confessions.

23. A confession of a prisoner, voluntarily made, is admissible when not prompted by any inducement of hope or fear. Hills v. State (Neb.) 155

Admissions.

24. An admission as to what an absent witness will testify to, made for the purpose of securing a speedy trial, is not admissible at a subsequent term when the presence of the witness has been secured. Cutler v. Cutler (N. C.) 209

Declarations.

25. Evidence of statements to the agent taking an application for insurance, different from those written therein, are not admissible in an action on the policy, where he is the agent of the applicant. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. (R. I.) 496

26. A declaration by the motorman running an electric car, made while the car was still on the body of one it had run down, that "I saw the child, but thought I could pass it;" or, "This is a terrible thing."

I saw the child, but thought I could run past it,"—is admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestæ in an action for the injury. Sample v. Consolidated Light & R. Co. (W. Va.) 186

Privileged communications.

27. A communication to a minister of the gospel or a priest is not privileged, where it is shown that it was not made in confidence of the relation, or was not to be kept as a secret. Hills v. State (Neb.) 155

Former testimony.

28. Upon a trial de novo upon appeal from commissioners in an eminent domain proceeding the jury are not to consider the evidence produced before the commissioners, or be influenced by the commissioners' report. Sharpe v. United States (C. C. App. 3d C.) 932

Relevancy and materiality.

29. Under an allegation of negligence on the part of a municipality in failing to prevent the formation and accumulation of gases in a sewer, and in failing to open the vents to permit their escape, which resulted in an explosion, evidence is not admissible that the explosion might have been prevented by the use of ventilating apparatus. Fuchs v. St. Louis (Mo.) 136

30. Evidence of the defective condition of an engine thirty days before the happening of an accident is admissible, since, in the absence of other evidence, there is at least a reasonable probability that a defect existing at that time was not remedied before the casualty occurred. Southern P. Co. v. Schoer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 707

31. Evidence as to directions which the sendee had given a telegraph company as to delivery of telegrams for him is admissible in an action by a third person against the company for failure promptly to deliver a message to him. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Church (Neb.) 905

32. Upon the question of the value of land sought to be condemned by the government, testimony of the owner of offers which have been received for the land is not admissible, where there is nothing to show the conditions under which they were made or the circumstances influencing them. Sharpe v. United States (C. C. App. 3d C.) 932

33. Evidence of merely possible uses to which land sought to be condemned by the government may be put, not founded on any clear, certain, or avowed obnoxious uses, is not admissible to enhance the damages to be awarded for injury to the residue of the tract. Id.

34. To show the intrinsic value of the stock of an insurance company, the purchase of which was induced by fraud, the history of bank certificates of deposit representing notes of agents which are to be repaid out of the business done, and which certificates have been placed with the bank as part of the capital stock, may be shown. Hindman v. First Nat. Bank (C. C. App. 6th C.) 108

Other remedies suspended by lien of. 385

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR.

1. It is the right of an executor offering land for sale at public outcry to withdraw the same at any time before the hammer falls. Tillman v. Dunman (Ga.) 784

2. Although the motive of an executor offering land for sale at public outcry in withdrawing the property from sale before the bid was accepted was the result of collusion between himself and another who had bargained for the premises at a private sale, and the withdrawal was made with the design of completing the private sale, nevertheless the person who made the last and highest bid before the same was withdrawn could not insist upon the right to take the land as a purchaser. While such collusion between the executor and another would be open to inquiry by legatees and creditors, it is not open to inquiry at the instance of a stranger. Id.

3. The personal representative of a deceased sheriff may maintain an action on the bond of a deputy to compel him to pay over money received by him by virtue of his office, notwithstanding the fact that no order has been made by the county court or board of education, to whom the money ultimately belongs, requiring the deputy to pay over the balances due. *White v. FIXTURES.

Tenant's Right to Remove, see LANDLORD AND TENANT, 1; STATUTES, 7.

1. A servant's room, metallic gutters attached to the roof of a house, and water pipes laid under the ground by a tenant on leased premises, become, when constructed and attached, a part of the freehold, and cannot be lawfully severed from the land by the tenant against the will of the landlord, even though at the time of their erection the tenant intended to remove them at the expiration of his term. Wright v. Du Bignon (Ga.) 669

2. Domestic or ornamental fixtures which a tenant has a right to remove during his term are such only as may be easily severed and made equally useful to him in another house, and do not extend to such as are substantial additions to the house, or the removal of which would be injurious to the freehold. Id.

3. Heating apparatus bought by a man under contract reserving title in the seller, and permanently placed in a building owned by himself and his wife by entireties, does not become a fixture so as to prevent its removal for nonpayment of the purchase money, if removal will not materially injure it or the building, since there is no unity of title in it and the real estate. *Schellenberg v. FORGERY.

Of Check, see BANKS, 10-16; NOTICE, 3. Indictment for, see INDICTMENT.

1. The addition to a check of the words, "in full of account to date," may constitute a forgery if made at any time after the check is delivered to the payee. Gordon v. Com. (Va.) 744

2. Although a check is so irregular in form that the bank would be justified in refusing payment of it, yet it may be the subject of forgery as to its effect as a receipt, after it has passed through the hands of several indorsers, and has been paid by the bank and returned to the hands of the drawer. Id.

3. To add to a canceled check the words, "in full of account to date," with intent to alter its effect as a receipt, constitutes forgery. Id.

4. That one who forges a receipt in full on a payment on account has in fact paid his indebtedness in full will not prevent his liability to indictment for the forgery. Id.

1. A representation of fact made with the intent to influence the conduct of another implies necessarily the belief of the person making it that it is true. Hindman v. First Nat. Bank (C. C. App. 6th C.) 108

2. One who knowingly makes false representations in respect to the capital of a corporation, for the purpose of inducing another to buy its stock, is liable to him for the loss sustained by the purchase of the stock in reliance upon the truth of the statement. Id.

3. The jury may find that a statement by a bank cashier, that one of its corporation depositors had its entire authorized capital on deposit, made with no knowledge of the fact, is knowingly false, for the purpose of holding the bank liable for the results of the misrepresentation in case it is false and causes injury to one relying on it. Id.

4. That the discount of subscribers' notes indorsed by an insurance company, by the bank in which they were deposited as capital, was genuine and real, does not prevent its certificate that the company's capital and surplus had been paid in, in cash, from being false and misleading. Id.

5. That one taking stock in a corporation in reliance on representations as to its condition was partly induced to purchase by the desire to secure an agency will not defeat his right to recover against the one making the representations. Id.

Fraudulent conveyances.

6. A conveyance of property, with intention to delay or defraud creditors, known to the party taking, is void as to them, though made in payment of a debt which in amount approximates the value of the property so conveyed. Bigby v. Warnock (Ga.) 754

7. A wife who takes a conveyance of property from her husband, with knowledge that he intends thereby to hinder and defraud his creditors, and who, in order to procure a loan to herself, conveys the property, as security, to one ignorant of the fraud, is personally liable as a trustee ex maleficio to a judgment creditor of her husband, as to whom the conveyance to her is void, for the amount of the loan, or sufficient thereof to satisfy such judgment, and, to reduce the recovery, cannot plead, in an action brought by the judgment creditor against her, a debt due her by her husband; nor is it material what she does with the borrowed money, provided she does not apply it to her husband's debts. Id.

8. An indorsee of a note is not precluded from attacking a voluntary conveyance of property by a remote indorser on the note by the fact that it occurred before the note came into possession of the indorsee. National Valley Bank v. Hancock (Va.) 728

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Fraud and fraudulent conveyances; conveyance in discharge of debt, with intent to defraud creditors; effect of fraudulent purpose; conveyance between husband and wife. 754

Fraudulent conspiracy; verdict against single defendant in civil action for; false representations by cashier as to amount of capital of insurance company in bank; bank's liability for; action for false representations not directly made to person injured. 110

The right to garnish a debtor is not limited to the situs of the chose in action; and a garnishment by a citizen of one state of a debtor of the same state, whose creditor resides, and whose debt was contracted and is payable, in another state, is such an attachment of the chose in action as will authorize the court to obtain jurisdiction to dispose of it by publication of the summons against the defendant. Tootle v. Coleman (C. C. App. 8th C.) 120

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Garnishment; service by publication in action in; situs of debt for purpose of. 122

GAS.

See also EVIDENCE, 4.

A natural gas company having authority to lay its mains in a public street and supply gas to consumers, charging a flat rate by the month or a certain meter rate per 1,000 feet, cannot enforce the latter rate against a single consumer if it makes an unjust discrimination against him. Indiana Natural & Illum. Gas Co. v. State ex rel. Ball (Ind.) 761

GIFT.NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Gift; of public money to individual for private use. 293

GOVERNOR.

Power to Grant Reprieve, see CRIMINAL LAW, 2, 3.

Upon the resignation of the governor of the state the president of the senate does not become governor in the constitutional sense, under N. J. Const. art. 5, cl. 12, providing that in case of the death, resignation, or removal of the governor the powers, duties, and emoluments of the office shall devolve upon the president of the senate, and in case of the death, resignation, or removal of the latter, then upon the speaker of the house of assembly, until another governor shall be elected and qualified; and if the president of the senate resigns his office as senator he can no longer exercise the functions pertaining to the executive office, and thereupon the powers, duties, and emoluments of that office devolve upon the speaker of the house of assembly. State, Clifford, Prosecutor, v. Heller (N. J. Sup.) 312

GUARANTY.

By Married Woman, see HUSBAND AND WIFE, 1.

1. If a person who has rightfully placed poles and wires in a street for the purpose of lighting the street uses them wrongfully for private lighting, he does not thereby lose his right to maintain them as against the owner of the soil; but the owner may recover compensation for such wrongful use by an action for damages, and equity will restrain their misuse in the future. French v. Robb (N. J. Err. & App.) 956

2. The permanent obstruction of a street within 200 feet of the property of an abutting owner, cutting him off from his usual and only direct access to the business portion of the town, thereby depreciating the value of his property, inflicts special injury on him for which he may recover damages. O'Brien v. Central Iron & Steel Co. (Ind.) 508

3. One whose property is cut off from access to markets and from communication with his fellow men by neglect of the county commissioners to keep the highway leading to it in repair suffers a special injury which will entitle him to maintain an action against the commissioners. Bembe v. Commissioners of Anne Arundel County (Md.) 279

4. Damages for injury to property by discontinuing a portion of the street on which it is situated, so that traffic is diverted from it, trade diminished, and its value lessened, although access to it still exists by a longer route, cannot be recovered under a statute providing for the payment of damages sustained by the discontinuance of a highway. Cram v. Laconia (N. H.) 282

2. Land sold by a husband to his wife is liable to seizure by the husband's creditors, where the title is invalid on its face because the expressed consideration is not within the exceptions provided by La. Civ. Code, art. 2446, as essential to the validity of a sale in such case. Rush v. Landers (La.) 353

Allegations of, see PLEADING, 5.

3. A marriage solemnized in good faith is not void merely because the contracting parties may at some prior time have entered into an agreement or understanding that the marriage should be invalid. Hills v. State (Neb.) 155

4. All that is essential to establish the marriage relation in Nebraska is that the parties, being of legal capacity, freely consent thereto; and their consent need not be expressed in any especial manner or by any prescribed form of words, but may be sufficiently evidenced by any clear and unambiguous language or conduct. University of Michigan v. McGuckin (Neb.) 917

5. Although the beginning of a cohabitation was meretricious, each of the parties having a lawful spouse then living, there is sufficient evidence of a lawful marriage where, after the obstacles thereto were removed by decrees of divorce, the parties not only for a long term of years continued to live together as husband and wife, and to enjoy the repute of that relation, but continuously represented themselves to the public as such, and five children were born of the union, whom the parents unitedly represented to the public and caused to be baptized into church as the children of lawful wedlock; and the fact that no explicit verbal agreement to marry was made after obtaining the divorces is immaterial. Id.

1. Equity will enjoin municipal authorities from carrying into effect an ultra vires ordinance providing for the election of certain public officers, at the instance of citizens and taxpayers of the city, for the reason that if such officers are elected they will have an apparent demand against the municipality for compensation, which will have to be resisted at the expense of the taxpayers, or illegally paid out of the funds of the corporation. Americus v. Perry (Ga.) 230

2. An injunction will not be granted to restrain the collection of taxes, unless the assessment is void or is levied for an illegal or unauthorized purpose, under Neb. Comp. Stat. 1901, chap. 77, art. 1, § 144. Philadelphia Mortg. & T. Co. v. Omaha (Neb.) 160

3. The enforcement of taxes against property by a city will not be restrained by injunction, on the ground of equitable estoppel because the city treasurer erroneously marked the taxes "paid" on the tax records, and a third party, relying on the record, and believing the taxes were paid, loaned money on the property and acquired title thereto by foreclosure, where the taxes had been lawfully levied and assessed and were actually due and unpaid. Id.

4. A landowner will be enjoined from maintaining a tower on his land in such a way that ice formed on it from freezing rain or spray from a cataract falls onto adjoining property so as to injure and endanger human life. Davis v. Niagara Falls Tower Co. (N. Y.) 545 authority to accept as payment of a premium on a policy an agreement to give him credit upon his individual account, which he shall trade out with the insured in the ordinary course of business, and a policy providing that it shall not take effect until the first premium is paid will not become effective under such agreement, no credit being actually given to the agent, or by him to the company, in the usual course of business. Tomsecek v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Wis.) 455

Construction.

2. Entirety of premium in a policy insuring a dwelling house and live stock as separate items, with a specified amount on each, will not prevent the policy from being severable; but a recovery may be had for loss on the house, although the policy has been avoided as to the live stock by placing encumbrances thereon, where the property is so situated that both classes are not exposed to the same risks. Taylor v. Anchor Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Iowa) 323

Surrender.

3. An infant's surrender of a policy on his life for a cash value, fairly made without undue influence, cannot be avoided by his administrator and the insurance contract enforced, although the infant did not receive the whole amount to which the contract entitled him. Pippen v. Mutual Benefit L. Ins. Co. (N. C.) 505

4. A surrender of an insurance policy to the insurer for its cash value is not a sale which can be disaffirmed by the administrator of the insured on the ground of the latter's infancy, but it is merely a rescission of the contract. Id.

Paid-up policy.

5. A provision in a life-insurance policy for the issuance of a paid-up policy proportioned to the premiums paid, upon its surrender before default in payments, cannot be enforced at the instance of a judgment creditor of the assured after the latter's death and the right to the proceeds has passed to his personal representative, so as to make his execution available against the policy. Boisseau, use of Robinson v. Penn. (Va.) 380

Reserve.

See also MANDAMUS.

6. A statute forbidding a life insurance company to discriminate between insureds of the same class in premiums, rates, dividends, other benefits or terms and conditions, does not prevent the issuing of one-year term policies with the privilege of taking a whole life policy at the end of the first year, for the purpose of appropriating a larger portion of the premium to expenses and less to the reserve fund. Bankers' Life Ins. Co. v. Howland (Vt.) 374

7. Under a statute requiring insurance commissioners to issue licenses to a foreign insurance company to do business in the state, if satisfied with its statement showing its financial condition and standing, they have no authority to question the method of computing the reserve set forth in the statement, or to enter upon an independent valuation of such reserve. Id.

8. In computing the reserve of a life insurance company under a statute requiring it, in order to be entitled to do business in the state, to have, in addition to its capital, assets equal in amount to its outstanding liabilities, reckoning the premium reserve on its life risks based on the actuaries' tables of mortality, with interest at 4 per cent, as a liability, the expenses of securing the first year's business may be deducted from the amount it receives as premiums for that year by providing that a policy shall be valued as a term policy for one year and a life policy afterwards. Id.

9. The beneficiary in an insurance policy on the life of a minor is not prevented from recovery thereon because of false warranties in the contract, if he did not procure the insurance with knowledge of them. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. (R. I.) 496

Iron-safe clause.

10. A clause in a policy of fire insurance, requiring the assured to keep the books and inventories of his business "securely locked in a fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building (in which the stock insured is located) is not actually open for business, or, failing in this," to "keep such books and inventories in some place not exposed to a fire which would destroy . . . the building,"—does not apply to a suspension of business caused by such an emergency as a fire raging in the vicinity and threatening to consume the building, the same not being actually shut up, and business operations being interrupted because of the threatened danger, though under such circumstances the insured is required to exercise reasonable diligence to preserve the books and inventories. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Schwartz (Ga.) 752

Estoppel of insured.

11. An agreement by an applicant for insurance that no information not contained in the application, received by any person at any time, shall be binding on the insurer, will not prevent him from showing that his answers to the questions of the medical examiner were not properly recorded. Sternaman v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 318

12. Public policy prohibits an agreement by an applicant for life insurance that the medical examiner appointed and paid by the insurer shall be the agent of the applicant in recording the medical examination; and such agreement will not prevent a showing that the answers written were not those given by the applicant. Id.

13. One taking a policy of life insurance which provides that it shall, for the purpose of computing the reserve, be valued as a term policy for one year and a life policy afterwards, is estopped from repudiating that provision of the contract. Bankers' Life Ins. Co. v. Howland (Vt.) 374

Estoppel of company.

14. An insurance company cannot defeat liability on its policy because of misrepresentations in the application as to the title to the property or the encumbrances thereon, if they were correctly stated to the agent and he failed to make out the application in accordance with the information given. Taylor v. Anchor Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Iowa) 328

15. An insurer cannot rely on a warranty by the applicant that the answers to the questions in the medical examination were properly recorded, to forfeit the policy, if it knew at the time through its medical examiner that they were not. Sternaman v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 318

16. Statements of an insurance solicitor to one making an application for insurance, as to the immateriality of facts brought to his attention, do not bind the insurer, where he is the agent of the applicant. O'Rourke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. (R. I.) 496

17. An insurance company which has rejected and retained an application cannot take advantage of a warranty in a subsequent application by the same applicant that an application by him for insurance had never been rejected. Id.

18. A statement in a rejected application for insurance that applicant has consulted a physician for rheumatism does not charge the company with knowledge that he has that disease, so that its acceptance of a subsequent application in which applicant states that he has never had it will constitute a waiver of the falsity of the statement. Id.

19. An insurance company will be bound to know that an applicant for insurance is the same as the maker of a prior rejected application, where not only the name of the applicant, but the date of birth, age, town, occupation, and parents' names are the same in both applications. Id.

Cause of death.

20. A policy insuring a railroad company against loss from liability to persons who should accidentally "sustain personal injuries" on its road under circumstances which impose upon the insured a common-law or statutory liability for the injuries does not cover cases of instantaneous death without conscious suffering through injuries for which insured is responsible, where the statutes give a new right of action to the personal representatives in case of death, and not a right of action to deceased which survives. Worcester & S. Street R. Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Mass.) 829

Extent of recovery.

21. The loss to be made good under a policy of fire insurance is not limited to the cost of replacing the structure described in the survey, if, when the fire occurs, the statutes require, as a condition of rebuilding, more substantial and expensive structural work. Pennsylvania Co. v. Philadelphia Contributionship (Pa.) 510

Subrogation of company.

22. A provision in one of several insurance policies on mortgaged property, that, in case the insurer is compelled to make payment to the mortgagee when it is under no liability to the mortgagor, it shall be subrogated to the mortgagee's security, does not make the insurer a surety for the mortgage debt, so as to entitle it to challenge settlements made, while it was contesting its liability on its own policy, by the mortgagee with other insurers, or charge him with sums which he might have received, but failed to receive, from such policies. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. v. National L. Ins. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 692

23. One of several insurers of mortgaged property, who pays the amount due on its policy to the mortgagee, and becomes subrogated to his security, cannot charge, in satisfaction of the mortgagee's demands against the security, a sum allowed by a court of competent jurisdiction to the mortgagor's attorney out of recovery on other policies, either on the ground that the mortgagor had parted with his interest so as not to be entitled to an allowance for attorneys' fees, since that question was settled by the order, or on the ground that the mortgagee was at fault in not appealing from the order, where the insurer's interest had attached before the order was passed, and it failed to object to the allowance, or to indemnify the mortgagee against the expense of appealing. Id.

24. An insurer which receives an assignment of the mortgagee's claims against the mortgagor upon paying him the amount due by it under its policy on the mortgaged property cannot, in an accounting of all sums received from the various policies on the property by the mortgagee, who is seeking to enforce his mortgage for an unpaid balance, insist that he should be charged with the portion of the sum received under another policy which he is charged to have wrongfully permitted to go to the mortgagor, where the amount kept by him out of such payment was more than the share of the mortgage indebtedness chargeable to that policy. Id.

Right of action.

25. Insurance against loss through liability for personal injuries does not constitute a trust fund for the benefit of the injured person, and he cannot maintain an action against the insurer to reach such fund, where, before his claim against the insured is established, the insurer satisfies its obligation to him under the policy, although, by reason of the insolvency of the insured, the claim will be otherwise unenforceable. Bain v. Atkins (Mass.) 791

Tenant's Right to Remove Fixtures, see STATUTES, 7.

1. A covenant in a lease against assigning or subletting is not violated by placing a care taker in possession during the tenant's absence. Presby v. Benjamin (N. Y.) 317

2. A tenant cannot lawfully remove fixtures annexed to the freehold, which he has placed on leased land, in the absence of a contract giving him the right to do so, though an exception to this rule exists in the case of trade fixtures. Wright v. Du Bignon (Ga.) 669

3. A landlord is not liable for injury received by a person from falling on ice which had been allowed by the tenants to accumulate and remain on a sidewalk abutting the rented premises, notwithstanding that the ice resulted from water which had flowed from the landlord's property through a ditch placed there for the purpose of carrying off the refuse water across the sidewalk; the ice not being on the sidewalk when the tenants entered into possession, although the ditch was on the property at that time, and was put there for the purpose above indicated. Gardner v. Rhodes (Ga.) 749

Holding over.

4. Holding over after the expiration of any month renders a tenant from month to month liable for the rent of the ensuing month, whether the tenancy was created by express agreement or by the mere acceptance for a long period of time of monthly rentals. Byxbee v. Blake (Conn.) 222

5. Duty and Liability of master.

1. The legislature may lawfully charge railroad companies with liability to employees for injuries caused by defects in machinery, ways, or appliances, and forbid the waiving of this liability by contract. Coley v. North Carolina R. Co. (N. C.) 817

2. The duty of so operating a safely constructed and equipped railroad, subject to the rules and general supervision of the master, as to keep it reasonably safe for those employed upon it, is not a positive duty of the master, but a primary duty of the servant. Brady v. Chicago & G. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 712

3. A master is not excused from liability for the negligence of an engineer upon the second section of a train, in following too closely the first section and running his engine too rapidly as he approached the railroad yards, thereby causing a collision, by the fact that the night was so dark and foggy that the proximity of the first section could not be discovered by the employees of the second section in time to stop the latter, since reasonable care required that if the engineer could not discover the first section as he neared the yards he should have sent forward his fireman to ascertain its location, or should have run his engine so slowly and carefully that he could stop at any moment. Southern P. Co. v. Schoer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 707

Fellow servants.

4. The power of the alleged master or principal to command or direct the alleged servant or agent is the test of the liability of the former for the acts of the latter, under the maxim, Respondent superior; and if the master or principal has no power to command or direct the alleged servant or agent, he is not responsible for his acts, because there is no superior to respond. Brady v. Chicago & G. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 712

5. A servant having authority to direct and control others need not be engaged in performing the absolute duties of the master when he commits a negligent act causing injury to one under his control, nor be actually engaged in exercising his power of superintendence over the injured servant, in order to render the master liable under Utah Rev. Stat. 1898, § 1342, making all servants who have authority to direct and superintend other servants vice principals of the master. Southern P. Co. v. Schoer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 707

6. The negligent act of a foreman with general control and authority to employ and discharge workmen, in ordering a subject workman upon an elevator, and himself operating the elevator with negligence, to the workman's injury, is not the act of a fellow servant, but of a vice principal. Swift v. Bleise (Neb.) 147

7. A railway company running its trains over another road by permission is liable to its employees for the negligence of the servants of the licensing corporation in the discharge of the absolute duties of the master, but is not liable for their negligence in the discharge of their duties as servants. Brady v. Chicago & G. W. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 712

8. The ordinary contracts between a depot corporation and several railroad companies for the use of a depot and transfer yards do not establish a partnership relation between the companies, nor make the 57 L. R. A.

depot corporation the servant or agent of the railroad companies, so that they become liable for the negligence of its servants, under the maxim, Respondent superior. Id.

9. The employees of a depot company are not the servants of a railroad company operating a train through the yard of the former, within the meaning of Minn. Stat. 1894, § 2701, making every railroad company owning or operating a railroad in the state liable for all damages sustained by any servant thereof through the negligence of any other servant thereof, without contributory negligence on his part, so as to render the railroad company liable for an injury to one of its employees through the negligence of a servant of the depot company in failing to throw a switch, where the railroad company uses the station and yard of the depot company under a contract providing that the latter shall have the exclusive management and control of the station grounds, tracks, etc., and of the business conducted thereon, and the exclusive right and power to make rules and regulations for their operation, and that it shall furnish the employees to carry on the business, notwithstanding a clause that, since the employees of the depot company are in fact employed for and in furtherance of the business of the companies using such grounds, the railroad company shall indemnify the depot company against claims for damages arising out of the acts and omissions of the latter's servants while acting in furtherance of the business of the railroad company, or as the mutual servant of both. Id.

10. The duty of using a fender provided by the owner of a vessel to aid in docking it does not rest upon him, and therefore he is not liable for injuries to an employee resulting from the neglect of the mate to use it in bringing the vessel into the dock, although the injured employee works under the immediate orders of the mate. Kelly v. New Haven Steamboat Co. (Conn.) 494

Volunteers.

11. Injury received by a young man seventeen years old while helping brakemen to load a piano, at their request, is within the rule which exempts the master from liability to one who is injured while helping his servants at their request, by reasons of their negligence. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Finnell (Ky.) 286

Injury to servant by mob.

12. The master owes no duty to protect his servant from the criminal violence of a mob of strikers; hence no liability is imposed upon him for death resulting from such violence by a statute making him liable for death resulting from injuries inflicted by his negligence or wrongful act. Foreman v. Taylor Coal Co. (Ky.) 447

13. Breach of contract by a master to furnish protection to his servant from violence of a mob of strikers will not give a right of action under statutes making the master liable for the death of the servant through his negligence or wrongful act, and providing that actions for injury to the person, except by assault, shall not abate on the death of the person injured. Id.

Contributory negligence.

14. The defense of contributory negligence is not destroyed by a statute making railroad companies liable to employees for injuries caused by defects in machinery, ways, or appliances, and forbidding the waiving of this liability by contract. Coley v. North Carolina R. Co. (N. C.) 817

Assumption of risk.

15. Using a switching engine without a hand-hold on the tender does not constitute an assumption of the risk of such defect by the employee, where the statute makes railroad companies liable for injuries to employees from "any defect in the machinery, ways, or appliances," and makes void any agreement to waive the benefit of the statute. Id.

1. Erroneously marking taxes "paid" on city tax records is an act performed by the city in the exercise of its public, governmental functions, and is not the act of the corporation in its private or individual capacity. Philadelphia Mortg. & T. Co. v. Omaha (Neb.) 150

2. The exclusive control of police matters being vested in a board of police commissioners by one clause of a city charter, 57 L. R. A.

so long as the commissioners discharge their duty, and do not fail or refuse to provide the city with an efficient police, the mayor and council have no authority to appoint a police force under another clause of the charter giving them power to make regulations to protect the property and persons of citizens and preserve peace and good order in the city, and for this purpose to appoint, when necessary, a police force to assist the marshal in the discharge of his duty. Americus v. Perry (Ga.) 230

Local self-government.

See also CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 7-9.

3. There is no inherent right of local self-government in municipal corporations, and how far they shall be given this right is a matter addressed solely to legislative discretion. Id.

4. No guaranty of the right of municipal corporations to local self-government is made by those sections of the Georgia bill of rights which declare that all government originates, of right, with the people; that public officers are the servants of the people and at all times amenable to them; that the people of the state have the inherent, sole, and exclusive right of regulating their internal government and the police thereof; and that the enumeration of rights in the Constitution shall not be construed to deny to the people any inherent rights which they may have hitherto enjoyed,—although prior to the adoption of the Constitution municipal corporations had been given and were exercising the right to control their own affairs through officers chosen by them. Id.

Ordinances.

Requiring Bicyclists to Carry Lights, see CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 11, 12.

For Public Improvements, see PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.

Injunction against, see INJUNCTION, 1.

See also PROHIBITION.

5. The title "An Ordinance to Regulate Bicycles" is sufficient to cover a provision requiring the use of lamps by bicyclists using the streets of the city after dark. Des Moines v. Keller (Iowa) 243

6. The unconstitutionality of a portion of an ordinance does not render the entire ordinance void. The unconstitutional part falls, but the act stands. Com. use of Titusville v. Clark (Pa.) 348

7. The carrying of deadly weapons, being an offense fully provided for and punished by law, and being an act not in itself amounting to a breach of the peace, cannot be made an offense and punished by a municipal ordinance, unless expressly authorized by the municipal charter. Judy v. Lashley (W. Va.) 413

Powers.

8. An exclusive privilege to one person to collect and remove those noxious and unwholesome substances which are nuisances per se and a menace to public health may be granted by a city as an exercise of the police power, and is not an invasion of personal rights or an unlawful creation of a monopoly. Iler v. Ross (Neb.) 895

9. A city cannot grant a monopoly to one individual, by contract, to enter upon the private premises of the inhabitants of the city, and at their expense collect and remove those innocuous substances, such as ashes, cinders, stable manure, or other substances not in themselves nuisances, though, if allowed to accumulate in unreasonable quantities, they would become such, or which may be utilized for some beneficial purpose, since such an attempted exercise of power is an invasion of the personal and property rights of the citizens, in restraint of trade, and unnecessarily creates a monopoly. Id.

10. Authority to provide for the safety of its inhabitants will give a municipality power to require bicyclists using its streets after dark to carry lights. Des Moines v. Keller (Iowa) 243

11. The police power of a municipal corporation depends upon the will of the legislature, and a city, town, or village can only exercise such police power as is fairly included in the grant of powers by its charter. Judy v. Lashley (W. Va.) 413

12. No power to punish acts made criminal by the state law, and fully covered thereby, is conferred by W. Va. Code, chap. 47, § 28, vesting in the councils of municipal corporations the power and duty "to protect the persons and property of the citizens of such city, town, or village, and to preserve peace and good order therein," except such as would be attended with circumstances of aggravation not included in the state law. Such power must be specifically and expressly given by the legislature, before it can be exercised by such corporation. Id.

Liability.

See also EVIDENCE, 29.

13. The operation of a stone crushing machine to prepare material for constructing and repairing its highways is a governmental act of a municipality, so that it will be exempt from liability for injury to an employee through a defect in the machine, although the machine is located several miles from the place where the material is to be used. Colwell v. Waterbury (Conn.) 218

14. The mere fact of an explosion of gases in a sewer is not sufficient to charge the municipality with liability for the injury caused thereby. Fuchs v. St. Louis (Mo.) 136

15. The explosion of gases in a sewer to the injury of abutting property owners cannot reasonably be anticipated from the fact of the escape of a quantity of crude petroleum into it, so as to charge the municipality with negligence in failing to provide for the escape of the gases generated thereby. Id.

16. A city is not bound to open vents and manholes leading to its sewers, to permit the escape of gases which are generated therein, as a means of avoiding an explosion, although it may have notice that a quantity of crude petroleum has found its way into the sewer as a result of a fire at the refinery. Id.

17. No recovery can be had against a city for injuries caused by an explosion in a sewer, which is alleged to have resulted from negligently permitting petroleum to be turned into it, where the evidence shows that the explosion might have resulted from another cause, and there is nothing to show that it did not do so. Id.

18. An unorganized assemblage of merry-makers to the number of 1,000 in the main street of a city, exploding fireworks, obstructing the use of the street, and endangering life and property, is a "riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people," within the meaning of a statute making the municipality liable for injuries done by such an assemblage. Madisonville v. Bishop (Ky.) 130

19. That a part of the expense of a street improvement is to be paid by assessment upon property benefited does not make the duty of making it any less a governmental duty, within the rule exempting the municipality from liability for injuries caused by its performance, than if the entire expense were to be paid by general city tax. Colwell v. Waterbury (Conn.) 218

20. The liability of a municipality to damages for permitting a drainage ditch to become obstructed and filled with filth and offal so that the water flows onto adjoining land and causes sickness in the family of its owner is limited to the injury to the property, and does not include the injury by sickness or death, nor by loss of time, increase of family expenses, nor by doctor's bills and medicines, resulting from the sickness. Williams v. Greenville (N. C.) 207

Bathgate* (N. J. Err. & App.) 307
 2. The owner of walls left standing after the destruction of the building by fire is under no obligation to adjoining property owners to remove or protect the walls, until he has had a reasonable time to make necessary investigation and take such precautions as are required. Ainsworth v. Lakin (Mass.) 132
 3. The owner of walls left standing by a fire, which cannot be used for rebuilding, owes adjoining owners the duty, after a reasonable time for investigation, to exercise such care in the maintenance of walls likely to fall on their property as will absolutely prevent injuries except from causes over which he would have no control, such as vis major, acts of public enemies, or wrongful acts of third persons which human foresight could not reasonably be expected to anticipate and prevent. Id.
 4. A railroad company is not relieved from liability to a child injured by an improperly fastened turntable by the fact that the fastenings were undone, and the table put in motion, by playmates of the injured child. Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (Iowa) 561

Const. art. 11, § 4, requiring county offices to be filled by popular election, but are subordinate officers or assistants of the courts. State ex rel. Douglas v. Westfall (Minn.) 297

2. Where under the statutes a particular city is denominated "a territorial division of the state," treated as a county, and provided with a probate judge the same as other counties, he is a county officer within the meaning of constitutional provisions regulating the compensation of such officers. *Henderson v. Multifariousness.

1. A bill to reach an execution debtor's interest in a spendthrift trust is not rendered multifarious by allegations in an amendment tending to show that the property originally belonged to the judgment debtor, and was conveyed and reconveyed under a plan to defraud creditors, where the whole frame and scope of the amendment show, not an effort to have the deeds set aside as a fraud on creditors, but to subject the debtor's interest in the trust to the payment of his debts. Hutchinson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (S. C.) 607

8. An allegation of the return of the execution "No property found" is not necessary to support a bill in equity to reach assets of the execution debtor. Hutchinson v. Maxwell (Va.) 384

10. In an action of ejectment for land occupied by the defendant, a plea of not guilty admits such possession as excludes the plaintiff. French v. Robb (N. J. Err. & App.) 956

11. A verified account must be taken as true, against a denial and an offset pleaded in an unverified answer, under Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 95, § 108. Cold Blast Transp. Co. v. Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 696

Reply.

12. An action on contract to recover a balance from a banker is not converted into an action in tort by a reply setting up defendant's negligence to defeat a defense that the money was paid out according to what the bank believed to be plaintiff's directions. Critten v. Chemical Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 529

Wilson (Ill.)* 127

2. The cost of a street improvement cannot be lawfully assessed on abutting property where the contractor is required by the ordinance to sustain all loss or damage arising from the nature of the work to be done under the specifications, since this requirement would tend to increase the cost of the work. Blochman v. Spreckles (Cal.) 213

QUO WARRANTO.

1. Quo warranto may properly be invoked to oust a corporation from the right to manufacture oleomargarine, given to by its charter, where the business has been conducted in defiance of the laws of the state relating thereto, and in such a manner as to amount to an abuse of the corporate power. State ex rel. Monnett v. Capital City Dairy Co. (Ohio) 181

2. A proceeding in quo warranto to oust a corporation engaged in the manufacture of oleomargarine from the exercise of its right to be a corporation, because of its violation of statutes regulating the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, is not barred by the fact that the criminal laws of the state provide for the punishment of such violations by fine. Id.

3. The superintendent of a municipal water-supply system has sufficient interest in the validity of a statute providing for the appointment of trustees and a new superintendent for the system to be entitled to maintain quo warranto proceedings to test its validity. State ex rel. White v. Barker (Iowa) 244

4. A resident of a city and contributor to the support of its water-supply system is interested in the appointment of trustees for the system under a state statute, so as to be entitled to maintain quo warranto proceedings to test the validity of the appointment under a statute authorizing any citizen having an interest in the question to institute the proceeding upon refusal of the county attorney to do so. Id.

Bridge Co. v. Montgomery* (Ky.) 781

2. A railroad company operating a portion of its railroad bridge as a toll bridge for travelers with horses must keep a lookout for the purpose of discovering whether or not teams on the bridge have become so frightened by trains also on it as to be unmanageable and dangerous; and if so, so far as is reasonable, it must shut off steam and avoid unnecessary noise. Id.

2. An aged parent having conveyed all his property to his son in consideration of the latter's promise to support the grantor for life, equity will treat the conveyance as having been made on a condition subsequent, for breach of which the title to the property will revert to the grantor, whether the contract calls for maintenance and support generally, or for specific payments of money, or the delivery of property from time to time; and in case of such breach a court of equity will take jurisdiction to give the grantor a protective remedy by establishing his status as owner of the property and quieting his title thereto. Id.

STATUTES.

Constitutionality of, Generally, see CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Invalid in part.

1. The invalidity of one portion of a section of a statute providing for the taxation of the capital stock of corporations does not render the whole section void, where the remainder constitutes a complete system of taxation in itself, capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent intent of the legislature. State v. Duluth Gas & W. Co. (Minn.) 63

Title.

2. A provision of a statute prescribing penalties for peddling without a license is sufficiently covered by the title, "An Act to Provide a System of Revenue." Rosenbloom v. State (Neb.) 922

3. An act is not subject to the objection that it contains matter different from what is expressed in its title, where it is entitled, "An Act to Amend, Revise, and Consolidate the Several Acts Granting Corporate Authority to the City of Americus, to Confer Additional Powers upon the Mayor and City Council of Americus, to Extend the Corporate Limits of Said City, and for Other Purposes," because it withdraws from the city certain of its former powers by providing for a board of police commissioners which shall have the exclusive control of the police officers of the city, naming the first members of the board, prescribing the manner in which their successors shall be chosen, and setting forth their duties and powers. Americus v. Perry (Ga.) 230

General and special legislation.

4. A particular classification of persons may be valid if the object of the statute is to raise revenue, and invalid if the object is regulation. Rosenbloom v. State (Neb.) 922

5. A general law can be made applicable to the fixing of the compensation of probate judges throughout the state, so as to bring such legislation within the operation of a constitutional provision forbidding local or special legislation where a general law can be made applicable. Henderson v. Koenig (Mo.) 659

Construction.

6. A statute, the manifest purpose of which is to tax transfers of property, cannot be construed as imposing a direct tax upon the property to save it from being declared unconstitutional. Re Pell (N. Y.) 540

7. The provision that a tenant may, during the term, remove fixtures erected by him, though after the term they are to be regarded as abandoned to the use of the landlord, made by Ga. Civ. Code, § 3120, must be construed to refer to trade fixtures only. Wright v. Du Bignon (Ga.) 669

8. A statute requiring partnerships organized under the laws of other states to furnish bonds before doing business in the state will not be construed as applicable to individual nonresidents in determining its constitutionality. State v. Cadigan (Vt.) 668

Repeal.

9. An amendment of a general law allowing fees to probate judges as compensation for their services, which declares that in all cities of a certain class such judges shall be compensated by a salary, violates a constitutional provision that the general assembly shall not indirectly enact a special or local law by the partial repeal of a general one. *Henderson v. 1. A motorman in charge of an electric car moving in the public street, where he has reason to expect little children are playing, must exercise a high degree of watchfulness in the operation of the car. Sample v. Consolidated Light & R. Co. (W. Va.) 186

2. A street-railroad company cannot remove snow from its tracks to the adjacent roadway in such a manner as to leave a deep ditch and render the street unsafe and dangerous for public travel, without liability for injuries to travelers caused thereby, although such liability is not imposed by the ordinance conferring its franchise. Gerrard v. La Crosse City R. Co. (Wis.) 465

1. While subrogation is not founded on contract, and is a creation of equity existing solely for accomplishing the ends of substantial justice, there must, in every case where the doctrine is invoked, in addition to the inherent justice of the case, concur therewith some established principle of equity jurisprudence, as recognized and enforced by courts of chancery. Meeker v. Larson (Neb.) 901

2. One who furnishes money for the purpose of discharging a mortgage lien upon real estate cannot claim subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee, in the absence of an agreement or understanding that the mortgage is to be kept alive for his benefit, or that he shall be given a lien on the premises in lieu of the one which is discharged. Id.

Uniformity.

See also infra, 15; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 19-22.

1. The taxing power of the legislature is not restricted by any implied rule of fundamental law that taxes must be equal and uniform, in the absence of any such provision in the Federal or state Constitution. State v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Conn.) 481

2. The privileges and immunities of citizens of other states, guaranteed by U. S. Const. art. 4, § 2, and U. S. Const. 14th Amend., are not violated by Conn. Gen. Stat. §§ 3836, 3916, taxing the resident stockholders of certain corporations in the town in which they reside, deducting from the market value of the stock the value of the capital invested in real estate on which the company pays taxes, but imposing a state tax on nonresident shareholders of 1½ per cent on the market value of their shares, without any provision for deduction of capital invested in real estate, since this law is not a hostile discrimination against citizens of other states in the enjoyment of property rights common to all, but provides for the state taxation of nonresident stockholders because it is impracticable to subject them to the municipal taxation that is imposed on the resident stockholders. Id.

Tax on franchise.

3. An exclusive privilege not enjoyed by natural persons, within the meaning of Stat. § 4077, relating to a franchise tax, is not created by a proviso in articles of incorporation, that the private property of stockholders shall not be subject to corporate debts. Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 33

4. The exemption of corporations which do not have any special privileges and franchises from the operation of a statute imposing a franchise tax on corporations which do have such franchises or privileges does not make the statute unconstitutional for lack of uniformity. Id.

5. An ordinary business corporation created under the general law, under which no special or exclusive privilege not allowed by law to natural persons can be obtained, is not subject to the franchise tax imposed by Stat. § 4077, on railway, gas, ferry, bridge, express, and every other like company, and every other corporation having "any special or exclusive privilege or franchise not allowed by law to natural persons, or performing any public service." Id.

6. A public service which will render a corporation subject to the franchise tax imposed by Stat. § 4077, is not performed by a corporation engaged in the business of a tobacco warehouseman. Id.

7. Corporate franchises are not taxable under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 1524, providing for listing "franchises" for taxation as a separate and distinct class of personal property, as that section applies only to private persons or others not falling within the provisions of § 1530 as to the taxation of the property of corporations and associations. State v. Duluth Gas & W. Co. (Minn.) 63

8. A street-railway company is not a "railroad company" within the meaning of Minn. Gen. Laws 1887, chap. 11, § 1 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 1669), providing for the taxation of railroad companies by requiring them to pay a percentage on their gross earnings. Id.

9. The franchise of an electric light and power company which has a right to use streets and alleys of a city is subject to taxation under Const. art. 7, § 1, and Laws 1897, p. 136, authorizing in general terms the taxation of real and personal property, although there is no special provision of statute for ascertaining the value of the franchise. Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Judson (Wash.) 78

10. An ad valorem tax upon the franchise of a street railway company is required by Const. § 174, which declares that all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations, shall be taxed in proportion to its value. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bellevue (Ky.) 50

Tax on parsonage.

11. The renting of a church parsonage, and using the rent to procure another residence for the parson, do not deprive it of its exemption from taxation, under a provision that exemption of parsonages shall not extend beyond the buildings and premises actually occupied as such. Protestant Episcopal Church v. Prioleau (S. C.) 606

Valuation; deductions.

12. The valuation by the state board of the franchises of a street railway company is conclusive as to its value for city assessment. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bellevue (Ky.) 50

13. An arbitrary increase, by the board of equalization, of the value of certain items of personal property of a corporation, in a lump sum, without any evidence upon which to act and without seeing the property, and the apportionment of the amount between the various items by the county auditor, cannot be objected to by the corporation, where it is neither alleged nor shown that it is at all prejudiced thereby, and there is no claim that there was any overvaluation. State v. Duluth Gas & W. Co. (Minn.) 63

14. A taxpayer who appears before a board of equalization and is heard upon the valuation of his property as fixed by the assessor without objecting to the manner in which the board is constituted cannot recover back the amount paid under the assessment as raised by the board, upon the ground that the board was illegally constituted. Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Judson (Wash.) 78

15. The deduction from the value of the capital stock of a corporation in assessing it for taxation, of the total amount of corporate indebtedness, except indebtedness for current expenses, which is made by Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 1530, is invalid because in violation of the constitutional requirement of equality and uniformity in taxation. State v. Duluth Gas & W. Co. (Minn.) 63

Enforcement.

16. A tax levied on real estate for general revenue purposes, or by way of special assessment for benefits received on account of local improvements, is not a debt, in the ordinary meaning of the word, against the owner of the property, to be enforced as a personal liability, but a charge upon the real estate against which assessed, to be enforced and collected by a sale of the property liable for the taxes so levied and assessed. Philadelphia Mortg. & T. Co. v. Omaha (Neb.) 150

Transfer tax.

See also STATUTES, 6.

17. A vested remainder cannot be made the subject of a transfer tax, although it does not come into possession of the remainderman until after the passage of the statute, since such tax would diminish the value of a vested estate, impair the obligation of a contract, and take private property for public use without compensation. Re Pell (N. Y.) 540

18. A tax on all remainders or reversions which vested prior to a certain date, but which shall not come into possession until after the passage of the act, even if it can be regarded as a tax on property, and not on transfers, is invalid as not bearing equally upon the entire class to which the property belongs. Id.

19. A tax on remainders when they come into possession, of 5 per cent on some, 1 per cent on others, and on others nothing, even if it can be regarded as a tax on property, and not on transfers, is void for not apportioning the burden equally among the owners of the estates sought to be taxed. Id.

TRESPASS.

A grantee of land over which a third person has been given a parol license to construct a ditch may maintain trespass in case the licensee attempts to act under the license after the grant. Hicks Brothers v. Swift Creek Mill Co. (Ala.) 720

TRIAL.

Argument to jury.

1. Counsel in arguing to the jury must not state facts of his personal experience, which are not in evidence, and are calculated to prejudice the jury. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall (Ky.) 771

2. The pleadings should not be referred to by counsel in his closing argument to the jury for the purpose of claiming a change in the theory of defense, if they have not been given in evidence on the trial. Id.

Assessment of punishment by jury.

3. It was no essential part of a jury trial at common law that the jury should also fix the punishment if they convicted the prisoner. State v. Hamey (Mo.) 846

4. The adoption of a new constitution preserving the right of trial by jury "as heretofore enjoyed" does not include the right, which has existed by statute for many years, of having the jury assess the punishment in criminal cases whenever there is an alternative or discretion in regard to it. Id.

5. The assessment by the jury of the punishment in a criminal case when the statute imposes that duty on the court does not vitiate the verdict, but the court may ignore it, and assess the punishment itself. Id.

Special interrogatories.

6. While two special questions covering the same inquiry should not be put to a jury, yet if one covering some matter of another is so drawn as more definitely and pointedly to inquire as to a particular matter controlling the case, it should be given. Vieth v. Hope Salt & Coal Co. (W. Va.) 410

Questions for jury.

7. A jury is not bound to adopt the construction of a contract which will render it legal if it is equally capable of one which will render it illegal if other evidence in the case tends to show illegality. United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Charles (Ala.) 212

8. In the absence of any evidence of authority on the part of the lessee of a piano to sell the same in an action by the lessor to recover possession of it from one who purchased it from the lessee, the jury cannot be permitted to consider the question of such authority. Oliver Ditson Co. v. Bates (Mass.) 289

9. The presumption of negligence arising from an injury to a passerby in a public street from a broken electric wire is not overcome, so as to require the case to be taken from the jury, by testimony of defendant's employees that the wire was properly constructed and put up. Boyd v. Portland General Electric Co. (Or.) 619

10. The sufficiency of the fastening of a turntable to prevent injury to children playing on it is a question for the jury where it was undone by one of them. Edgington v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (Iowa) 561

11. Whether or not a traveler in a cutter drawn by one horse is negligent in attempting to cross to the opposite side of the street-car track, which is in a depression about a foot deep, when his progress on the side on which he has been traveling is obstructed, and whether or not he does so in an ordinarily prudent manner, are questions for the jury. Gerrard v. La Crosse City R. Co. (Wis.) 465

12. The jury must decide whether or not a railroad employee is negligent in using a drainpipe upon a tender for a grab iron to assist him in climbing onto the tender, in the absence of such iron. Coley v. North Carolina R. Co. (N. C.) 817

13. The question as to the negligence of a carrier in failing to forward a corpse by a certain train is for the jury. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hull (Ky.) 771

14. A peremptory instruction for defendant cannot be given in an action against a railroad company operating a portion of its railroad bridge as a toll bridge, to recover for injuries to a traveler on the latter by negligently frightening his horse, where the evidence shows that while the horse was on the bridge it met a train having an engine at each end, and that those in charge of the second engine, although knowing the horse was frightened, took no steps to prevent an accident, but permitted the engine to throw out an unusual quantity of smoke, steam, and cinders, which caused the horse to become unmanageable and injure the plaintiff. Kentucky & I. Bridge Co. v. Montgomery (Ky.) 781

15. Whether or not a mercantile agency which receives information of an assignment on a general assignment blank, to which is added a clause stating that it was to secure an indorser, and transmits it as being a general assignment for creditors, exercises reasonable care and prudence, so as to relieve it from liability for libel, is a question for the jury. Douglass v. Daisley (C. C. App. 1st C.) 475

16. Though, in an action sounding in damages, there is an order at rules for an entry of damages, yet a plea of the general issue, or other issuable plea, filed in term, annuls that order; and the jury is properly sworn to try the issue, and not to inquire of damages. Peters v. Jackson (W. Va.) 428

Instructions.

17. Where a rule or principle of law is clearly declared by the court in its general charge, it is not error to refuse to repeat it 57 L. R. A.

in a special instruction. Southern P. Co. v. Schoer (C. C. App. 8th C.) 707

18. The instructions in an action for negligent injuries should confine the jury to a consideration of the acts of negligence alleged in the complaint. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Stroh (Ky.) 875

19. There is no error in submitting to the jury a phase of the case which defendant's pleadings and the conduct of the court and parties throughout the trial show was understood to be presented by the complaint. Boyd v. Portland General Electric Co. (Or.) 619

20. It is not error to refuse to instruct the jury that a defendant is guilty of gross negligence, as distinguished from ordinary negligence on the one hand, and wilful or reckless negligence on the other, because there is no such legal degree of negligence as "gross" negligence, the word "gross" in this connection being a mere epithet used to characterize one of the two legal classes of negligence mentioned. Purple v. Union P. R. Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 700

Verdict.

See also supra, 5.

21. A verdict in an action of trespass on the case reading, "We, the jury, find for the defendants," (the plea being not guilty), is good. Peters v. Jackson (W. Va.) 428

TRUSTS.

Anti-Trust Act as Denial of Equal Protection of Laws, see CONSTITUTIONAL LAW, 10.

Insurance as Trust Fund, see INSURANCE, 25.

1. Trustees for the sale of land will not be permitted, directly or indirectly, to make profit for themselves out of the trust estate. Frazier v. Jeakins (Kan.) 575

2. A man who receives property in trust for the support of his wife and children cannot, after mingling the income with his own funds for a period of years without keeping or stating an account, and making improvements on the trust property, go back, charge himself with the income received, and credit the account with the cost of the improvements, leaving himself debtor to the beneficiaries, on the theory that it was his personal duty to support his family, for the purpose of preventing his creditors from reaching the improvements. National Valley Bank v. Hancock (Va.) 728 Spendthrift trust.

See also CREDITORS' BILL, 1; PLEADING, 1.

3. An equitable life estate which shall be free from the debts of the beneficiary cannot be created where the statute provides that estates of every kind, holden or possessed in trust, shall be subject to debts and charges of the persons to whose use, or to whose benefit, they are holden or possessed, as they would be if those persons owned the like interest in things holden or possessed, as in the uses or trusts thereof. Hutchinson v. Maxwell (Va.) 384

4. In jurisdictions where spendthrift trusts are illegal, creditors may subject to their claims personal property in which the beneficiary in such an attempted trust is given an absolute equitable estate, and the rents, profits, and income of real and personal estate, which the beneficiary could have claimed under a direction to the trustee to use them for his proper and comfortable support and maintenance, although the trustee has a discretion as to what amount shall be so applied. Id.

Preference to cestui que trust; following trust fund.

See also EVIDENCE, 2, 3.

5. Misappropriation of a trust fund does not entitle the cestui que trust merely as such, and for that reason alone, to a preference, over general creditors of an insolvent trustee. Lincoln Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. v. Morrison (Neb.) 885

6. In order to obtain a preference over general creditors of an insolvent trustee, the cestui que trust must show that the estate out of which he claims such preference has been increased to some extent by the misappropriation of the trust property; and he is entitled to a preference to the extent of such increase only. Id.

7. Where a trustee mingles trust moneys with his own funds, the cestui que trust is entitled to a charge upon the whole; and, so long as any portion of the mass into which the trust fund has entered remains in any form, it is subject to such charge, and may be followed and claimed. Id.

8. A cestui que trust is not entitled to a preference over general creditors of an insolvent trustee, where the whole of a fund wherein the trustee has mingled his own money and that of the cestui que trust is used by the trustee in paying his debts. Id.

9. Property or assets of an insolvent trustee, acquired before, or with the proceeds of property held before, the trust money came into his hands, and not in any way mingled therewith, are not subject to any lien or claim of the cestui que trust, and the rights of the latter with respect thereto are those of a general creditor only. Id.

10. A change in the form of a portion of a fund in which money of a trustee personally and of the cestui que trust has been mingled is not necessarily a withdrawal of such portion; and when the trustee retains such portion and dissipates the remainder, the portion retained in the altered form is taken to represent such fund, and may be claimed by the cestui que trust. Id.

11. Where a portion of a fund made up of trust money and of individual money of the trustee is invested, and a profit results, the cestui que trust, in following the trust money into the investment, may claim such profits as the proceeds of the original fund upon which he had a charge,—at least to the extent of said charge upon the original fund. Id.

By Foreign Loan Association, see BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

1. A contract with a building and loan association for a loan, which provides for a fixed premium which, added to the interest reserved, exceeds the legal rate, is usurious. Shannon v. Georgia State Bldg. & L. Asso. (Miss.) 800

2. Where a debtor executes a note and mortgage for a loan of money at a lawful rate of interest, and, at its maturity, enters into a new contract with the lender for a further extension of the loan, which is tainted with the vice of usury, and the lender, by agreement, retains the note and mortgage as collateral security to the usurious contract, in a suit to enforce the mortgage security the lender is restricted in his recovery to the amount due on the indebtedness at the time of making the usurious contract, after which all interest is, by force of the statute, forfeited. Chicago Lumber Co. v. Bancroft (Neb.) 910

3. An assignee of property subject to a usurious mortgage may recover from the mortgagee the whole usurious interest paid by himself and his assignor. Shannon v. Georgia State Bldg. & L. Asso. (Miss.) 800

WITNESSES.

1. Interested persons are by the law of Louisiana competent witnesses, and their testimony is binding on the court, unless overcome by counter testimony, or irreconcilable with the known facts of the case. Marks v. New Orleans Cold Storage Co. (La.) 271

2. A wife is a competent witness against her husband in a prosecution for bigamy, under Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 331, providing that husband and wife shall not be witnesses against each other except in criminal proceedings for a crime committed by one against the other. Hills v. State (Neb.) 155

3. Merely exempting a witness in a criminal case from liability to have his testimony used against himself in case he is subsequently prosecuted for an offense to which it relates is not sufficient to prevent his claiming the protection of a constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in any criminal case, since the testimony so given may disclose facts upon which a successful 57 L.
